PREFACE.

The preliminary part of this work is a historical introduction and guide to the study of the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth. This is followed by analytical, legal, and political commentaries on the Constitution, for the use of those who seek a special and comprehensive acquaintance with its provisions.

Our chief aim has been a practical one. Clear as is the language of the Constitution, it cannot be fully understood without the study of a large correlated literature.

The Federation of the Australian colonies has occupied the best energies of the statesmen and the people of Australia for many years; and this Constitution is the outcome of exhaustive debates, heated controversies, and careful compromises. It is an adaptation of the principles of British and colonial government to the federal system. Its language and ideas are drawn, partly from the model of all modern governments, the British Constitution itself; partly from the colonial Constitutions based on the British model; partly from the Federal Constitution of the United States of America; and partly from the semi-federal Constitution of the Dominion of Canada; with such modifications as were suggested by the circumstances and needs of the Australian people.

The Constitution of the Commonwealth, therefore, is not an isolated document. It has been built on traditional foundations. Its roots penetrate deep into the past. It embodies the best achievements of political progress, and realizes the latest attainable ideals of liberty. It represents the aspirations of the Australian people in the direction of nationhood, so far as is consistent and in harmony with the solidarity of the Empire.

Such an instrument of government must needs be rich in historical associations, and many of its derivative enactments are necessarily intertwined with the course of constitutional development and interpretation in kindred systems and communities. There is hardly a phrase in it without a history, or without analogy with a phrase which in some other Constitution has been the subject of exhaustive arguments and judicial decisions. The Commentaries of the great American jurists, and the numerous judgments on constitutional questions given by the Supreme Court of the United States during the last century, are full of profound reasoning which is applicable to the words of this Constitution. Many decisions of the Supreme Courts of Canada and the Australian colonies upon constitutional questions, and reviews of them by the Privy Council, are of great value in the elucidation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth. There is thus an immense store of material for comparative study.

The actual history of the Constitution is traced generally in Part IV. of the Historical Introduction, and in detail in the Historical Notes appended to each clause, section, or subsection. But its study involves many other aspects. Its character as a colonial Constitution demands a review of the history and principles of colonization, which are shortly dealt with in Parts I. and II. of the Historical Introduction. As an Australian Constitution, it is intimately associated with the story of the constitutional development of the Australian colonies, which is traced in Part III. of the Historical Introduction. As a Constitution on the British model, it requires some knowledge of British constitutional law and history, the outlines of which are sketched in the notes to the Preamble and elsewhere. And as a Federal Constitution, light is thrown upon it by the American, Canadian, Swiss, and German Constitutions. Wherever comparison was thought useful, the corresponding provisions of those Constitutions have been set out in small type immediately after each section.

We are fully sensible of the difficulty of attempting to expound a Constitution before it has been the subject of practical working or judicial exposition. It is impossible to foretell where the real difficulties will be found, or how they will be met. The experience of other countries is a guide, but not an infallible guide; and the development of the Constitution of the Commonwealth must assuredly follow lines of its own. We have, however, endeavoured, from the vast and scattered materials bearing on the subject, to produce a work which we hope will facilitate the interpretation of, and foster an affection for, the Constitution. We trust that by the orderly arrangement of historical matter, by the minute and impartial analysis of every fundamental word, phrase, and enactment of the Constitution, and by the provision made for the comparative study of other Constitutions, with their wealth of associated precedents, the work may prove of assistance, not only to students of constitutional history and political science, but also to those who, in the active fields of law, politics, or commerce, have a practical interest in the working of the new federal institutions of Australia.

For valuable assistance to the study and exposition of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, we desire to express our acknowledgments and obligations to the following works:—

For information as to the progress of Federation and constitutional government in South Australia we are indebted to Sir Richard C. Baker, and for similar materials in the case of Tasmania to the Hon. Nicholas J. Brown, M.H.A. Professor Morris, of the University of Melbourne, kindly revised the sketch of ancient colonies and modern colonization down to Magellan's great voyage. We have to thank Mr. Francis Walsh, Parliamentary Librarian of New South Wales, Mr. R. Church, Parliamentary Librarian of Victoria, Mr. G. W. Waddell, Librarian of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, and Mr. John Schutt, Librarian of the Supreme Court of Victoria, for courteous facilities afforded and assistance given in referring to original reports and authorities.

TABLE OF CASES

CITED IN THIS WORK.

NOTE ON AMERICAN REPORTS.—The first 90 volumes of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States are cited by the names of the different reporters (Dallas, Cranch, Wheaton, Peters, Howard, Black, Wallace). From vol. 91 they are known as the United States Reports (cited thus:—"176 U.S."). The early reports of the Federal Circuit Courts are cited by the names of the reporters, but since 1880 they are all contained in the Federal Reporter (cited "Fed. Rep.>").

Selected cases from the American State Courts down to 1869 are collected in the "American Decisions" (100 vols.); from 1870 to 1887, in the "American Reports" (60 vols.); and from 1888 to the present time in the "American State Reports." Under the national reporter system, the decisions of the highest courts of the different States are now contained in the following group of reports:—Atlantic Reporter, North-eastern Reporter, North-western Reporter, Pacific Reporter, Southern Reporter, South-eastern Reporter, South-western Reporter.

By the QUEEN.

A PROCLAMATION.

VICTORIA R.

WHEREAS by an Act of Parliament passed in the Sixty-third and Sixty-fourth Years of Our Reign intituled, "An Act to constitute the Commonwealth of Australia," it is enacted that it shall be lawful for the Queen, with the advice of the Privy Council, to declare by Proclamation, that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being later than One Year after the passing of this Act, the people of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania, and also, if Her Majesty is satisfied that the people of Western Australia have agreed thereto, of Western Australia, shall be united in a Federal Commonwealth under the name of the Commonwealth of Australia.

And whereas We are satisfied that the people of Western Australia have agreed thereto accordingly.

We therefore, by and with the advice of Our Privy Council, have thought fit to issue this Our Royal Proclamation, and We do hereby declare that on and after the First day of January One thousand nine hundred and one, the people of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and Western Australia shall be united in a Federal Commonwealth under the name of the Commonwealth of Australia.

Given at Our Court at Balmoral this Seventeenth day of September, in the Year of our Lord One thousand nine hundred, and in the Sixty-fourth Year of Our Reign.

God Save the Queen.

ADDENDUM.

NEW MINISTRY IN VICTORIA.—On the 15th November, 1900, in consequence of a no-confidence vote by the newly-elected Legislative Assembly in Victoria. Mr. Allan McLean tendered the resignation of his Ministry (see p. 374, infra), which was accepted. Sir George Turner formed a new administration, consisting of the following members, who were sworn in on 19th November:—Premier, Treasurer, and Commissioner of Customs, the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, P.C., G.C.M.G.; Attorney-General, the Hon. I. A. Isaacs; Chief Secretary and Minister of Labour, the Hon. A. J. Peacock; Minister of Public Works and Railways, the Hon. W. A. Trenwith; Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. J. Morrissey; Minister of Lands, the Hon. D. J. Duggan; Minister of Mines and Water Supply, the Hon. J. B. Burton; Postmaster-General and Minister of Public Instruction, the Hon. W. Gurr; Solicitor-General, the Hon. A. Wynne, M.L.C.; Minister of Defence and Health, the Hon. W. McCulloch, M.L.C.; Ministers without portfolio, the Hon. E. J. Crooke, M.L.C., the Hon. P. Phillips, M.L.C., the Hon. S. Gillott, M.L.A., the Hon. R. McGregor, M.L.A.

HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION.

PART I.

ANCIENT COLONIES.

(1) HELLENIC CITY-STATES.

COLONIES AND PLANTATIONS.—The terms “Colony” and “Plantation” were originally applied to English settlements abroad, or small communities of English subjects established in foreign parts, principally for the purpose of raising produce. They were never extended to English dominions in Europe, such as Dunkirk, Toulon, and Calais, whilst those places belonged to the kingdom, nor were they, nor are they at the present time used in reference to Jersey or Guernsey, or other islands in the English Channel. For some years the terms colony and plantation were used indiscriminately. In the reign of Charles II. “Colony” came into general use, to denote the relation of dependence in which American Plantations stood to the Crown. A colony then came to mean a plantation which had a Governor and civil establishment subordinate to the mother country. In the statute 7 and 8 William III. c. 22, declaring void Colonial Laws repugnant to English Law applicable to the colonies, and in the Navigation Acts afterwards passed, the two names are used without distinction.—Petersdorff’s Abridgment, vol. V., p. 540.

In connection with a new instrument of Government which marks the transition from the colonial system planted in Australia over one hundred years ago to a new order of things, a higher and more complex political organization, a larger measure of self-government, and a more matured social development, it will be fitting to draw attention to the origin and growth of British colonies, and to some of their leading characteristics and achievements, and to compare them with the colonies of antiquity with which they in some respects agree, but from which they in more respects differ. They agree in having, like the older types, sprung from a parent stock, but they differ materially in the circumstances and motives which led to their establishment, in their primary structure, and in their relations with the mother country, as well as in their career and progress.

GREEK COLONIES.—Various tribes and divisions, of which the ancient Hellenic race was composed, participated in the settlements known as Greek colonies. The causes which led to these migrations were the pressure of population on the means of subsistence within the narrow limits of crowded cities; internal dissensions consequent on class domination and party faction; and a love for maritime exploration and discovery.

Among the first recorded of these settlements were the Ionian colonies. After the death of Codrus (B.C., 1100, according to the early legends of Greek history), Ionian adventurers sailing eastward and northward from Attica, established themselves in that part of Asia Minor along the shores of the Ægean sea from Phocæa to Miletus. Twelve cities were built, the principal of which were Ephesus and Miletus. They were severally independent of the States from which their founders had emigrated, but they formed a mutual association for common purposes known as the Ionic Confederacy. From this new centre expeditions went forth and planted commercial emporiums on the shores of the Black Sea, including one from Miletus which established Sinope, the greatest and most important of the colonial stations fronting the Euxine. Trebezus (Trebizond) was afterwards settled from Sinope.

Whilst the Ionians were thus engaged, another body of Greeks, Æolians, proceeding from Thessaly and Bœotia, founded Æolian colonies on the northern islands of the Ægean sea, and on the northern part of the western coast of Asia Minor. They also were united in a confederacy of twelve cities, called the Æolian Confederacy, the chief of which were Lesbos and Tenedos.

In like manner the Dorians, another Hellenic tribe, settled in the southern islands and in the southern part of the western coast of Asia Minor. Six of these cities formed themselves into the Dorian Confederacy. In 658 B.C., Greek emigrants from Megara established a colony at Byzantium, commanding an entrance to the Euxine, which grew into an important centre, and in after ages became Constantinople. The Dorians and other Greeks sailing along the Mediterranean westward and southward from their central home reached Sicily, Italy, Gaul (South France), and even Africa; planting in Sicily, Syracuse and Agrigentum, two of the most splendid cities of the ancient world; in the forked peninsula of Italy, cities such as Tarentum, Sybaris, Croton, Metapontum, Rhegium, Cumæ, and Neapolis (Naples), in which Greek civilization became so advanced and the colonists so numerous that Lower Italy was known as Græcia Magna or Great Greece; in the south of Gaul, Massilia (Marseilles), which for centuries was one of the most important commercial centres of the Mediterranean; and on the northern shore of Africa, between the Nile and Carthage, Cyrene, occupying a fine maritime situation which developed into a city rivalling the Phœnician capital in wealth and splendour.

The very name "Apoikia," by which these primitive communities were known, indicated their true character and origin. A Greek colony was not a mere plantation retaining its connection with the parent state from which its pioneers had emigrated; it was literally a going-away-from-home, a parting, a complete separation. These colonial groups went away from their old city-states, like swarms from old hives, to cluster in new hives, to cultivate new lands, to found new cities, to establish new centres of trade and commerce. Following, in their tiny ships, the ebbs and flows of the great tidal sea, they, for the most part, clung to its coastal regions. They explored what was to them a new world of strange waters, and here and there on the narrow fringes of the seaboard they made camps which grew into towns and bustling cities, pulsating with new life and new energy. The situations selected afforded convenient sites within communication, by sea, with their ancient seats, and at the same time they were accessible to an avenue of retreat from the invasions of barbarous hordes, should they emerge from the interior.

Greek colonization was not promoted by state-aid or state-patronage. It was in some instances prosecuted in spite of the opposition of Greek cities, from which the migrating swarms went forth. From small beginnings these insignificant groups, whilst preserving the laws, customs, and institutions of their mother-cities, which they regarded with respect and reverence, grew in power, influence, and importance, and became autonomous political communities. With one or two exceptions each of them enjoyed the unfettered right of self-government. Until they became subject to local despots, or were crushed by foreign conquest, the people of each colony exercised perfect freedom in the management of their own affairs; they appointed their own leaders and magistrates, and, even in their foreign relations, they were independent of their mother-city; they could declare war and make peace with her public enemies. In every respect, therefore, these small Greek societies were free and sovereign commonwealths, having the obligation to maintain that freedom and sovereignty against external attacks, by their own prowess and with their own resources. They owed no allegiance to any distant hereditary king, nor were they under subjection to any political state except their own. The mother-cities from which they had migrated regarded them as emancipated children over whom they exercised no direct authority or jurisdiction; guaranteed them favours and assistance in times of difficulty and danger, and expected nothing in return except filial respect and gratitude.

In the course of time some of these Greek colonies equalled if they did not surpass the mother-cities in wealth, population, art, philosophy and poetry, and in all the achievements of culture and civilized life. The only ties tending to draw them together in sympathy were those of common language, common religion and common blood; vital forces which seldom fail to yield tremendous results in the history of mankind. This community of sentiment led in some instances to something like a federal union between the original states and their colonial offshoots; such as the defensive league between Imperial Athens and the powerful Ionian cities of the Ægean sea and Asian shore, known as the Confederation of Delos.—Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, pp. 249, 252, 454. Conversations Lexicon, vol. VI., p. 768.

“The Greek colonist, citizen of a city, planted a city. Severed from his native city, severed perhaps by such a world of waters as that which parts Eubœia from Sicily or by such a wider world of waters as parts Phœakia from Gaul, he could no longer remain a citizen of his own city; he could no longer discharge the duties of citizenship on a distant spot; he could no longer join in the debates of the old agoré; he could no longer join in the worship of the old temple; but he must still have some agoré and some temple; he must still have a city to dwell in, a city in which still to dwell the life of a free Greek, when he could no longer live that life in the city of his birth. So he planted a city, a free city, a city that knew no lord, that knew no ruling city, a city furnished from the first with all that was needed for the life of a Greek commonwealth, a city free and independent from its birth. And he dwelled in the new city as he once dwelled in the old; he gave himself to make the new worthy of the old, the daughter worthy of the mother. But did he thereby deem that he had ceased to be a Greek? Did he deem that he had severed himself from Greece? Did he even deem that he had broken off from all duty and fellowship towards the city from whence he had set forth? No; dwell where he might, the Greek remained a Greek; wherever he went he carried Hellas with him; in Asia, in Libya, in Sicily, in Italy, in Gaul, far away by the pillars that guarded the mouth of Ocean, far away in the inmost recesses of the Inhospitable Sea, wherever he trod, a new Hellas, if we will, a Greater Hellas, sprang into being; on those new shores of Hellas he kept his old Hellenic heart, his old Hellenic fellowship; he still kept the tongue and customs of his folk; he clave to the gods of his folk; he could go to the old land and consult their oracles, he could claim his place in their sacred games, as freely as if he still dwelled by the banks of the Spartan Eurotas or under the shadow of the holy rock of Athens. And how fared he towards the city of his birth, the metropolis, the mother-city of his new home, the birthplace and cradle of himself and his fellow-citizens of his new city? Political tie none remained; no such tie could remain among a system of cities. Parent and child were on the political side necessarily parted; the colonist could exercise no political rights in the mother-city, nor did the mother-city put forward any claim to be lady and mistress of her distant daughter. Still the love, the reverence, due to a parent was never lacking. The tie of memory, the tie of kindred, the tie of religion, were themselves so strong that no tie of political allegiance was needed to make them stronger. The sacred fire on the hearth of the new city was kindled from the hearth of its mother; the parent was honoured with fitting honours, her gods were honoured with fitting offerings; her citizens were welcomed as elder brethren when they visited the younger city. And when the child itself became a parent, when the new city itself sent forth its colonies, the mother-city of all was prayed to share in the work and to send forth elder brethren of her own stock to be leaders in the enterprise of her children."—Freeman's Greater Greece and Greater Britain, pp. 26-29.

(2) ROMAN COLONIÆ.

ROMAN COLONIES.—The Roman system of colonization differed materially from the autonomous settlements of the Greeks. A "Colony," as its derivation from the Latin "Colonia" denotes, was originally a plantation of coloni, or farmers, under the protection of the central government; it was not an apoikia or a separate state.

Roman colonies were established by the Roman government as a matter of national policy, and for political and military considerations. In the early history of the Republic, as the Romans gradually subjugated the various Italian races with whom they came into contact, lands of the conquered people were divided among Roman citizens, who were distributed in groups under military protection.

When the Etruscans were finally vanquished, numerous military garrisons, which developed into colonies, were founded in various parts of Etruria. The national character of the surviving Etruscans was in that way gradually destroyed, and they were ultimately Romanised. Florentia, one of the towns of Etruria, thus became a leading Roman colony; its greatness under the name of Florence dates from the Middle Ages. So when the Samnites were finally conquered Samnium was laid waste and most of the inhabitants were sold into slavery; their places were supplied by Roman citizens clamouring for land. After the conquest of Cis-Alpine Gaul, Venetia became a Roman dominion; military stations were formed, and the land was divided among the victors, as in the case of Etruria and Samnium. When Trans-Alpine Gaul was brought under the Roman yoke it was divided into four provinces, in each of which was established a military colony. The name and identity of one of them, Lugdunum, situated at the confluence of the Rhone and Saone, still survives in the name of Lyons. Similarly the name and identity of another, Colonia Agrippina, on the Rhine, settled by the Emperor Claudian, is preserved in the modern city of Cologne.

For over three hundred years Britain, like Gaul, was subjected to the dominion of the Roman Empire. At the maturity of Roman occupation (304 A.D.) there were five divisions or provinces. Each of these provinces had a separate local ruler, subject to the Governor-General of Britain, who was appointed by the Emperor under the title of Prefect. This Prefect exercised all but sovereign authority, having supreme military and judicial power. Under the Prefect was a Procurator or Quæstor, who levied taxes and administered the revenue. The chief military and civil power of the Roman Government was centralised in about one hundred cities; the principal being London, Colchester, Bath, Gloucester, Chester, Lincoln, and Chesterfield. Most of these were built on lands which the Emperor had granted to the veterans of the conquering legions. The descendants of these warriors formed the greater part of the population of the cities. The ten largest cities enjoyed a special privilege, called the Jus Latii, an incomplete citizenship, which conferred on them the right to elect their own magistrates. The inferior ones, called Stipendiaries, were governed by officers under the Prefect's authority, and paid tribute to the Emperor.—Cassell's History of England, Vol. I., p. 19.

PART II.

MODERN COLONIZATION.

(1) IN AMERICA, AFRICA AND ASIA.

SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE COLONIES.—It was a great day in the world's history when Christopher Columbus, a Genoese pilot, set sail from Spain with a small fleet of three vessels bound on that memorable voyage which resulted in the discovery of America, and in the opening of new regions for the industrial activity and enterprise of civilized man. After years of endeavour he had convinced Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain that the realms of Indian wealth and treasure could be reached by sailing in the direction of the setting sun; that, the earth being round, the countries of the east could be attained by sailing to the west, so that communication could be established over the whole world across the sublime highway of the ocean. Bold mariner was he, indeed, in that age, when the lamp of science burnt dimly, to gaze across the wild waves of the Atlantic, and, beyond its primeval darkness, to see the light of promise with its glimmering rays leading on to modern civilization. How transported with delight he was when, after tossing about in strange seas for twenty-one days, without sight of land, he saw grass floating on the waves, and birds appeared on the western horizon as the gentle messengers of a harbour of safety. It was on the night of the 12th October, 1492, that Columbus from the deck of his vessel descried a dim light flickering across the waves; and at 2 o'clock in the morning a cannon shot from the Pinta announced that a sailor had discovered land.

That light was a spark that has since illuminated the whole world, and the cannon shot will be heard echoing through all time. To Christopher Columbus is due the immortal honour of having discovered the continent of America. He was the first of a long line of maritime pioneers and discoverers who lifted the curtain of the trackless deep—who ploughed their way from sea to sea, from ocean to ocean, from continent to continent, until the great work of circumnavigating the globe, so daringly begun, was duly accomplished.

The second great voyage which largely assisted to expand the dominion of European civilization was that performed six years after the discovery of America, by Vasco da Gama, a Portuguese navigator. To that distinguished man was entrusted the execution of the project of sailing from Portugal to India round the continent of Africa. It may seem strange that both the expedition of Columbus and that of Vasco da Gama were launched for the purpose of reaching India. But the fact is that the nearest and safest route to the riches of Cathay and the trade of India was, to the commercial nations of the southwest of Europe, a problem of vital importance; they wished to compete with Venice and Genoa, which long enjoyed the monopoly of that trade by way of eastern caravan routes. Hence it was that the Portuguese were endeavouring to explore the western coast of Africa, with a view to reaching India by passing round its most southern promontory, many years before Columbus conceived the daring idea of sailing westward to India, in essaying which he was stopped by the Isthmus of Panama.

The Cape of Good Hope was discovered by Bartholomew Diaz in 1486. It was doubled by Vasco da Gama's fleet in November, 1497, and subsequently he arrived at Calicut, on the Malabar coast of India, the goal of his enterprise, where he established a trading station which marked the beginning of the European conquest of India. In comparing the achievements of Columbus and Da Gama as pioneers of oceanic exploration, it may be noted that whilst Columbus crossed a wild waste of waters, upon which man had never previously ventured, Da Gama, in circumnavigating Africa, followed the track of Pharaoh Necho, an Egyptian king, whose ships had sailed round Africa more than 2,000 years before. But, for supreme grandeur, no exploit in the history of the human race is equal to the voyage of Fernando Magellan, a Portuguese mariner, who inaugurated an expedition which first sailed round the world, demonstrating beyond all doubt the rotundity of our planet, and leading the way to the discovery of new islands and a new continent in the Southern Hemisphere. In September of the year 1519 Magellan was entrusted by Charles V. of Spain with the command of a fleet of five ships fitted out for the purpose of exploring the southern seas. Magellan succeeded in discovering the famous straits which bear his name, running between the southern headland of South America and Terra-del-Fuego; thence he passed into the broad expanse of the Pacific Ocean, to which he gave its present name. Continuing his voyage, he sailed on, and on, month after month, undergoing privations and encountering perils, until at last, in the year 1521, he arrived at the Philippine Islands, north of Australia, where he was killed in a skirmish with the natives. His vessel, conveying his records, charts and observations, was brought back to Spain by way of the Cape of Good Hope. The circumnavigation of the globe was thus completed after a three years' voyage of unparalleled difficulty and danger; the saddest event of the expedition being the loss of its intrepid commander before he had seen the accomplishment of his world-wide enterprise. It must be admitted that this voyage was the most triumphant in the whole record of navigation, ancient or modern. It was Magellan who burst through the gates of the American continent; it was he who first navigated the majestic Pacific, with its numerous islands and its mighty highway from America to the Indian Ocean, preparing the way for much that was to follow in the fulness of time. Well has Dr. Draper written of Magellan—"He impressed his name on earth and sky; on the straits connecting two oceans, and on clouds of starry worlds seen in the southern sky."—The Intellectual Development of Europe, Vol. II., p. 169.

PIONEERS OF MODERN COLONIZATION.—Christopher Columbus, Vasco da Gama and Fernando Magellan were the first great pioneers of modern colonization to whom reference must necessarily be made in any account of the beginning and expansion of England's empire beyond the seas ; for, although their expeditions and discoveries were conducted in the interests and at the expense and direction of Spain and Portugal, the time came when England obtained possession of most of the countries which they added to the inheritance of civilized man. They prepared the way for Sir Francis Drake's circumnavigation of the earth in 1578, and for James Cook's voyage in 1769-70. The nation and the generation who sow the seed of progress do not always gather in the harvest, but sooner or later the human race, as a whole, enjoys and profits by what has been planted "with the blood and tears of a few." So it was in the case of those renowned navigators. Where now is the colonial empire of Spain ? Nothing remains ; her provinces were lost in the hurricane of revolution and conquest. Where is now the colonial empire of Portugal ? Not an island of any consequence remains to speak of departed fame.

To England fell the greatest and richest share of the glorious result of those three great voyages which "broke the night of ages ;" which ushered in modern times with all their bustling activity ; which directed the course of civilization from the east to the west—from rivers such as the Nile, the Tiber, the Euphrates, the Danube and the Rhine, and from inland seas, such as the Black, the Baltic and the Mediterranean, to the broad Atlantic and the far-reaching stretches of the Pacific Ocean. From that time the nations of the Mediterranean were destined no longer to monopolize the commerce of the world. Egypt ceased to be the avenue to India ; Europe was startled by the intelligence brought in quick succession from the new world, and an impetus of an unprecedented character was given to the spirit of adventure and discovery. Then began the mighty race for slices of the new world. England, of the sixteenth century, was not behindhand ; she now began to lead the vanguard of nations in that grand struggle. See Seeley's "Growth of British Policy."

In many respects the English at that time were peculiarly qualified for the work to be done. For over a thousand years the people of the island had been going through various stages of preparation and apprenticeship calculated to fit them for the arts of navigation and colonization. In the first place, England itself had been for many centuries a colony belonging to different and successive nations. The Phœnicians, the Romans, the Danes, the Saxons and the Normans, had, in successive periods, planted colonies in British soil, which left enduring traces in the country and in the character of the inhabitants. Then, again, the main element of the amalgamated population of Britain was composed of a sea-faring people, having habits and instincts which attached them to the sea and its associations. Under these circumstances it is hardly surprising to see the English come to the front in this remarkable epoch of geographical discovery and maritime enterprise.

NORTH AMERICAN DISCOVERIES.—Four years after Columbus had discovered America, and whilst Vasco da Gama was preparing to circumnavigate Africa, John Cabot, a Venetian pilot, with his son, Sebastian, a native of Bristol, obtained from King Henry VII. letters patent authorizing them to proceed on a voyage of exploration towards the north-west, in order, if possible, to find, conquer and settle unknown lands for the English crown. The King supplied one ship, and the merchants of Bristol and London placed a few smaller ones at their disposal, and with this meagre fleet the Cabots, father and son, sailed forth on their dangerous enterprise. The result of this and succeeding voyages made by John and Sebastian Cabot were most momentous; they laid the foundation of England's trans-Atlantic colonial empire. In June, 1497, they reached the coast of Newfoundland, or, as some think, of Labrador. Afterwards they sailed southwards along the eastern coast of the American continent as far as Cape Florida, near the Gulf of Mexico. They were the first Europeans who sighted and surveyed the coastline of the vast territory which was subsequently occupied by the thirteen original colonies, and which now belongs to the United States Republic. The discoveries of the Cabots gave England an international claim to the whole of North America, and that claim, although allowed to remain dormant for nearly a century, was eventually asserted in an emphatic and practical manner.

The Spanish devoted their energies and resources to the conquest of Central America, and a part of South America, together with the adjacent islands known as the West Indies, whilst the Portuguese took possession of Brazil; but neither of these nations explored or asserted a right to North America. Whilst the Spaniards and Portuguese were plundering and enslaving the defenceless natives of the south, committing unspeakable outrages, and spreading unutterable ruin wherever the lust of gold induced them to extend their devastating sway, the English by slow and cautious steps explored the apparently poor and inhospitable coast of North America. Many disasters and failures delayed the work of settlement. For many years after the Cabots, expeditions were sent across the Atlantic by English enterprise, for the purpose of finding what Columbus failed to discover—a north-west passage to India. At last these attempts were for the time given up; the route of Vasco da Gama round the Cape of Good Hope was resorted to, and trading factories were established on the shores of the Indian Peninsula, which were the feeble beginnings of our Indian empire.

FIRST ENGLISH COLONIES IN AMERICA.—After John and Sebastian Cabot, Sir Humphrey Gilbert and Sir Walter Raleigh were two of the most famous pioneers of English colonization in North America. Sir Humphrey Gilbert, an English navigator and maritime discoverer, obtained from Queen Elizabeth, in 1578, a patent empowering him to discover and colonize any unsettled lands which he might reach. This was the first charter granted by an English monarch to found colonies. Two expressions from this remarkable instrument may be quoted: He was to take possession of "all remote and barbarous lands" and to govern them, subject to the proviso that "all who settled there should have and enjoy all the privileges of free citizens and natives of England." In his first voyage, in pursuance of this authority, he sailed for Newfoundland, but returned home unsuccessful. He sailed again in 1583, landed on the shores of Newfoundland, took possession of the harbour of St. Johns, and shortly afterwards lost his life in a storm whilst exploring the coast. In 1585 Sir Walter Raleigh, one of the most brilliant figures in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, promulgated a scheme for the settlement of those parts of North America not appropriated by Christian powers. Through his great influence with the Queen he obtained an extensive patent for that purpose, and by the assistance of wealthy friends and relatives two ships were fitted out for the expedition. It is interesting to observe that one of the clauses of Raleigh's first patent, like that of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, provided that the English subjects who accompanied him should have a guarantee of the "continuance and enjoyment of all the rights which they enjoyed at home." It was a maxim of the common law that, if an uninhabited country were discovered and peopled by English subjects, they were supposed to possess themselves of it for the benefit of their sovereign, and that such of the laws of England as were applicable and necessary to their situation and the conditions of an infant colony were immediately in force; that wherever an Englishman went he carried with him as much of English law and liberty as the nature of his circumstances required.—Petersdorff's Abridgment, vol. V., p. 540. Thus early was it recognised that Englishmen carried their political birthright with them over the broad surface of the earth; that the charters of freedom for which their ancestors fought were not left behind, but accompanied them to their new homes beyond the sea. This was the fundamental principle of English colonization, and it presents a marked contrast to the colonizing systems of Spain, Portugal and France.

In this expedition Sir Walter Raleigh founded a settlement on Roanoke Island, in what is now North Carolina. A few years previously a party of French Huguenots had settled at Port Royal, in what is now South Carolina, and had built a fort which they called "Arx Carolina" in honour of Charles IX. of France. They had, however, been murdered by the Spaniards from the adjoining territory of Florida. Raleigh's settlement was not successful and was soon broken up. His vessels brought to England some natural productions which proved the great value of the resources of the country, and another expedition was sent out under the command of Sir Richard Grenville, a kinsman of Sir Walter Raleigh. This was more successful, and resulted in the foundation of the colony of Virginia, so named in honour of the Virgin Queen Elizabeth. It was the first and greatest of the thirteen colonies established under the protection of the English flag. It is said that to Sir Walter Raleigh's expedition is due the introduction of the potato and tobacco plant into Europe. In these early attempts at colonization failure and success were blended together, and it was not until about the year 1606, in the reign of James I., that anything like safe and permanent settlement was effected in these strange and distant regions.

England's struggle with Spain had been long and deadly, but it ended with the defeat of the Spanish Armada in the year 1588. England became mistress of the sea, having only the Dutch as powerful rivals; and thus there were no longer serious dangers in the way of maritime discovery and adventure.

The reign of the Stuarts, disastrous as it was to themselves, prolific as it was in civil war and revolution at home, was above all things distinguished by the growth and expansion of England's first colonial empire in North America. Herein can be seen the vitality and energy of the people of whom we are the descendants, and whose political birthright we now enjoy with the fullest measure of freedom. During the tyrannical government of Charles I., the disorder and uncertainty of the Commonwealth under Cromwell, and the persecution and proscription of the Restoration under Charles II., thousands of Englishmen and Englishwomen fled from their land to seek for liberty and safety in the wilds of North America, and these were the pioneers of that great development of emigration and colonization which paved the way for the establishment of a greater Britain in the new world. And here one general remark must be made as to the character of these momentous movements to which is mainly owing the stability and success of the early colonies of America. These colonies were founded by private enterprise, not with the assistance, but only with the official sanction of the Crown. This will be best understood by a brief reference to examples.

In the year 1606, the year in which Torres passed through the straits, which now bear his name, and sighted the Australian coast, two companies were formed for the purpose of colonizing America—the London Company and the Plymouth Company. To the London Company was assigned by King James I. South Virginia, which extended from Cape Fear to the Potomac River; to the Plymouth Company was granted North Virginia, which extended from the Hudson River to Newfoundland. The country between the Hudson and Potomac was declared neutral territory. This division of Virginia, North and South, included nearly the whole of the eastern fringe of North America, but that divisional nomenclature was not long maintained. The London Company was the first in the field, and began the work of colonization in a practical manner, though at first with limited success. It was followed by the Plymouth Company, which also proceeded to distribute grants of land to actual settlers. The title of each of these companies was a charter from the Crown. The charter of the London Company contained provision for the creation of governing councils; one in London, appointed by the King, having power to appoint a colonial council, endowed with the absolute power of Government. The soil was vested in the Company by grant from the Crown. There was no mention made of representative assemblies in either charter, but each contained a clause somewhat similar to that of Raleigh's first patent, to the effect that "all British subjects who shall go and inhabit within the said colony and plantation, and their children and posterity, which shall happen to be born within the limit thereof, shall have and enjoy all the liberties, franchises, and immunities of free denizens and natural subjects within any of our dominions, to all intents and purposes, as if they had been abiding and born within their own realms of England or in any of our other dominions." This contained the germ from which afterwards sprang the system of representative self-government in the American colonies. In none of the charters, with the exception of that of Jamaica, to which allusion will presently be made, was there an express grant of representative government, but the right was asserted as inherent to and necessarily a part of those liberties, franchises, and immunities granted in the charters.

In 1607 Thomas Gates and Company sent out, under the leadership of Christopher Newport, three ships containing 105 emigrants, who were landed at Chesapeake Bay; and on the 13th May of that year the Commonwealth of Virginia was established by the building of Jamestown on the James River, which was so named in honour of the King. This party consisted of gentlemen of fortune, labourers, and other persons of no occupation, and without families, who were picked up in London. The friendly Indians sold them land and provisions, and they struggled along, clearing the wilderness and attempting to cultivate the soil. Owing to misgovernment and internal dissensions the infant colony was several times on the verge of starvation and dissolution. In 1609 the London Company superseded Gates' Company in the management of the colony and sent out Captain John Smith, who by his prudence and good counsel saved the struggling community from destruction. It was next reinforced by fresh arrivals from England under the direction of Lord Delaware. By this time the permanent establishment of the new settlement was assured. Gradually a liberal element began to prevail in the management of the London Company, and in 1619 the first representative assembly came into existence. In the quaint language of an old chronicle, "a House of Burgesses broke out in that year." The charter of James I. contained no provision for the creation of such an institution as "a House of Burgesses;" nevertheless that House was legally acknowledged by the Government of the mother country as being in strict accordance with the principles of Sir Walter Raleigh's patent, and with the general scope of the clause of the Company's charter.

In the same year which saw the forerunner and type of all American assemblies, convicts were sent out to the colonies from England, and negro slaves were introduced by the Dutch. The element of convictism and slavery did not spread to any very large extent in the early history of America, but they afterwards became the plague spot of England's colonial empire. The practice of negro slavery and the transportation of convicts was first introduced by the Portuguese and the Spaniards. And the system was too readily followed by other nations.

In 1624, the London Company surrendered its charter to the Crown, but the House of Burgesses elected by the people survived the surrender of the charter, and maintained the power of legislation and taxation, subject to the veto of the Governor. We have referred to the preliminary history of Virginia at some length, because it was the earliest settled, and the largest, richest, and most populous of all the original thirteen states. It was affectionately called the "old Dominion," and also the "mother of Presidents," because four out of five Presidents who ruled the Republic up to the year 1824 were natives of Virginia. It was the birthplace of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Richard Henry Lee, and Patrick Henry, who became the leaders of the revolution.

Before passing from Virginia, reference should be made to four other colonies adjacent to it which were carved out of the original grant of territory to the London Company. In 1623, Sir George Calvert, afterwards the first Lord Baltimore, received a grant of land forming part of Virginia from Charles I. for the purpose of forming a proprietary colony. It was called Maryland by way of compliment to Queen Henrietta Maria. The first Lord Baltimore died before the letters patent were sealed, but the second Lord Baltimore carried out the scheme in 1632. The Baltimores were Roman Catholics, and Maryland was settled by Catholic gentry and others belonging to that Church, who were driven from England during the fierce persecutions of these times. Maryland became the "land of sanctuary," and claimed the proud distinction of being a refuge for the toleration of all religious denominations. Its form of administration was by a Governor having a patent right to veto acts of the legislature, which consisted of an Upper House nominated by him, and a Lower House elected by the people. The colony, according to the patent, belonged to the proprietors, who nominated an administrative council and granted governmental privileges, for which they received certain consideration.

In 1662 the southern part of Virginia was granted as a proprietary colony to Lord Clarendon and others by Charles II. under the name of "Carolina." Its early population consisted for the most part of emigrants from Virginia. The young colony obtained a representative assembly in 1667, but its form of government was similar to that of the proprietary colony of Maryland. However, in 1717 the proprietors surrendered their patent to the Crown, and Carolina became a royal colony by purchase. In 1729, Carolina was divided into two separate and independent districts, North and South Carolina, which afterwards became two of the most important states of the union.

Georgia, which was organised into a colony in 1732, was the fifth distinct settlement carved out of the Virginia foundation.

Passing now to the northern group of colonies which were formed out of the territory assigned to the Plymouth Company, we find a record of progress and cultivation of the soil proceeding in the teeth of trials and obstacles as extraordinary as those experienced in the history of Virginia and its offshoots in the south. Under the direction and with the license of the Plymouth Company, a settlement was, during the year 1620, formed at Massachusetts Bay by the famous and heroic "Pilgrim Fathers," who were compelled to leave England on account of the persecution to which they were subjected for their non-conformity to the Church of England. They sailed from Southampton for America to the number of 102 persons, in the Mayflower, a little vessel of 160 tons burden, and landed on 21st December, 1620, at a place which they named New Plymouth, where they long had a desperate struggle for existence owing to the coldness of the climate, the poverty of their circumstances, and attacks by the Indians. They were afterwards joined by a society of Puritans, who also sought refuge there from the ecclesiastical policy of Charles I. Massachusetts became the centre and leader of four important colonies which in a few years sprang into existence in the North, between the Hudson River and Newfoundland. They were known as the New England Colonies, New England being the designation applied to the whole of that region by Captain John Smith, who explored the coast in the year 1614.

Settlers went to the south of Massachusetts, and formed the colonies of Connecticut and Rhode Island, which received separate charters from the Crown. A fishing village to the north of Massachusetts, established under a grant of land to one John Mason, became the nucleus of the colony of New Hampshire.

Such were the four important plantations formed out of New England, the territory of the Plymouth Company. The Plymouth Company finally surrendered its charter, and Massachusetts received an independent charter from Charles I. in 1629, whilst Connecticut and Rhode Island received separate charters from Charles II. in 1662. These were the famous New England colonies, in which there was a larger measure of political freedom and local self-government than in any of the North American plantations. They were chartered colonies, in which the sovereign parted with his rights and prerogatives either wholly or in part to the settlers, who elected their own representative assemblies, having the power of legislation without appeal to the Crown, there being no royal governor or royal agent within the colonies. They elected their own governors, as well as their Parliamentary representatives in the Upper and Lower Houses. The Home Government did not interfere with them in any way. They were, in fact, simple democracies, if not veritable republics, the highest achievement in the way of political organisation, and the nearest approach to independent states attained by any of the thirteen colonies before the revolution. The only terms and conditions under which these colonies held their charters of colonization were, first, allegiance to the Crown, and, secondly, that one-fifth of the gold and silver found within their jurisdiction should be paid to the King. In the year 1665, only 40 years after the foundation of Massachusetts, and 100 years before the Declaration of Independence, we find the people of that settlement asserting that they did not regard themselves as subject to England, and maintaining that as long as they paid one-fifth of all the gold and silver according to the terms of their charter "they were not obliged to the king, but by civility." These advanced ideas of colonial independence and autonomy received a startling development and a determined assertion during the subsequent conflict with England, for it was in Massachusetts that the battles of Lexington and Bunker's Hill were fought.

We have now referred to two groups of colonies, that of Virginia and that of Massachusetts, which are described as the original foundations of British colonization in North America. There remains a third group, which grew up in the neutral zone between the Potomac and the Hudson rivers, between Virginia and New England. Whilst settlement was proceeding in the vast country to the north and the south, this central territory was explored by the Dutch, who established a trading station at Manhattan, the site of the present city of New York. The Dutch Government assigned this locality to the Dutch West India Company. It was named New Netherlands, and the town which sprang into existence at the mouth of the Hudson, a river discovered by Henry Hudson, an Englishman in the service of the Dutch, was called New Amsterdam. The Dutch, however, had a very precarious title and tenure of this country, and they were soon cleared out of North America. After the restoration of Charles II. in 1660, England and Holland went to war, and a fatal blow was struck at the colonial possessions of the Dutch. An English fleet under Colonel Nichols proceeded to New Amsterdam and conquered it, driving out the Dutch, and converting it into an English settlement. It was granted as a proprietary colony by Charles II. to his brother, the Duke of York, after whom it received the name of New York. The Duke granted a part of the territory of New York to Lord John Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, who formed out of it the colony of New Jersey.

In 1681, the square tract of country to the west of New Jersey was granted by Charles II. to William Penn, the celebrated English Quaker and philanthropist, in satisfaction of a monetary claim against the Crown. Here arose another proprietary colony under the never-to-be-forgotten name of Pennsylvania. Penn had been unjustly persecuted for his religious faith; and his great desire was to establish a home for himself and his co-religionists in the distant wilderness of the west where they might enjoy religious and political liberty; where they might preach and practice according to their convictions in peace and quietness. Penn planned and named the great city of Philadelphia, and framed a liberal constitution for the young settlement, which became what Maryland was to the Catholics, and New England to the Puritans—a refuge and a sanctuary for the persecuted brethren, hunted out of their native land. Penn also purchased from the Duke of York a small strip of New York territory which was added to Pennsylvania until the revolution, when it was erected into a separate State called Delaware.

CLASSIFICATION OF THE ORIGINAL COLONIES.—Having sketched the thirteen original provinces of North America we are now in a position to consider generally their peculiar distribution and classification. First, as regards their location; the southern group consisted of five—Virginia, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia; the northern group consisted of four—Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Connecticut and Rhode Island; the central group consisted of four—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Delaware.

The political constitutions, or forms of government of these colonies comprised three classes. First came the royalist colony of Virginia, which was always subject to the influence of the Crown more than in any other; even from the first, when the Executive Government was vested in a prerogative-created Council. Virginia became a thoroughly royalist colony in 1620, when the London Company decided to surrender its charter to the Crown. So New York, which began as a proprietary colony, was converted into a royalist colony when its proprietor, the Duke of York, became King as James II. Virginia may be regarded as the type and model of modern colonies, in which representative and responsible government is the prevailing system, with a Governor appointed by the Crown as the agent of the sovereign to watch imperial interests.

The proprietary colonies were Maryland, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Carolina, New Jersey, Georgia, and, in its early career, New York. In this class of colonies the soil was granted to and vested in certain proprietors or companies, who exercised the governmental powers which, in royalist colonies, were enjoyed by the king; they appointed administrative Councils to conduct public business; and sometimes they nominated their Governors, who had by charter the right of veto on the legislation of the colonial assemblies. This plan of colonization, which may be compared to that adopted by the East India Company, was found not to work satisfactorily as the population increased, and as conflicts between private and public interests arose. In time the proprietors became tired of continual quarrels and dissensions with the colonists, and one by one they either surrendered or lost their charters, until by degrees all the colonies assumed the royalist form of government, with the exception of two.

The chartered colonies were Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island, in which, by their original title deeds from the Crown, the people had the right of choosing their own Governors, their own magistrates, and their own representatives, to make, interpret, and administer their own laws. They could repeal and abrogate the common law of England, except the general law of allegiance and dependence, without the danger of a veto by the Home Government. They could also repeal and abrogate the statute law of England, except such Acts as were expressly applicable to the whole empire. Massachusetts, however, lost its charter in consequence of proceedings taken against it in England by Charles II. After that it became a quasi-royalist colony. At the time of the revolution in 1770, Connecticut and Rhode Island were the only chartered colonies. It may be observed that the chartered colonies had a much larger instalment of constitutional liberty and local independence than any existing dependency of the British Crown.

Speaking generally of this survey of the political organization of the early North-American settlements, it is to be remarked that in their matured history they had local autonomy, self-government, self-taxation, and political equality, and that there was no State Church and no official aristocracy to become an incubus or a source of strife and bitterness. The transplanted institutions and franchises of the old country took root and flourished in the new country under the guidance and protection of bold and hardy bands of pioneers, who laid the foundations of a mighty Anglo-Saxon empire along the coast of the Atlantic. They carried with them the traditions and charters of their ancestors; Magna Charta, the Petition of Rights and the Bill of Rights formed a part of their political inheritance as much as those muniments of title were the birthright of those of their fellow countrymen whom they left behind them.

We are now in a position to notice the truth and importance of the statement with which this account of the American colonies was introduced. They were established not by Government agency, assistance or direction, but by private adventurers, who left their native land in search of that freedom denied them at home. The Anglican Cavaliers of Virginia, the Puritans of New England, the Quakers of Pennsylvania and the Catholics of Maryland emigrated from the land of their forefathers, and fought their way in the waste wilderness of the new world in order that they might escape political proscription and religious persecution; that they might establish hearths, homes and hamlets where they would be far away from tyranny, spoliation and martyrdom. In other words, these colonies were places of refuge from the fierce political and ecclesiastical domination which prevailed in England in the seventeenth century, during the reigns of James I. and Charles I., the Protectorate, and the Restoration under Charles II. and James II.

WEST INDIAN COLONIES.—Leaving the thirteen provinces of the mainland, let us now glance at the progress of English colonization in other parts of the globe during the later half of the seventeenth century. Barbadoes is the oldest discovered British colony in the West Indies. It was taken possession of in 1605, when a party of roving Englishmen planted a cross on the island, and inscribed the words "James, King of England;" but no actual settlement was effected on it until 1624, when a patent for the island was granted to the Earl of Carlisle, as sole proprietor. A large number of royalists emigrated to Barbadoes during the civil war between Charles I. and his Parliament, and it became a prosperous and populous sugar-producing colony. Bermuda, another of the earliest West India plantations, was colonized from Virginia and England shortly after 1609. Jamaica, the largest and wealthiest of our West Indian possessions, was taken from the Dutch by an expedition sent out by Oliver Cromwell during his protectorate in the year 1655. Charles II., after the restoration of 1660, sent a Governor to Jamaica, and provided for the creation of an elective Council to legislate for the colony. This has been described as the first representative colonial Constitution granted by the Crown of England to any of its possessions and plantations abroad; for it will be remembered that there was no express grant of elective assemblies by the Crown to any of the American colonies. In the eighteenth century Jamaica became the greatest sugar-producing country in the world, but it afterwards declined through the exhaustion of the soil and the competition of new sugar countries.

CANADIAN COLONIES.—Glancing northward of the New England colonies, we come to Newfoundland, which was discovered by Cabot in 1497; but England had a very doubtful title and precarious possession of that territory up to the end of the sixteenth century, as it was claimed by powerful and persistent French rivals. Newfoundland was not permanently settled by English emigrants until 1624, fourteen years after the planting of Bermuda. Though it was not that part of the American soil which was first settled from England, Newfoundland claims to be the earliest of existing British colonies from the fact that it was first discovered; and in the Colonial Conference held in London, in 1887, the representatives of Newfoundland were held entitled to the precedence attached to seniority.

At the time when Newfoundland was first colonized, Nova Scotia,

New Brunswick and Canada belonged to France by priority of occupation. Although the coast of Canada was discovered by Sebastian Cabot in 1497, its interior was not explored by Europeans until 1541, when Jacques Cartier, a French navigator, sailed up that great arm of the sea which penetrates into the lake country, to which he gave the name of the River St. Lawrence. Jacques Cartier founded the first settlement at St. Croix's Harbour, but little progress was made for nearly 100 years. In 1603, Samuel Champlain, a French naval officer and marine explorer, was commissioned to initiate colonizing establishments in the New World, and he is justly celebrated as the pioneer of French exploration in North America. In his first voyage Champlain ascended the St. Lawrence to the part where Jacques Cartier had been stopped. In his second voyage he visited the coast of Nova Scotia. In his third expedition, in 1608, he fixed the site of the town of Quebec on the heights of Abraham, overlooking the St. Lawrence, and he also ventured as far as Lake Ontario and Lake Champlain, to which he gave his name. Quebec was founded and French settlement began in Canada a few years before the voyage of the Mayflower. The French possessions were gradually extended westward and southward from the St. Lawrence to the Mississippi, and down that river to its mouth. The whole of the country at the back or westward of the thirteen states of America, the Hinterland, including the valley of Ohio and all Canada, was in the beginning of the eighteenth century claimed by France, which contended that the Alleghanies were the western limits of the British dominions.

BRITISH POSSESSIONS IN INDIA.—Before proceeding to show how France lost that vast colonial empire, we may draw attention to the march of British influence and the planting of British trading stations in Africa and Asia. After many fruitless attempts to find a north-west passage to East India, English merchants, traders and adventurers adopted the route discovered by Vasco da Gama, and sent their vessels to India by the Cape of Good Hope. In 1585, Queen Elizabeth granted a patent to a company to trade to Gambia, on the West Coast of Africa, but no settlement of any consequence was effected in that region until 1625. In its subsequent history Gambia became a notorious centre of the slave trade.

In December, 1600, Queen Elizabeth granted a charter to a company formed for the purpose of carrying on a trade with countries beyond the Cape and the Straits of Magellan. This company, which was the beginning of the famous East India Company, established a few trading factories in India, but their commerce was for many years very meagre. By the end of the eighteenth century the progress of the East India Company in the Peninsula of Hindostan had not advanced beyond the factory stage. The Company were simply leaseholders under the great Indian Princes, by whose leave they established trading stations in various localities along the sea coast. In the struggle for commercial ascendancy the East Indian Company had to contend with powerful rivalry from the French and the Dutch. But the Company, which was incorporated by Royal Charter and vested with sovereign powers by the Crown, ultimately became master of the whole of India. The history of its struggles and final triumph in laying the foundation of the British Empire in India is one of the most romantic and extraordinary in the whole record of colonization and conquest. These momentous events must be briefly summarised.

Madras, the present capital of the presidency of that name, situated on the Coromandel (south-east) coast, was founded in 1639 by the Company, who obtained from the Rajah of Chandgerry a grant of a piece of land for the erection of a town and fort. Fort St. George, built in this district, was the first place where the British obtained a permanent footing. Madras soon grew into a flourishing city and became the central station of the Company along the Coromandel Coast.

Bombay is, next to Madras, the oldest British possession in India. It was granted to the Portuguese by an Indian chief in 1530, ceded by Portugal to England in 1661, and transferred to the East Indian Company by King Charles II. in 1668.

The first factory established by the Company in Bengal was built on the Hoogly in 1664. The Company's representative, Job Charnock, was driven thence in 1686, and in 1690 he founded another settlement on the Hoogly, which expanded into the town of Calcutta. The site of the settlement was granted to the Company by the Nabob of Bengal, and the grant was confirmed by the Emperor Aurengzebe, the last of the Moguls. Fort William was built at Calcutta in 1699, and it was so named after William III.

Such were the early and humble beginnings of the British East India Company. After the death of Aurengzebe, in 1707, the native princes who owed feudal allegiance to the Mogul Empire began to quarrel among themselves, and the French and English interfered to quell the disturbances. It was then evident that the political organization of India was thoroughly rotten, and that only a strong arm was required to conquer and possess the whole country, and reduce the native princes to subjection. Then began the great contest between the French and British in India for the ascendancy and empire. At first the French maintained their superiority, but in the end they were defeated and driven out of India by the Company's forces, and the victory of Lord Clive at the Battle of Plassy on 26th June, 1756, established the exclusive sovereignty and supremacy of the British in India.

SOUTH AFRICAN COLONIES.—The Cape of Good Hope was first discovered in modern times by Bartholomew Diaz in the year 1486-7. The heavy seas which rolled along the coast prevented him from landing, and hence he named it the "Cabo doz tormentos," the "Cape of Storms," but King John II. of Portugal altered the name to "Cabo da Bona Esperanza," the Cape of Good Hope. Vasco da Gama doubled the Cape a few years afterwards on his voyage to India. The Portuguese, however, never formed any permanent establishment there. The Dutch took possession of it in 1650, and it became a powerful station for them in their journeys to and from their trading factories in India and Batavia. It was captured by the British in 1795, was restored to Holland at the Peace of Amiens in 1802, and was again captured in 1806. At the Congress of Vienna, in August, 1814, the Dutch colonies at the Cape of Good Hope, and in South America, were ceded by the Netherlands Government to Great Britain, six millions sterling being paid as part consideration for the transfer. On 11th March, 1853, Cape Colony was granted a Representative Legislature, composed of two elective chambers, followed in 1872 by the concession of Responsible Government. Between 1861 and 1870, British Kaffraria was added to the colony, and in 1880 Fingoland and Griqualand West were similarly incorporated. In 1894 and 1895, West Pondoland and British Bechuanaland became part of the same growing Dominion. Dutch farmers or Boers, who left the colony shortly after 1835, established the Republics known as the Orange Free State and the Transvaal.

In May, 1843, Natal, where the Boers were prevented from forming a republic, was proclaimed a British settlement and remained a part of Cape Colony until 1856, when it became a separate colony under a Royal Charter, authorized by statute, with a Governor and a Legislative Council partly elective and partly nominated. In 1893, a new Constitution, embodying a bi-cameral legislature and accompanied by Responsible Government, was granted. In 1897, Zululand was made a province of Natal.

Through the enterprising operations of the British South Africa Company, led by Mr. Cecil Rhodes, the vast regions south of the Zambesi, known as Southern Rhodesia, formerly Mashonaland and Matabeleland, and north of the Zambesi known as Northern Rhodesia, including Nyassaland, have been, since 1888, added to the Empire. They are destined in course of time to be partitioned into a group of self-governing colonies.

CONQUEST OF CANADA.—From this survey of the progress of the British flag in Asia and Africa, we return to our review of the march of events in the New World during the eighteenth century. The Seven Years War with France, which terminated in the Peace of Paris, 1762, left Great Britain the first State in the world, with the equivocal reputation of the "Tyrant of the Seas." It was in this war that she completely established her supremacy on the ocean, which she first began to assert upon the defeat of the Spanish Armada. It was in this war, so vigorously prosecuted by the first William Pitt, afterwards Lord Chatham, that England obtained possession of the whole of North America, and drove the French out of Canada as they had been driven out of India. The story of the invasion of Quebec by a British expedition sent up the St. Lawrence under the command of General Wolfe, the scaling of the Heights of Abraham by our troops in the dead of night, the fierce battle which followed on the plateau, the gallant defence of the French under General Montcalm, the victory of the attacking party, and the death of both noble and heroic commanders in the midst of the fight, is one of the most thrilling in the whole range of naval and military history. This event was followed by the surrender of all Canada to the British, and the French power in that quarter of the globe was thus absolutely annihilated. But France had her revenge on Great Britain at a later date, when she assisted the American colonies in their revolt against the mother country.

LOSS OF THE AMERICAN COLONIES.—To those colonies we must now once more refer, and see how it came about that Britain lost the brightest jewel in the crown of a thousand years. During the first half of the eighteenth century the American colonies along the eastern coast of what is now the territory of the United States made enormous progress in settlement and internal prosperity. Neglected and uncared for in the early years of struggle, they sprang into importance and commanded attention from the people and government of England when their trade increased and their resources were developed. Whilst they enjoyed the amplest measure of local autonomy and local self-government, there was one serious exception and limitation to their legislative power. The Home Government claimed the right of regulating their external trade and commerce. Their export and import trade was watched with jealousy, and hedged about with hampering restrictions. They could not amend or repeal the slightest fiscal regulations, however obnoxious or oppressive. Apart from this, they had absolute freedom and independence; but in matters of trade, the British Parliament asserted its supremacy. The Navigation Laws passed during the Commonwealth under Cromwell, and mainly directed against the Dutch, with a view to ruin Dutch commerce, and the Dutch mercantile marine, were the basis of the colonial policy which subsequently pressed so heavily on the colonies. The main provisions of these laws were that no commodities of Asia, Africa, or America could be imported into Great Britain or her colonies except in British ships. This restricted the markets of the colonies, as they could not trade directly with other nations. On the other hand, Great Britain imposed high protective duties on the goods of foreign countries in favour of her colonies. Then there was a restriction on the manufacture of their raw products by the colonies and on the direct importation of the goods of foreign countries. This constituted what is called the old "colonial system," which was at the root of the quarrel and the war which led to American separation.

We are now brought down to the reign of George III., a period well described as "the most eventful in the history of the human race," marked by two thrilling tragedies—the War of American Independence and the French Revolution. It was in the year 1764, that George Grenville, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, nicknamed "The Gentle Shepherd," induced the House of Commons to take the fatal step of attempting to draw a revenue from America by the taxation of the colonies. By the Stamp Act, 5 Geo. III. c. 12, he secured the imposition of duties on certain commodities imported into America from other European colonies, and also stamp duties similar to those contained in our own Stamp Acts. This was a violation of the fundamental principle of Constitutional Government—that there should be "no taxation without representation."

The news was received in America with indignation, and with a stern determination to resist. Virginia took the lead in organizing confederate resistance. In the House of Burgesses at Williamsburg, Patrick Henry spoke against the Stamp Act with burning eloquence. "Cæsar had his Brutus," he cried, "Charles I. had his Oliver Cromwell, and George III.—" "Treason! Treason!" interposed the Speaker. "And George III. may profit by their example," replied Patrick Henry. "The torch of confederate opposition was carried through every colony like a fiery cross."—Cassell's History of England, vol. V., pp. 58-71.

In October, 1765, the first Congress of Delegates was held in New York, at which resolutions were adopted, denying the right of the mother-country to tax the colonies without representation. The Stamp Act was repealed in the following year, by the Act 6 Geo. III. c. 11, but the British Parliament carefully avoided any appearance of a surrender of its rights. Indeed, it passed a Declaratory Act (6 Geo. III. c. 12) affirming the subordination of the colonies and the supreme authority of the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain. The mad policy inaugurated by George Grenville was followed, in 1767, by his successor, Charles Townshend, who as Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the reduction of the Land Tax to relieve the country gentlemen, and, in order to make up the resulting deficiency in the revenue, determined to impose new taxes on goods imported into America, including tea. This scheme was carried in the Commons with the utmost indifference, and with hardly any debate. These Customs duties rekindled the fires of revolution in the colonies. The Republican party increased in power and influence. Non-importation societies were formed. Resistance and rebellion were openly advocated. The storm gathered in every quarter, and at last broke out in the seizure and destruction of several cargoes of dutiable tea in Boston Harbour. The Declaration of Independence was signed by the representatives of the thirteen colonies on the 4th July, 1776. The die was cast, and the great American catastrophe was brought about by the ruinous policy of "an infatuated King, a stone-blind Cabinet and a corrupt Parliament." The battle of Bunker's Hill, the surrender of General Burgoyne's army at Saratoga, the surrender of Lord Cornwallis' army at Yorktown, the mismanagement of British generals, the bravery of British soldiers, the pluck and patriotism of the colonial forces under George Washington, the recognition of the Independence of America in 1783, and the adoption of the federal constitution in 1787, are stirring events which can be only alluded to here for the purpose of urging a closer study.—Cassell's History of England, Vol. V., pp. 71-100.

BRITAIN'S SECOND COLONIAL EMPIRE.—During one of the exciting debates which took place in the British Parliament on the subject of the American War, Lord Shelburne exclaimed, "When the Independence of America is admitted, the sun of England will have set for ever." That prediction was doomed to be falsified. No doubt the loss of her American colonies was a fearful blow to the Britain of 1783. But the world was wide, and colonization was still young. Canada, a vast tract of country extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, still belonged to Britain. Many loyalists fled from the southern colonies during the revolutionary wars and commenced the foundation of new settlements in Canada, which promised to be as great in wealth and population as some of the colonies that were lost.

In 1791, by the Act 31 Geo. III. c. 31, Canada was divided into two provinces, Upper Canada, afterwards Ontario, and Lower Canada, afterwards Quebec. In each province representative institutions were established, but the Executive was vested exclusively in the Crown. This system lasted until 1840, when the Canada Union Act, 3 and 4 Vict. c. 35, was passed. (R. R. Garran, The Coming Commonwealth, p. 81.) Under this Act the two provinces were united in one Constitution. A new Parliament, consisting of a Legislative Council, nominated by the Crown, and a Legislative Assembly, elected by the qualified inhabitants, coupled with Responsible Government, was constituted for the United Provinces. The new machinery of government was brought into operation under the Governor-Generalship of Mr. C. Powlett Thompson (afterwards Lord Sydenham) on 30th June, 1841. By the British North America Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 3) the two Canadas, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, were federally united in one Dominion by the name of Canada. The new Constitution was proclaimed on the 1st July, 1867, Lord Monck being Governor-General. The new province of Manitoba joined the Union in 1870, British Columbia and Vancouver Island in 1871, and Prince Edward Island in 1873. Newfoundland is the only British colony in North America which has not joined the Dominion.

The southern hemisphere was destined to present to Great Britain a new Colonial Empire to replace the one that was lost. The same year, during which the Americans were welded "into a more perfect union" by their federal constitution of 1787, saw Captain Arthur Phillip, with the "first fleet," on his way to the Southern Ocean in order to establish a settlement on the eastern shores of Australia, which had just been discovered and explored by Captain Cook.

(2) IN AUSTRALASIA.

FROM MAGELLAN TO COOK.—No one man, no one nation, can exclusively claim the honour of having discovered Australia. Justice demands the acknowledgment that many brave mariners and the Governments of several pioneering and exploring countries assisted in the gradual unfolding of the situation and outlines of the great continent. See Barton, "History of New South Wales," Vol. I., pp. 25-39. In his interesting work, "The Discovery of Australia" (1895) Mr. George Collingridge (Sydney) propounds the thesis that either Spaniards or Portuguese discovered and charted the continent as early as 1508. He publishes a copy of what purports to be a French map of the world by Oronce Finé, dated 1531, in which "Terra Australis" is represented as forming part of an extensive ant-arctic land, and another, dated 1546, in which it is described as Java-la-Grande, with a small channel dividing it from the true Java. In an article in the Geographical Journal, October, 1899, Mr. George Heawood expresses the opinion that there is no authentic evidence that Australia was discovered before 1606. A number of events and incidents have, however, been commonly associated with the history of Australian discovery prior to 1606; these cannot be passed over or disregarded; they may be here mentioned with the observation that the evidence on which they are based is vague.

It is said by some writers that in 1527 a Portuguese mariner named Menezis penetrated the Southern Ocean and touched at a group of rocky islands to which he gave the name of Abrolhos, and which may now be seen marked on the map, lying to the westward of Champion Bay, Western Australia. (Australian Hand Book, 1897, p. 363.) From maps and documents in the British Museum and the War Office of Paris, it would appear that a Provençal navigator, named Gillaume le Testu, a native of the French city of Grasse, discovered some portion of the Australian continent in the year 1531. Early in the year 1542 an expedition was despatched from Spain under the command of Luis Lopez de Villalobos to follow up the voyage of Magellan in the Pacific Ocean. He took possession of the Philippines for Spain, and coasted along a large island to which he gave the name of New Guinea, and which was then thought to be a part of the Great Unknown Southern Land, which Ptolemy, the geographer, supposed to exist south of the Indian Ocean. The next record is that in 1598, a Portuguese mariner named Houtman reached the Abrolhos, with which his name became associated. In 1605, Pedro de Quiros was despatched by the Court of Spain to the South Sea in command of a fleet of three vessels. On April 20th, 1606, he discovered one of the islands of the New Hebrides, which he believed formed part of the Southern Continent, and to which he gave the name of "La Austrialia del Espiritu Santo." In a memorial to Philip III. of Spain (the head of the house of Austria) de Quiros explained that he had named it "for the happy memory of your Majesty and for the sake of the name of Austria, because on your birthday I took possession of it."—Collingridge, Discovery of Australia, p. 248. One of his ships, commanded by Luis Vaez de Torres, became separated from the rest, and sailing westward he saw land which he believed to be the eastern extremity of New Guinea. He skirted along its southern coast and saw land to the south as he proceeded westward and passed through those straits which now bear his name. Torres was probably the European who first caught sight of the continent, afterwards to be known as Australia. The stories with respect to Menezis and Houtman are unsatisfactory.—Story of Geographical Discovery, Joseph Jacobs (1899), p. 158.

Other writers have, however, claimed for Dutch mariners the credit of being the first Europeans to sail in Australian waters. Whilst the Spaniards and Portuguese were engaged in exploring the South Seas the Dutch were not idle. From Batavia, the central station of their Indian trade, they sent out ships in search of islands and commerce. On 18th November, 1605, the Dutch despatched the ship Duyfhen (Dove) from Bantam in Java, to explore New Guinea. It is claimed for the Duyfhen that she skirted the west and south coast of New Guinea for nearly one thousand miles, sighted Cape York, touched the eastern shore of the great indentation, afterwards known as Carpentaria; and that some of her crew landed on the shores of the Gulf and were killed by the natives. "The exact dates of the respective discoveries of Torres and the commander of the Duyfhen cannot now be ascertained; but as the Dutch vessel had arrived in the island of Banda, on her return to Bantam, in the month of June, 1606, while the letter of Torres, communicating an account of his voyage to the Spanish Admiralty, is dated at Manilla, in the month of August following, Captain Flinders conjectures, with every appearance of probability, that the honour of the discovery of Australia is due to the Dutch, and that it must have taken place in the month of March, 1606, a few months before the discovery of Torres."—Lang's History of New South Wales (1875), p. 3.

Referring to the conflicting claims for the honour of the discovery of Australia, Dr. Lang wrote:—"Whether these allegations, however, are well founded or not, we have to console ourselves, as Britons, with the comfortable reflection that, while neither the French nor the Dutch, neither the Spaniard nor the Portuguese, ever made any account of their alleged discoveries, we, the only practical people in the lot, have already, by following and settling in the track of our own great navigator, Captain Cook, founded a whole series of noble empires of the future in the Great South Land."—History of New South Wales (1875), p. 4.

Many Dutch navigators explored the west and southern coast line of the supposed continent during the seventeenth century, and left behind them lasting evidences of their visits, in the shape of names of islands, capes, and bays, which now figure prominently on the map of Australia. The first authentic discovery of any part of the west coast of the continent is said to have been made by Captain Dirk Hartog, who sailed from Amsterdam, in the Endraaght (Concord), in 1616. To the land on the west coast near the 25th parallel, which he visited, he gave the name of his vessel: Endraaght's Land. To one of the islands off the main coast he gave his own name, Dirk Hartog, and to another the name of Dorre, one of his sailors. The bay adjoining the island was afterwards named by Dampier Shark's Bay. In 1619 Captain Jan Edel visited that part of the coast south of Endraaght's Land. The south-west cape was rounded by Dutch mariners in 1622, and received the name of the vessel, "Leeuwin" (Lioness), in which the discovery was made. In 1627 Captain Van Pieter de Nuyts in the Gulde Zeepaert (Golden Serpent) cruised along a considerable part of the south coast of the continent, which he called Nuyts Land. Captain Pieter Carpenter, an officer in the service of the Dutch East India Company, in 1627, explored and gave his name to the Gulf of Carpentaria. In 1628-9 Captain Pelsart, in command of the Batavia, was wrecked on the west coast at the spot known as Houtman's Abrolhos. The most important discovery made by the Dutch navigators, in the seventeenth century, was that of Abel Janssen Tasman. In 1642, Anthony Van Diemen, the Dutch Governor-General of Netherlands India, organized an expedition to explore the coast of Australia, which had been sighted by so many Dutch adventurers, but which still remained a terra incognita. Tasman was placed in command. He sailed from Batavia on 16th August, 1642, proceeding southward until he almost reached the 44th parallel. On 24th November, 1642, land was seen, to which he gave the name of Van Diemen's Land. The land first seen by Tasman is supposed to have been Point Hibbs. He saw and named Storm Bay; discovered and named Maria Island, and then sailed eastward. On 18th December he discovered land, which he called Staaten Land, but which afterwards acquired the name of New Zealand; he anchored in a bay in the Strait, between the North and Middle Islands. He then sailed northward, passed and named Cape Maria Van Diemen, and made for the tropics, where he discovered the Tonga Islands. Had Tasman sailed from Van Diemen's Land northward instead of eastward, he would have anticipated Cook's discovery of eastern Australia by one hundred years. In 1664, the country, whose leading outlines were yet dimly understood, was named New Holland by the States-General, and the discoveries of Tasman were proudly inscribed on the map of the world, cut in stone upon the New Staathaus in Amsterdam.

In 1683, William Dampier, one of a company of bold buccaneers, started off on a voyage round the world. After passing through many wild adventures, Dampier obtained the command of a vessel called the Cygnets, in which he reached the Philippines, and thence he proceeded on a voyage to New Holland. He reached the west coast in latitude $16^{\circ} 50'$ on 4th January, 1688. In his narrative he said: "New Holland is a very large tract of land. It is not yet determined whether it is an island or a main continent, but I am certain that it joins neither Asia, Africa or America." Dampier returned to England on 2nd September, 1691. In 1699, King William III. organized an expedition for the discovery of unknown lands. Dampier was placed in command, the name of the ship in which he sailed being the Roebuck. He reached the coast of New Holland on 4th July, 1699, and on the 1st August his ship struck the Abrolhos rocks, but escaped being wrecked. A harbour was found, which proved to be that of Dirk Hartog, who had anchored there in 1616. To this harbour Dampier gave the name of Shark's Bay. Afterwards Dampier sailed northward, passing in his course the archipelago which now bears his name. The coastline traced by him was apparently sterile and inhospitable. Dampier was the first Englishman who landed on the shores of New Holland. By some historians he has been styled the "prince of voyagers" and "the Cook of a former age." European writers like Humboldt have borne testimony to his bravery, his skill, and his genius as a mariner, and to the value and accuracy of his reports concerning his discoveries.—Blair's History of Australia (1879), pp. 29-34.

The only voyage of consequence between Dampier's time and that of Cook was one by Willem de Vlamingh, a Dutch navigator, who, in 1699, was ordered by his Government to search for the Dutch ship Ridderschap, which was lost in 1684. In his search along the west coast, in the Geeliruk, Vlamingh discovered and entered Swan River.

COOK'S DISCOVERIES.—To Captain James Cook, one of Britain's bravest and most illustrious mariners, was reserved the immortal fame of commencing and completing a voyage of discovery next in importance to those of Columbus and Magellan, by which he solved the problem of the Great Southern Continent, discovered and explored the eastern shores of Australia—or New Holland, as it was then called—and took possession of it in the name of the British Crown. The immediate occasion and motive of Cook's first voyage was not a thirst for gold or empire on the part of the British Government, but the conduct of a scientific expedition to the island of Otaheite, now called Tahiti, in the South Sea, for the purpose of observing the transit of the planet Venus across the sun's disc. On 26th August, 1768, Captain Cook sailed from Plymouth in the Endeavour, a barque of 360 tons, originally built for the coal trade. The barque was victualled for an eighteen months' voyage. Among those on board were Mr. (afterwards Sir) Joseph Banks, President of the Royal Society; Mr. Charles Green, Assistant Astronomer; Dr. Solander, a Swedish Botanist; Zackary Hicks, lieutenant; Robert Molineux, master; Charles Clerke, mate; John Guthrey, boatswain; Stephen Forwood, gunner; John Satterly, carpenter; William B. Monkhouse, surgeon; Richard Orton, clerk. Cook's instructions were to sail to Otaheite, and after the completion of the astronomical observations to proceed south as far as the 40th parallel—with a view to ascertaining the existence of the supposed "Terra Australis," or Great Southern Continent (quite distinct from New Holland) which geographers believed to exist in polar regions—and then to steer westward until he reached New Zealand, after which he was to return to England.

The transit of Venus having been successfully observed, Cook and his party left Otaheite in the Endeavour on 13th July, 1769. He reached a latitude of $40^{\circ} 12'$ without finding the imaginary continent, and then proceeded westward. After a run of about sixty-eight days, a lad on board the Endeavour, named Nicholas Young, saw land from the masthead, which afterwards proved to be the south-west point of Poverty Bay, New Zealand. That was on 6th October, 1769. Various parts of the island were visited, and on 10th November, 1769, Cook took formal possession of the country in the name of King George III. Having circumnavigated New Zealand and passed through the Straits which now bear his name, Cook, on 31st March, 1770, sailed from Cape Farewell towards the west, his plan being to steer westward until he should reach the east coast of New Holland, and then to follow the direction of that coast northward. On 18th April, Lieutenant Hicks caught sight of a projection of land which was named after him, Point Hicks. The name was subsequently changed to Cape Everard; it is situated between Cape Howe and the entrance to the Snowy River. Proceeding northward, on 28th April, a bay was discovered and entered, and a landing effected. The name given to it at the time—as appears from Cook's private log—was "Sting-ray Harbour;" and its present name of Botany Bay, obviously suggested by Banks' botanical discoveries, appears for the first time in Dr. Hawkesworth's embellished narrative of Cook's voyages. See Historical Records of N.S.W., Vol. I., p. 161. During his stay in Botany Bay Cook caused the British flag to be displayed on the shore; and the ship's name and the date of his visit were inscribed on one of the trees near the watering place. On 6th May, 1770, the Endeavour resumed her voyage northward, and at noon on the same day Cook observed an opening in the coast which he called "Port Jackson," probably in honour of Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Jackson, one of the Secretaries of the Admiralty. See Historical Records of N.S.W., Vol. I., pp. 170-2.

In the voyage northward all the prominent features of the coast were noted and named, including Smoky Cape, Port Macquarie, Moreton Bay, Cape Capricorn, and other bays and capes. After skirting the dangerous coast for a distance of about thirteen hundred miles, the Endeavour narrowly escaped shipwreck by striking some coral rocks. On 21st October, 1770, Cape York was reached. The coast was followed in order to determine whether there was a passage between New Holland and New Guinea. A channel having been found, it was named Endeavour Straits—a name which has since been dropped in favour of Torres, the intrepid Portuguese who is supposed to have first sailed through. Cook landed and took formal possession of the whole country along which he had coasted. Cook's log, as "written up" by Hawkesworth, contains the following entry:—"I once more hoisted English colours, and though I had already taken possession of several parts, I now took possession of the whole eastern coast in right of His Majesty King George III., by the name of New South Wales, with all the bays, harbours, rivers and islands situated upon it; we then fired three volleys of small arms, which were answered by the same number from the ship. Having performed this ceremony upon the island we called it Possession Island."—Hawkesworth, Voyages, Vol. III., p. 616.

Legend has it that Cook gave this name to the country owing to a fancied resemblance to the Welsh coast about Swansea. It is remarkable, however, that neither his official log nor his private log, nor any of the journals of the ship's company, mentions the name of New South Wales. It seems either to have been an after-thought, or to have originated with Hawkesworth. See Historical Records of N.S.W., Vol. I., pp. 169-70.

The first voyage of the Endeavour, and Cook's discoveries, constitute a story full of thrilling interest to Australians. His heroic services and his great work have not yet been adequately recognized by those of the British race who now possess and enjoy the glorious heritage, the Australian continent, which he helped so materially to bequeath to them. Whilst we are now celebrating the establishment of the Australian Commonwealth, and rejoicing at the beginning of a new era of national life which shall give us a more exalted citizenship, and a wider patriotism, let us not forget James Cook and his courageous comrades, who in a frail barque of 360 tons dared the storms of two oceans in search of new homes for the unborn millions of the British race. All honour to the name of Captain Cook!

Cook's second great voyage was commenced on 13th July, 1772, in the Resolution, 462 tons burthen; he was accompanied by Captain Tobias Furneaux, in the Adventure, 336 tons. The object was to make further search for the supposed Southern Continent of the geographers. In this voyage Cook and Furneaux directed their course towards the South Pole, and penetrated beyond the Antarctic circle. On 8th February, 1773, the two vessels became separated. Cook then directed his course to Queen Charlotte's Sound, New Zealand, the appointed rendezvous. Captain Furneaux followed a more northerly course, coasted along the southern and eastern shores of Van Diemen's Land, and met Cook at Queen Charlotte's Sound. Subsequently Cook cruised in the Pacific, visited and named the New Hebrides group, landed on and named New Caledonia, discovered and named Norfolk Island. He returned to England on 30th July, 1775, after an absence of over three years, having conclusively proved that no Polar Continent existed in navigable seas. See Historical Records of N.S.W., Vol. I., pp. 333, 380.

In 1776 Cook commenced his third and last voyage. On this occasion he was again in command of the Resolution, and was accompanied by Captain Clarke, in the Discovery, 300 tons. On 26th January, 1777, he arrived off the coast of Van Diemen's Land and anchored in Adventure Bay, which had been so named by Captain Furneaux. On 30th January the Resolution and Discovery left Van Diemen's Land and sailed for New Zealand. Thence they left for the Society Islands. Cook's tragic death took place at Hawaii, one of the Sandwich Islands, on 14th February, 1779. His work was done. Australia, Tasmania and New Zealand were by his labours for ever secured to the inheritance of the British people.

PROJECTS FOR SETTLEMENT.—The project of a settlement on the east coast of New Holland seems to have been due to the enthusiastic reports of Sir Joseph Banks as to the fertility and capacity of the country. Before a Committee of the House of Commons, appointed in 1779 to enquire into the question of transportation, he gave evidence that if it were thought expedient to establish a penal settlement in a distant land, "the place which appeared to him best adapted for such a purpose was Botany Bay, on the coast of New Holland."—Barton, History of N.S.W., Vol. I., p. xlv. The Committee, without recommending any particular locality, reported in favour of establishing a convict colony in some distant part of the globe.

The existing laws, however, only authorized transportation to the colonies and plantations of North America (see the Act 4 George I. c. 11); and as the independence of the American colonies had now been recognized, further legislation was necessary. Accordingly in 1784 the Act was passed under which the first settlement of Australia took place, and which is dealt with in Part III. of this introduction.

Mention may here be made of a proposal by an Englishman, James Maria Matra, to establish in New South Wales a free settlement for the American loyalists who had suffered for their allegiance to the Crown during the war, and who might wish to remain under the British flag. This plan, though it received the hearty support of Sir Joseph Banks, was not favourably received by the Government, and New South Wales thus missed the opportunity of being founded as a free and settled colony.—Barton, History of N.S.W., Vol I., pp. 1-10.

FROM COOK TO FLINDERS.—On 20th January, 1788, Captain Arthur Phillip arrived at Botany Bay with "the First Fleet," consisting of His Majesty's frigate Sirius, in command of Captain John Hunter, accompanied by one armed tender, three store ships, and six transports, conveying six hundred male and two hundred female prisoners, a guard consisting of one Major Commandant, three captains of marines, twelve sub-lieutenants, twenty-four non-commissioned officers, and one hundred and sixty-eight privates. There were also among them forty-two women, wives of the marines, together with their children. It was found that Botany Bay was not suitable for the proposed settlement. The ships remained in the harbour whilst Captain Phillip sailed along the coast in a boat for the purpose of examining the opening recorded by Captain Cook, and by him named Port Jackson. It was found to be a noble and beautiful harbour. In one of its many bays a site suitable for a settlement was selected, and named "Sydney Cove" in honour of Viscount Sydney, one of the members of Pitt's administration. Returning to Botany Bay, Captain Phillip proceeded to make arrangements to send the ships around to Sydney Cove. Meanwhile two ships, flying the French colours, appeared on the scene. They proved to be the French exploring vessels Boussole and Astrolabe, under the command of La Perouse; they came there for wood and water. After delivering to Captain Phillip despatches to be forwarded to the French Government, La Perouse sailed away across the Pacific, and was never again seen or heard of, but in 1826 traces of his wrecked ship were found on the island of Vanikoro, near the Fijis. On 26th January the fleet sailed into Port Jackson. The people were disembarked at Sydney Cove. The British colours were hoisted. The Royal Proclamation and Commission constituting the colony of New South Wales were read. A salute was fired. The work begun by Cook was about to bear its fruit in the shape of Australian settlement and colonization.

In April, 1791, George Vancouver, an English navigator, who accompanied Captain Cook on his second and third voyages, made a careful survey of the south-west coast of Australia, in the course of which he inspected a harbour which he named King George's Sound in honour of the reigning sovereign.

In 1792, a French expedition, under Admiral Bruni D'Entrecasteaux in the Recherche, accompanied by Captain Huon Kermadec in the Esperance, discovered Recherche Archipelago and Esperance Bay, W.A., and then visited the coast of Van Diemen's Land, in search of the lost La Perouse. They passed through the channel bearing the name of the Admiral, and sailed up the Huon and the Derwent.

In 1795 Captain John Hunter arrived in New South Wales, in the Reliance, to commence his duties as Governor in succession to Captain Phillip. There came with him two young men whose names have become honoured by their association with memorable events in connection with Australian maritime discoveries—Matthew Flinders, midshipman, and George Bass, surgeon. They afterwards took a leading part in exploring previously unknown tracts in Australian waters, and in solving geographical problems of great importance. On 3rd December, 1797, whilst Flinders was engaged on a surveying voyage at Furneaux's Islands, Bass, obtaining from the Governor the use of a whaleboat, a crew of six men, and provisions for six weeks, started from Sydney, cleared the heads and sailed southwards; explored the coast, discovered Twofold Bay, passed southward beyond the great projection of land, now called Wilson's Promontory, and then proceeded further westward until he discovered the harbour now known as Western Port. He had entered the channel which runs between Van Diemen's Land and Australia, though he was not certain of its continuity. In October, 1798, Flinders, associated with Bass, sailed from Sydney in a small decked vessel named the Norfolk, 25 tons; made for Van Diemen's Land; steered along its northern coast; discovered and entered Tamar heads and anchored in Port Dalrymple; rounded the north-west headland (Cape Grim) and eventually circumnavigated the island, for the first time determining its insularity. The name of Bass is immortalized in the Straits, to which, on the recommendation of Flinders, it was given. In 1799, Flinders was sent by Governor Hunter to explore the coastline north of Port Jackson. In the sloop Norfolk he proceeded along the coast, examined Moreton Bay and afterwards went as far as Hervey's Bay.

On 17th March, 1800, Lieutenant James Grant was sent from England, in command of the surveying ship Lady Nelson, 60 tons, for the purpose of exploring the southern coast of New Holland. On rounding the West Australian cape, he shaped his course to reach Sydney through the Straits discovered by Bass and Flinders, instead of proceeding via Van Diemen's Land. On 3rd December, 1800, Grant sighted a part of the coast of South Australia, to which he gave the name of Cape Northumberland. He also sighted and named other points, including Cape Bridgewater and Cape Otway. The Lady Nelson was the first ship to pass through Bass Straits from the westward. Afterwards Grant, in the Lady Nelson, surveyed the coast between Wilson's Promontory and Western Port. Lieutenant Murray succeeded Grant in command of the Lady Nelson. On 12th November, 1801, Murray started from Sydney for the purpose of prosecuting a more minute exploration along the south coast. This voyage resulted in the discovery of an opening between Western Port and Cape Otway; it was first seen on 5th January, 1802, but owing to unfavourable weather it could not be entered for several weeks. It was first inspected in a launch, by Mr. Bowen, the mate of the Lady Nelson, who entered it on 1st February. The Lady Nelson was then brought round from Western Port, and on 15th February passed through the narrow channel. This proved the gateway to what Murray described as "a noble harbour," which he named Port King, but the name was afterwards changed to Port Phillip, in honour of the first Governor of New South Wales.

At about this time Flinders was on his way back from England in the flagship Investigator, 334 tons. He reached Cape Leeuwin on 7th December, 1801; entered King George's Sound; surveyed the coast eastward; discovered and named Fowler's Bay, Smoky Bay, Streaky Bay, Port Lincoln, Spenser's Gulf, Hardwick Bay, Point Marsden, Nepean Bay, the Gulf of St. Vincent, Yorke Peninsula, Mount Lofty, Kangaroo Island, and Backstairs Passage. At Encounter Bay he came across Commodore Baudin, in command of the French ship Geographe.

In 1801 a French expedition commenced an exploration of the Australian coast which has left enduring traces of its investigations on the map of the continent. It consisted of three ships—the Geographe, the Naturaliste, and the Casurina. It was under the command of Commodore Baudin and his first lieutenant, M. Freycinet. They appeared to have examined a part of the west coast of the continent, and also the eastern coast of Van Diemen's Land, where they were engaged so long that Flinders, in the Investigator, had almost completed his survey of the southern coast when Baudin proceeded to explore from the east to westward. Referring to the meeting of Flinders and Baudin, Mr. David Blair wrote: "Flinders subsequently found that the French, by the orders of the Emperor Napoleon, claimed all the south coast as their discovery, and had named the various points along it by the names of the emperor and his courtiers. They even gave the whole territory the name of Napoleon Land. The officers of the Geographe knew well that all this was done without warrant, for one of them—M. Freycinet, first lieutenant to Captain Baudin—said afterwards to Flinders at Sydney Government House: 'Captain, if we had not been kept so long picking up shells and catching butterflies in Van Diemen's Land, you would not have discovered the south coast before us.' It is but justice to the French people to say that all idea of appropriating Flinders's discoveries has long since been abandoned by them."—Blair's History of Australia, p. 115.

Flinders proceeded on his voyage eastward, and on reaching Cape Otway he proceeded to explore the great indentation which Grant had reported. Flinders then discovered the opening within which was situated Port Phillip, which he entered on 27th April, 1802, without having any knowledge of its having been previously (15th February, 1802) entered by Lieutenant Murray. "Strangely enough," wrote Dr. Lang, "Port Phillip was afterwards discovered, on 30th March of the same year, by Captain Baudin, of the French expedition; and again, on the 27th April following—all independently—by Captain Flinders; but the honour of the discovery is unquestionably due to Lieutenant Murray, who had preceded Captain Baudin six weeks and Captain Flinders ten."—History of New South Wales, p. 82. After quitting Port Phillip, Flinders proceeded on his journey to Sydney, which he reached on 9th May, 1802. On his arrival there, he found the French ship Naturaliste in the harbour, to the commander of which, Captain Hamlin, he showed his charts of the coast between Cape Nuyts and Encounter Bay.—Blair's History of Australia, p. 116.

In 1802, Governor King despatched Surveyor-general Grimes in the Cumberland to examine Port Phillip and to warn off Commodore Baudin, who was known to be in the neighbourhood, with the Geographe and the Naturaliste, and meditating annexation of the south coast for the French Government. Grimes fell in with Baudin on 8th December at King's Island. Grimes delivered his despatches to Baudin, and after exploring King's Island he entered Port Phillip and proceeded to examine its coast line. On 2nd February, 1803, he ascended the Yarra. He was the first white man who trod the destined site of the city of Melbourne.

THE NAME "AUSTRALIA."—The continent of Australia was not yet known by that name. It was usually described, either by the old name, "Terra Australis," given by the geographers, or by the Dutch designation of "New-Holland." In 1606 de Quiros gave to an island in the New Hebrides, which he believed to be part of the Great Southern Continent, the name of "La Austrialia del Espiritu Santo" (see p. 24 supra). De Brosses, in his Histoire des Navigations aux Terres Australes (1756), coined the name "Austral-Asia" to describe the islands in a part of the South Pacific. The word "Australia" seems to have been first used by Dalrymple, in his Collection of Voyages in the South Pacific, published in 1770, when Cook was actually in Australian waters. Dalrymple, however, applied the name, not to New Holland alone, but to "all the lands and islands to the westward of South America." The application of the word "Australia" to the Continent seems to have been first suggested by Matthew Flinders, in 1814, and in about 1820 it came into general use.—Barton, History of N.S.W., vol. 1, pp. 86-93. In 1829 it first appeared in the Imperial Statute Book in the Act 10 Geo. IV. c. 22, which made legal provision for the settlement of "Western Australia, on the western coast of New Holland."

GREATER BRITAIN.—The limits of our space will not permit us to trace the progress of exploration and settlement along the shores and through the interior of Australia during the first century of its history. We can only present a brief sketch of the beginning and gradual development of Provincial Government in each colony leading up to the movement in favour of federal union. We bring to a close our review of the progress of British colonization with a few general observations on the relations of British colonies to the empire of which they form a part. The people of Australia are in the undisputed enjoyment and possession of one of the fairest countries beneath the sun, with all the rights and privileges of free institutions, political equality and local self-government. They are now entering upon that higher act of political union, at all times contemplated, with the inestimable advantage of forming an integral part of the British Empire. That Empire is much vaster in dominion, much richer and more populous than when Great Britain lost the United States. "The sun of England" has not set for ever. It shines brighter than ever; brighter by reason of the passing away of political darkness, misgovernment, corruption, and despotism; brighter by reason of the enlightened views of her statesmen and the enfranchisement of her toiling masses; brighter by reason of the democratic constitutions which have been granted to her colonies and dependencies in all parts of the earth. The red line of British frontier has been creeping in advance of all the other national colours on the map; stretching into distant "regions Cæsar never knew." But in all this the policy of the nation has been colonization, not conquest; the planting of people on the soil, and enabling them to build homes for themselves and reclaim the wilderness from the savage for their own benefit and the comforts and delights of existence; not for the glorification of princes, or the enrichment of families in Europe, as was the case in the Spanish and French systems.

Consider for a moment the vast magnitude, the enormous wealth, and the surprising population of the British Empire at the present time. There are about 56 colonies and dependencies recognizing the sovereignty of the Queen. The area at home and abroad amounts to 11,712,171 square miles; the coast line of this area exceeds in length the entire circumference of the earth, being 28,500 miles; the total annual public revenue of Great Britain and her colonies and her dependencies for the year 1897-8 was £256,452,167; the annual value of exports £515,730,000, and imports £746,407,484; the population was 385,280,140. Such is the majestic fabric of the British Empire of to-day, of which Daniel Webster, the American orator, said so long ago as May, 1834, that she was the "power which dotted the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drum-beat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England."

From the contemplation of these facts we can, to some extent, realise the greatness of the birth-right which has descended to us through the labours, the enterprise, the patriotism, and the sacrifices of the pioneers of British colonization, and the builders of the British Empire.

PART III.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT IN AUSTRALIA.

(1) NEW SOUTH WALES.

EARLIEST STATUTORY AUTHORITY.—In 1784 the Imperial Parliament passed the statute, 24 Geo. III. c. 56, intituled “An Act for the effectual transportation of felons and other offenders, and to authorize the removal of prisoners in certain cases, and for other purposes therein mentioned.” This law empowered the King, with the advice of the Privy Council, to appoint places to which felons might be transferred. By an Order in Council bearing date 6th December, 1786, His Majesty’s “territory of New South Wales situated on the east part of New Holland” was appointed a place for the reception of persons within the meaning of the Act.

By letters patent and commission dated 2nd April, 1787, Captain Arthur Phillip was appointed Governor and Vice-Admiral of the territory. It was declared that the limits of his authority extended “From the north cape or northern extremity of the coast called Cape York, in latitude of 10° 37’ south, to the south cape or southern extremity of the coast in latitude of 43° 39’ south, and inland to the westward as far as 135° east longitude, reckoning from the meridian of Greenwich; including all the islands adjacent in the Pacific Ocean within the latitudes aforesaid.” The western or inland boundary was afterwards (1827) extended to the 129th meridian. The Governor was empowered to make orders for the good government of the settlement. In the shape of ordinances, he created offences and crimes previously unknown to the law; he made regulations; he modified the application of the law of England in matters relating to police, tolls, and convict labour. His legislative powers were assumed to be founded on and justified by the prerogatives of the Crown. There is now reasonable ground for entertaining a doubt whether the Crown had authority to delegate such a power to the Governor.—Mr. Commissioner Bigge’s Report (1823), p. 10; Bentham’s Plea for the Constitution, IV., p. 255-60; Webb’s Imperial Law, p. 25.

The Judicial authority necessary for the government of the new settlement was derived partly from statute and partly from prerogative, similarly assumed to exist. The Act 27 Geo. III. c. 2, intituled “An Act to enable His Majesty to establish a Court of Criminal Jurisdiction on the eastern coast of New South Wales and the parts adjacent thereto,” authorized the Crown by letters patent to erect a criminal court for the trial and punishment of treasons, felonies, and misdemeanours. This court, which was similar in its constitution to a court of Admiralty in its criminal jurisdiction, was composed of a Judge-Advocate and six naval or military officers to be selected by the Governor. There was thus ample statutory authority for the administration of criminal law according to a procedure suitable enough, perhaps, for a penal settlement, but not for a free community. There was no statutory authority whatever for the creation of civil courts. The Imperial authorities seem to have considered that the Crown, in the exercise of its prerogative, could constitute civil courts. By letters patent, dated 2nd April, 1787, the Crown created a court of civil jurisdiction having power to deal in a summary way with personal actions and probate and administration proceedings "according to the law of England." The civil court was presided over by the Judge-Advocate and two inhabitants of the settlement, appointed by the Governor. This civil procedure continued in operation until 4th February, 1814, when fresh letters patent were issued, formulating a new plan of administration, by which the civil and criminal jurisdictions, previously united in the Judge-Advocate, were separated. A primary civil court, presided over by the Judge-Advocate and two inhabitants appointed by the Governor, was established and endowed with jurisdiction in personal actions in which the amount involved did not exceed £50. A Supreme Court, presided over by a Judge and two magistrates, was erected and clothed with jurisdiction in personal actions in which the amount involved exceeded £50, and with general jurisdiction in equity, probate, and administration matters. Eminent jurists are now of opinion that these civil courts were established by the Crown without any constitutional authority. The legislative power exercised by the Governor is also believed to have been equally unconstitutional.—Webb's Imperial Law, p. 24.

The Governor was endowed with almost absolute power. His rule was a despotism, tempered by his own discretion and by the knowledge that he was liable to be called to account by the Imperial authorities for any maladministration. His oath of office principally required him to observe the law relating to trade and plantations.—Jenks' Government of Victoria, p. 11. Such was the legal authority under which, on 26th January, 1788, a penal settlement was established and for many years afterwards maintained at Sydney Cove. It was not at first intended to be a colony or plantation within the ordinary meaning of those terms, viz., for the purpose of trade and cultivation.—Clarke's Colonial Law, p. 1. Lubbock v. Potts, 7 East 449. Webb's Imperial Law, p. 12.

By the Acts 59 Geo. III. c. 114, 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 8, and 3 Geo. IV. c. 96, the Governor of New South Wales was given limited powers to impose local taxation in the shape of Customs duties on spirits, tobacco and other goods imported into the colony.

A RUDIMENTARY CHARTER.—The temporary Act 4 Geo. IV. c. 96 (1823), which became law during the governorship of Sir Thomas Brisbane, was the first legislation passed by the Imperial Parliament conferring anything like the rudiments of local self-government on the New South Wales community. It was intitled "An Act to provide until the 1st day of July, 1827, and until the end of the next session of Parliament, for the better administration of justice in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, and for the more effectual government thereof;" but it went a little beyond its title. The old

Military Courts of 1787 were abolished, and a Supreme Court and Court of Appeal, on something like the English model, were authorized to be erected. The Crown was empowered to create, by warrant, a Council consisting of from five to seven persons charged with certain legislative powers of a limited character. They were to be appointed during the pleasure of the Crown; they could advise but not overrule the Governor in matters of legislation, and all laws and ordinances passed with their approval were required to be laid before the British Parliament. On 17th May, 1824, a charter of Justice, bearing date 13th October, 1823, was promulgated, creating the Supreme Court of New South Wales, and appointing Francis Forbes, Esq., to be the first Chief Justice. On 1st December, 1823, five persons were appointed members of the Council, consisting of the principal Government officials, viz., the Lieutenant-Governor, the Chief Justice, the Colonial Secretary, the Principal Surgeon, and the Surveyor-General for the time being. On 17th July, 1825, the Council was re-constituted and increased to its full number of members, including three private persons, residents of the colony.

Up to the passing of the Act 4 Geo. IV. c. 96 (1823), Van Diemen's Land was a dependency of New South Wales. By sec. 24 of that Act the Crown was authorized to proclaim Van Diemen's Land a separate colony independent of New South Wales. The history of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land (afterwards Tasmania), as constitutional colonies, begins with the Act 4 Geo. IV. c. 96, which was their first charter of Government.

The Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 83 (25th July, 1828), intituled "An Act for the Administration of Justice in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, and for the effectual government thereof," was the second constitutional charter of Australia. It was passed during the governorship of Lieutenant-General Sir Ralph Darling. It re-enacted the main provisions of the temporary measure and made better provision for the administration of justice. The civil and criminal jurisdictions of the courts were amended and improved, power being given to the respective Legislative Councils to introduce trial by jury in all criminal cases. It contained the well-known section (24), which enacts "That all laws and statutes in force within the realm of England at the time of the passing of this Act (not being inconsistent herewith, or with any charter, or letters patent, or Order in Council, which may be issued in pursuance hereof), shall be applied in the administration of justice, in the courts of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land respectively, so far as the same can be applied within the said colonies; and as often as any doubt shall arise as to the application of any such laws or statutes in the said colonies respectively, it shall be lawful for the Governors of the said colonies respectively, by and with the advice of the Legislative Councils of the said colonies respectively, by ordinances to be by them for that purpose made, to declare whether such laws or statutes shall be deemed to extend to such colonies, and to be in force within the same, or to make and establish such limitations and modifications of any such laws and statutes within the said colonies respectively, as may be deemed expedient in that behalf."

Another interesting and important section of this Act was sec. 20, in which it was recited that "it may be necessary to make laws and ordinances for the welfare and good government of the said colonies of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, and the dependencies thereof, the occasions of which cannot be foreseen, nor without much delay and inconvenience provided for, without entrusting that authority for a certain time, and under proper restrictions, to persons resident there." It was also recited that "it is not at present expedient to call a Legislative Assembly in either of the said colonies." It then proceeded to enact "That it shall and may be lawful for His Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, by warrants under his or their sign manual, to constitute and appoint in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land respectively, a Council, to consist of such persons resident in the said colonies respectively, not exceeding fifteen nor less than ten, as His Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, shall be pleased to nominate."

The Governors of the colonies of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, with the advice of the Legislative Councils so created, were authorized "to make laws and ordinances for the peace, welfare, and good government of the said colonies respectively, such laws and ordinances not being repugnant to this Act, or to any charter or letters patent or Order in Council which may be issued in pursuance hereof, or to the laws of England." This included certain limited powers of levying customs and excise taxation for local purposes, but it conveyed no control over the waste lands of the Crown. No proposed law could be passed by either of these Councils unless it was first laid before such Council by the Governor of the colony. The members of these legislative bodies held their seats at the pleasure of the Crown, and they had no control over the administration, which was exclusively vested in the Governor.

At this time the official staff of the New South Wales Government consisted of a Chief Justice, an Archdeacon, a Colonial Secretary, an Attorney-General, a Collector of Customs, an Auditor-General, a Principal Surgeon, and a Surveyor-General. These appointments were made by the Imperial Government. During this period we find some of the earliest traces of a colonial Executive Council, a body which subsequently acquired in the Australian colonies a position analogous to that of the Privy Council in England. In the Commission appointing Sir Richard Bourke Governor of New South Wales (25th June, 1831), he was authorized to nominate an Executive Council. This Council consisted of such of the leading government officials as the Governor thought fit to consult with in matters of local administration.—Jenks' Government of Victoria, p. 17.

FIRST REPRESENTATIVE LEGISLATURE.—The third important charter regulating the Government of New South Wales was 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76 (30th July, 1842), passed during the Governorship of Sir George Gipps. It was intitled "An Act for the Government of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land," but it principally concerned, and was for the benefit of, New South Wales. The Legislative Councils established by previous Acts were purely nominee and irresponsible bodies. This Act established, for the first time in Australia, a legislature partly, but not wholly, representative in its character. It was enacted that there should be within the colony of New South Wales a Legislative Council to consist of 36 members, 12 of whom were to be appointed by Her Majesty and 24 elected by the inhabitants of the colony. The Governor with the advice and consent of the Council was authorized to make laws for the peace, welfare and good government of the colony, including the power to impose duties of customs, provided that such laws were not to be repugnant to the law of England; nor were they to interfere with the sale or appropriation of lands belonging to the Crown or with the revenue arising from the same. Bills imposing duties of customs had to be reserved for the Queen's assent. The Council was to be presided over by a Speaker elected by itself. There was to be a session of the Council once every year, and every Council was to continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs and no longer, subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor. Power was given to the Governor to establish, by letters patent, district Councils for the purpose of carrying on local government in such counties or other divisions of the colony as he might deem fit. Elective members of the Council were required to be the owners of freehold land of the clear annual value of £100, or of the capital value of £2,000. They had to be chosen by the votes of electors being owners of freehold land of the clear capital value of £200, or householders occupying dwellings of the clear annual value of £20. This Act also contained provisions relating to the giving or withholding by the Governor of the Royal assent to Bills passed by the Council, the disallowance of Bills assented to by the Governor, and the assent to Bills reserved by the Governor, and enacting that the Queen, by the advice of the Privy Council, or through one of her principal Secretaries of State, might convey instructions to the Governor for his guidance.

This Act did not grant to New South Wales the system known as Responsible Government. The Governor was still his own prime minister, and the heads of the Departments and other public officers still continued to receive and hold their appointments from the Crown; their tenure of office depended, not on their possession of the confidence of the Legislative Council, but on the pleasure of the Crown represented by the Governor. Although it was only a half measure and an instalment of political freedom, it marked the dawn of a new system. It contained the feeble germs of Representative Government, whence has since sprung the splendid fabric of the Parliamentary institutions in Australia. It was the first concession made by enlightened British statesmen to the growing wealth and importance of the Australasian colonies. Limited as were the provisions of this Constitutional Act, meagre as were the liberties conferred, it was nevertheless drawn on lines capable of development and expansion with the growing wants and aspirations of the young community. The Council was built partly on the representative principle, and the qualified electors of the colony had the predominant power of constituting twenty-four members, as against twelve nominated by the Crown. The new Council was opened by Sir George Gipps on 1st August, 1843, and among the elective members were—William Charles Wentworth and William Bland, for the city of Sydney; John Dunmore Lang, Charles Nicholson, Thomas Walker, among the members for the District of Port Phillip (now Victoria); Charles Cowper, Richard Windeyer, George Robert Nichols.

The next important charter of Representative Government in Australia was 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59 (5th August, 1850) intituled "An Act for the better government of Her Majesty's Australian colonies," and commonly known as the Australian Colonies Government Act. The Bill, of which this Act was the outcome, was first introduced into the House of Commons in June, 1849. The two main objects of the Act were the separation of the Port Phillip District from New South Wales, and the establishment in all the colonies of an improved system of Provincial Government. The Legislative Council, erected in New South Wales by the Act of 1842, was not materially disturbed. Its powers were in some respects increased, and the franchise on which its representative members were elected was liberalized.

The Governor and Legislative Council of New South Wales were empowered to increase the number of members of that body, subject to the condition that one-third of its members were to be nominated by Her Majesty and the remaining members to be elected by the inhabitants of the colony. The property qualification of electors was reduced in the case of freeholders from £200 to £100, capital value, and in the case of occupiers of dwellings from £20 to £10 per annum. The qualification of members remained as under the Act of 1842.

Two new powers were conferred on the Governor and Legislative Council by this Act, which they did not possess by the Act of 1842. The Governor, with the advice of the Council, was authorized to impose and levy duties of Customs on the importation of goods, wares and merchandise imported into the colony from any part of the world, subject to the limitation that no differential duties could be imposed (sec. 27). There was no provision requiring Customs Bills to be reserved for the Queen's assent; and all doubts whether such reservation was still necessary were afterwards removed by the declaratory Act 29 and 30 Vic. c. 74. Power was given to the Governor and Legislative Council, in common with the Governors and Legislative Councils of the other Australian colonies, to alter the qualifications of electors and of members as fixed by the Act, or to establish, instead of the Legislative Council, a Council and a House of Representatives, or other separate legislative Houses, to be appointed or elected by such persons and in such manner as should be determined, and to vest in such Houses the powers and functions of the old Legislative Council, provided that such Bill should be reserved for the signification of the Queen's pleasure (sec. 32). The Council was still unable to pass laws repugnant to the law of England or relating to the sale and appropriation of the waste lands of the Crown, which continued to be dealt with under Imperial Legislation (sec. 14).

The Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59 was forwarded by Earl Grey to Governor Fitzroy, accompanied by a despatch dated 30th August, 1850, in which the Secretary of State explained the views of the Home Government. The Act reached the colony on 11th January, 1851, and was immediately proclaimed. In June following Governor Fitzroy received a commission under the Great Seal appointing him Captain-General and Governor-General of all Her Majesty's Australian possessions; a commission appointing him Governor of New South Wales; and three separate commissions appointing him Governor of the colonies of Van Diemen's Land, South Australia and Victoria respectively; also commissions for the appointment of Lieutenant-Governors of Van Diemen's Land, South Australia and Victoria, together with warrants delegating to the Governor of New South Wales and the Lieutenant-Governors of the other colonies the power to nominate non-elective members of their respective Legislative Councils. Each commission was accompanied by royal instructions.

On 8th April, 1851, the Legislative Council of New South Wales, under the leadership of Mr. W. C. Wentworth, adopted a report of its select committee, which protested against the new Constitution Act on the grounds that it did not place the control of all revenue and taxation entirely in the hands of the Colonial Legislature; that all offices of trust and emolument should be filled by the Governor and Executive Council, unfettered by instructions from the Secretary of State for the Colonies; and that plenary powers of legislation should be conferred on the Colonial Legislature. It concluded by "solemnly protesting against these wrongs, and declaring and insisting on these our undoubted rights; we leave the redress of the one and the assertion of the other to the people whom we represent and the legislature which shall follow us."—Tregarthen's Australian Commonwealth (1893), p. 139.

An Electoral Bill for New South Wales was passed increasing the number of members of the Council from 36 to 54, of whom 36 were to be elective members and 18 nominee members. An Electoral Bill for Victoria was passed providing that the Legislative Council of that colony should consist of 30 members, 10 nominated by the Crown and 20 elective.

DEMAND FOR RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.—A new election of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, on the liberalized franchise, then took place. The newly-constituted Council affirmed the opinion of its predecessor and passed a resolution that it was "prepared upon the surrender to the Colonial Legislature of the entire management of all our revenues, territorial as well as general, in which we include mines of every description, and upon the establishment of a constitution similar in its outline to that of Canada, to assume and provide for the whole cost of our internal government, whether civil or military." In a despatch addressed to Governor Fitzroy, dated 15th December, 1852, Sir John Pakington, the Secretary for the Colonies, stated that Her Majesty's Government had been greatly influenced by the considerations arising from the extraordinary discoveries of gold in the Australian colonies, which had imparted new and unforeseen features to their political and social conditions. Such a state of affairs had no parallel in history, and in all human probability there would be an advance in the population, wealth and material prosperity, with a rapidity unprecedented. Her Majesty's Government had further observed with satisfaction the general order and good conduct which distinguished the behaviour of the multitudes attracted to the gold deposits, and they were also bound to recognize the firmness and good judgment of the local authorities. With this evidence before them Her Majesty's Government could not but feel that, whilst it was more urgently necessary than before to place the full power of self-government in the hands of the colonies, it was equally plain that the extraordinary increase in wealth and prosperity testified to their fitness to regulate their own affairs. In reply, therefore, to the desire expressed by the Legislative Council of New South Wales in favour of a Constitution similar in its outlines to that of Canada, it was the wish of Her Majesty's Government that there should be established, in each colony, a new legislature on the basis of an Elective House and a Legislative Council nominated by the Crown or appointed subject to the approval of the Crown. Upon the receipt of such a constitutional enactment, framed by the existing Councils, with civil lists for the payment of salaries of permanent officers attached, the Imperial Government would undertake forthwith to propose to Parliament such measures as would be necessary to carry into effect the entire arrangement, viz. :—(1) By the repeal of the Land Sale Act, under which the sale of lands was vested in the Imperial authorities, and could not be regulated by colonial legislatures; and (2) by the requisite alteration in the Constitutional Act of 1850 with the schedules annexed thereto. It was added that the civil lists should provide permanent appropriation for the maintenance of the salaries of the principal officers of Government, such as the Governor, heads of departments, judges, &c. "It is my wish," concluded Sir John Pakington, "that the change should be speedily and satisfactorily effected."

THE NEW CONSTITUTION.—On the receipt of Sir John Pakington's despatch a committee was appointed by the Council to draft a Constitution. Of that committee Wentworth was one of the leading spirits. By the terms of the Enabling Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59 s. 32, the Governor, with the advice of the Legislative Council, had been authorized to establish in the colony, instead of the Legislative Council, a Council and a House of Representatives, or other separate Legislative Houses, to consist of such members to be appointed or elected by such persons and in such manner as might be determined, and to vest in such Houses the powers and functions of the Legislative Council for which the same were substituted. The Select Committee appointed to frame a new Constitution were not contented to establish a bi-cameral legislature capable of exercising only the powers and functions of the old Council. They considered it necessary that the new legislature should have "increased powers and functions;" and the Bill drafted by them was designed to confer on the new legislature increased powers and functions. In so doing the framers of the Constitution acted in excess of the authority conferred by section 32, and they ran the risk of the Royal assent being refused. This was what actually occurred to the first Constitution framed by the Legislative Council of South Australia. Nevertheless the leaders of political thought in New South Wales, believing that the measure of power granted by the Constitutional Act of 1850 was not sufficient to meet the requirements of the colony, proposed that the new legislature should have an express and enlarged grant of powers and functions, without reference to the limitations of the Act of 1850.

The opening section of the Bill provided that there should be, in place of the Legislative Council then subsisting, a Legislative Council and a Legislative Assembly, and that Her Majesty should have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the said Council and Assembly, to make laws for the "peace, welfare and good government of the said colony in all cases whatsoever." Members of the Legislative Council were to be nominated by the Governor with the advice of the Executive Council. The first nominees were to hold their seats for five years only, but subsequent nominees were to be appointed for life. The members of the Assembly were to be chosen by the electors upon the franchise prescribed in the Bill. Section 45 specially enabled the legislature so constituted to impose and levy duties of Customs. Section 47 provided that all revenue should form a consolidated fund to be appropriated by the legislature in the manner directed. Two other sections conferred power to amend the Constitution, subject to certain conditions; another section declared that, subject to provisions therein contained, the legislature could make laws regulating the sale and disposition of the waste lands of the Crown. The final section stipulated that the Bill should not have any force or effect until inconsistent Imperial Acts were repealed and the entire management and control of the waste lands of the colony were vested in the proposed legislature. These grants of powers may be thus summarized:—

1. To make laws in and for New South Wales in all cases whatsoever.
2. To impose taxation, including duties of Customs.
3. To appropriate revenue.
4. To legislate concerning the waste lands of the Crown.
5. To amend the Constitution of the Council and Assembly subject to certain conditions.

Accompanying these grants there were certain restrictions:—

1. That duties were not to be levied on supplies for Her Majesty's land and sea forces.
2. That no fiscal and commercial laws should be passed inconsistent with treaties concluded by Her Majesty with any foreign power.
3. That no differential or preferential duties of Customs should be imposed.
4. That all Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any new rate, tax or impost should originate in the Legislative Assembly.
5. That it should not be lawful for the Assembly to originate or pass any vote, resolution or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the consolidated revenue fund to any purpose which should not have been first recommended by a message of the Governor to the said Assembly.

The Bill contained provisions relating to electoral matters ; respecting the assent of the Governor to Bills, and the disallowance of Bills by Her Majesty ; also respecting the boundaries of the Australian colonies. Another section of some significance was one which provided that the appointment to all public offices, whether salaried or not, should be vested in the Governor, with the advice of the Executive Council, "with the exception of the appointments of the officers liable to retire from office on political grounds as hereinafter mentioned, which appointments shall be vested in the Governor alone."—Sec. 37.

On 21st December, 1853, the new Constitution was adopted by the Council and transmitted to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. As it contained provisions in excess of the power conferred by 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59 s. 32, the Bill could not receive the Royal assent. It was decided by the Imperial Government to strike out the clauses relating to the reservation and disallowance of Bills. In that amended shape it was made a schedule to a Bill introduced into the Imperial Parliament, entitled "A Bill to enable Her Majesty to assent to a Bill, as amended, by the legislature of New South Wales to confer a Constitution on New South Wales and to grant a civil list to Her Majesty." Section 2 of this Bill conferred on the Parliament of New South Wales the entire management and control of the waste lands of the Crown ; section 3 preserved the provisions of former Acts respecting the allowance and disallowance of Bills ; section 4 preserved to the Parliament of New South Wales the power to make laws amending the Constitution, subject to the provisions contained therein ; section 5 declared that the whole water-course of the river Murray from its source to the eastern boundary of South Australia should be deemed to be within the territory of New South Wales. In this shape the Bill was passed by the Imperial Parliament and received the Royal assent on 16th July, 1855. Its number is 18 and 19 Vic. c. 54, and it is now known as the New South Wales Constitution Statute, whilst the Act contained in the Schedule is known as the New South Wales Constitution Act.

The Act conferring a Constitution on Victoria was assented to on the same day. These Acts were transmitted to the respective colonies, accompanied by explanatory despatches from the Secretary of State, Lord John Russell, in which the Governors were instructed as to the introduction of Responsible Government.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.—"That great change in our colonial system which is known as the introduction of Responsible Government was," wrote Dr. Hearn, "effected solely by a despatch from a Secretary of State. This despatch did not even affect the legal tenure of colonial offices ; it merely described the circumstances in which the Crown would exercise its right of displacing at its pleasure certain classes of its servants. In the body of the Act, for example, which conferred upon Victoria its present form of government" (and these remarks apply equally to the New South Wales Act) "the words Responsible Minister, or any equivalent terms, never once occur. Were it not for a marginal note, which forms no portion of the Act, not even a hint would be given by this statute of the important changes which it was intended to effect.”—Hearn’s Government of England, pp. 8-9.

Sir Richard C. Baker, President of the Legislative Council of South Australia, has expressed a similar opinion as to the method and circumstances in which Responsible Government was introduced into the colonies. “It is evident,” he writes, “that the enormous power exercised by the Ministry rests on a very small legal basis, and it is curious to note that this system of Responsible Ministry, that is, of advisers, theoretically responsible to the Governor and constitutionally and practically responsible to the Parliament, was introduced into Australia simply in pursuance of a few words contained in a despatch of Sir R. Peel to one of our colonial Governors, and that it was originally introduced into Canada simply in pursuance of a conversation between Sir Francis Head and a Secretary of State for the Colonies.”—Notes on the Constitution of South Australia, “Adelaide and Vicinity,” p. 27.

The theory maintained by Dr. Hearn, and by Sir Richard Baker, has not been concurred in by all the leading constitutional authorities. Mr. George Higinbotham (afterwards Chief Justice of Victoria) held the view, during his official career as Attorney-General of Victoria, that the existence of Responsible Government in a constitutional colony was dependent, not upon instructions to the Governor, but on the statute law under which the Constitution was established in such colony. These principles he afterwards affirmed judicially in the great constitutional case of Ah Toy v. Musgrove (1888), 14 V.L.R. p. 349. In his opinion the Imperial statute law was the sole source of the public rights of every dependency of the British Crown possessing powers of internal self-government. Those rights could not be legally derived from the commission and instructions issued by the Crown to successive Governors of a colony. The commission and instructions were issued to the Governor by Her Majesty on the advice of her Imperial Ministers, and the powers and commands contained in those instruments were as revocable as they were grantable by the Sovereign.—Id. p. 379. It was in the Constitution Acts and other Imperial legislation applicable to the colonies that the system of Executive administration, generally described as Responsible Government, could alone be found. The increased powers of legislation conveyed to New South Wales, Victoria, and the other colonies, in and by their Constitution Acts, necessitated the far greater change introduced by the same Acts into the system of government by the application to the enlarged functions of government of the new principle of Ministerial responsibility. Mr. Higinbotham did not acquiesce in the contention of Dr. Hearn and other learned constitutional jurists, that Responsible Government could not be found in the Constitution Acts of such colonies as New South Wales and Victoria. On the contrary, he was able to find in those constitutional charters abundant evidences of the intention of their framers, ratified by the Imperial Parliament, to establish such a plan of Executive Government.

It was true that in those Constitutions the Cabinet was not mentioned; that the expression “Responsible Ministers” occurred only in the marginal note—which formed no part of the law—annexed to one of the sections of the Victorian Constitution (sec. 18); that mention was made of the Executive Council, but nothing was said about its legal constitution or personal composition; that the nature of Responsible Government was nowhere described; that the extent of its application was nowhere expressly declared. But the Chief Justice considered that in sec. 37 of the Constitution Act of Victoria, which was drawn on exactly the same lines as sec. 37 of the Constitution Act of New South Wales, there were provisions which assumed, if they did not originate, the operation of some plan of Ministerial Government. Both those sections declared that "The appointment of all public offices hereafter to become vacant or to be created, whether such offices be salaried or not, shall be vested in the Governor with the advice of the Executive Council, with the exception of the appointments of the officers liable to retire from office on political grounds, as hereinafter mentioned, which appointments shall be vested in the Governor alone." The Constitution Acts of South Australia, Queensland, and Western Australia contained substantially similar sections. But sec. 18 of the Constitution Act of Victoria, and sec. 32 of the Constitution Act of South Australia—amended and enlarged by subsequent legislation—contained provisions which caused those Constitutions to go much further in the direction of express recognition and actual introduction than anything in the Constitution of New South Wales. Those sections enacted that a certain number of the officers of the Governments in those colonies, for the time being, should be members of the Parliaments created by the new Constitutions. The requirement of the presence in Parliament of a certain number of Ministers in charge of public departments has been generally looked upon as one of the leading features of Responsible Government; their presence in the parliamentary arena brings them into personal contact and direct communication with the representatives of the people, who may there interrogate them on questions of public interest and express their approval or disapproval of the manner in which those Ministers conduct the government of the country.

"These provisions most plainly, in my opinion, though indirectly, give adequate expression to an intention of the Legislative Council that the principle of Responsible Government should be established by law. In contrast with this power of appointment of responsible officers which is vested 'in the Governor alone,' all other powers and functions are vested either in the Governor, or in the Governor and Executive Council (secs. 49, 51, and 53), or in the Governor with the advice of the Executive Council (sec. 37). The provisions in these last-mentioned sections appear to apply to cases where, in addition to the advice, assistance, and approval of the responsible Ministers, the nature of the power to be exercised seems to require that that exercise should be formally recorded or publicly announced. There is no indication in the Act that it was designed to create a single power or function in the Governor, except the power of appointing his Ministers, as a personal power to be exercised on his own individual judgment or discretion, or otherwise than in accordance with the advice of those whom he selects to advise and carry into act and operation the constitutional exercise of the powers given to him by the statute law as the appointee and representative of the Crown. The Imperial Government has never, I believe, even in the boldest of its attempts to interfere illegally with the Victorian Constitution, suggested that the Governor ought to exercise any of his statutory powers without receiving the advice of Her Majesty's Government for Victoria. It has only asserted for itself the right to disregard that advice, and to order the Governor, as its officer, to act in defiance of it. I think that the rule of responsibility applies to every one (if to any) of the powers of the Crown created by Statute in the Crown's representative, the Governor, and that none of them can be lawfully exercised except through and by the advice, or with the knowledge and approval, of the responsible Ministers appointed by the Governor. What are those powers? Some of them are merely formal, and their exercise and the approval of Ministers would ordinarily be a matter of course (see secs. 8 and 32). Others are of a very different nature. Thus the appointment to public offices (sec. 37), including the general control of the Public Service, is a power not only of the highest importance, but of a very large scope. Again, the power of convening and proroguing Parliament and of dissolving the Legislative Assembly (sec. 28) is one of large significance, and the exercise of it, undisturbed by any external influence, by the Ministers whom the Governor is pleased to retain in the service of the Crown as his advisers, is a matter of moment to the whole community as well as to political parties and the movements of opinion in Parliament. Sections 57 and 58 indicate, in my opinion, more clearly than all the others the intended scope and the legal and actual extent of the principle of Responsible Government established by the Constitution Act. It is from the powers of the Crown express and necessarily to be implied from these sections as well as from the powers of control over the Public Service, granted by sec. 37, that all the ordinary general functions of Responsible Government spring. From these powers the legal existence and the rightful exercise of those functions may, and, in my opinion, must be inferred. It has been seen that the Legislature obtained by the Act not only the right to dispose by legislation of the waste lands of the Crown, but also the control, for the use and benefit of the people of Victoria, by means of appropriations for specific purposes, of all the consolidated revenues derived from that and all other sources. This power covers, directly and indirectly, the whole field of Parliamentary action outside the field of general legislation."—Per Higinbotham, C.J., Ah Toy v. Musgrove, 14 V.L.R., 392-4.

On 22nd May, 1856, the first Parliament of New South Wales under the new Constitution was opened by Sir William T. Denison. The first Responsible Ministry was composed of Mr. (afterwards Sir) Stuart Alexander Donaldson, Colonial Secretary and Premier; Mr. Thomas Holt, Treasurer; Mr. (afterwards Sir) William Montagu Manning, Attorney-General; Mr. J. B. Darvall, Solicitor-General; Mr. George R. Nichols, Auditor-General; and Mr. W. C. Mayne, Representative of the Government in the Legislative Council.

AMENDMENT OF THE NEW CONSTITUTION.—The power conferred on the Parliament of New South Wales to alter the Constitution has not been very extensively exercised. The first amendment was made in 1857, when a Bill was passed to repeal so much of the Constitution Act as required the concurrence of unusual majorities in the passing of Bills to alter the constitution of the Council or the number and apportionment of members of the Assembly. By section 15 of the Constitution the Legislature was authorized to alter the electoral districts and the electoral divisions of the Assembly, and to alter the apportionment of Representatives, provided that such alterations were passed by a majority of the Council and by two-thirds of the members of the Assembly. By section 36 the legislature was authorized to alter the law concerning the Legislative Council and to provide for the nomination or election of another Council, subject to the condition that such alteration was passed with the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the Council and of the Assembly respectively. By the Act 20 Vic. No. 10, reserved on 20th January, 1857, proclaimed on 19th October, 1857, these unusual majorities were abolished, so that it is now competent for the Parliament of New South Wales to pass Bills to amend the Constitution in the same manner and by the same majorities of members as other laws for the good government of the colony, provided that such Bills must be reserved for the signification of the Queen's pleasure. By the Act 22 Vic. No. 20 (N.S.W.) section 20 of the Constitution Act, disqualifying ministers of religion from becoming members of Parliament—an inhibition notoriously directed against the late Dr. Lang—was repealed. By the same Act the number of members of the Assembly was increased and the qualification of the electors was lowered. By the Act 37 Vic. No. 7 (N.S.W.) the clause in the Constitution Act providing that the Assembly should continue for five years from the date of the return of the writs, subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor, was repealed, and it was enacted that every future Assembly of New South Wales should continue for three years from the day of the return of the writs subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor.

REFORMS.—The structure and composition of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, as established by the Constitution Act, have not since been altered; except that by the Constitution Act Amendment Act of 1890 (54 Vic. No. 1) the quorum was reduced from one-third to one-fourth of the members. There is no legal limit to the number of its members, but its average numerical strength is about 65. The qualifications of members are: male; 21 years; natural born or naturalized subject. The tenure of office is for life, or until resignation, or forfeiture by absence or other disability. There are now 125 members of the Legislative Assembly, each representing a single electorate. The suffrage is manhood; every natural born or naturalized male subject, resident twelve months in the colony and three months in an electoral district, being entitled to an elector's right for the district. No elector can have more than one vote. Every holder of an elector's right is qualified as a candidate. Members of the Assembly receive £300 a year each; members of the Council are unpaid.

ENLARGED LEGISLATIVE POWERS.—Under the provisions of Imperial Acts applicable to the colonies the legislative powers and functions of the Parliament of New South Wales, like those of the Parliaments of the other Australian colonies, are much larger than they appear on the face of the constitutional instruments. The Acts so applicable may be considered as contributory charters of self-government in Australia; among them may be mentioned the following:—

1. Enabling the legislature of any British possession to make provision for securing to British authors protection within such possession, and in such case authorizing Her Majesty to declare by Order in Council that so long as such provision continues in force the prohibitions contained in the Copyright Act, 5 and 6 Vic. c. 45, are suspended as regards such colony or possession.—Colonial Copyright Act, 1847; 10 and 11 Vic. c. 95.
2. Enabling the legislature of any British possession to pass laws for the punishment of offences relating to the coinage.—Coinage Offences (Colonies) Act, 1851; 16 and 17 Vic. c. 48, s. 4.
3. Enabling the legislature of any British possession to apply or adapt to any British ship, registered in such possession, any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts “which do not otherwise so apply,” and providing that such law shall have effect throughout Her Majesty’s dominions.—17 and 18 Vic. c. 104, s. 288; re-enacted in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, 57 and 58 Vic. c. 60, s. 264.
4. Authorizing the legislature of any British possession to repeal any provision of the Merchant Shipping Acts (other than parts thereof which relate to emigrant ships) relating to ships registered in that possession.—17 and 18 Vic. c. 104, s. 547; re-enacted in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, 57 and 58 Vic. c. 60, s. 735.
5. Enabling the legislature of any British possession to make laws for the trial and punishment of offences committed within such possession, but resulting in death on the sea, or beyond the limits of such possession.—Admiralty Offences (Colonial) Act, 23 and 24 Vic. c. 122 (28th August, 1860).
6. Empowering the legislative authority of any colony, with the approval of Her Majesty in Council, to make laws for providing and maintaining vessels of war, and for raising and maintaining seamen for the naval defence of the colony, and for enforcing order and discipline among the men and officers whilst ashore or afloat within the limits of the colony.—Colonial Naval Defence Act, 28 and 29 Vic. c. 14, s. 3. (7th April, 1865).
7. Repealing the old common law doctrine that colonial legislatures could not pass any law repugnant to the law of England, and enacting that no colonial law shall be void or inoperative on the ground of repugnancy to the law of England, unless the same be repugnant to some Act of the Imperial Parliament applicable to the colonies.—

- Colonial Laws Validity Act, 28 and 29 Vic. c. 63 (29th June, 1865).
8. Declaring the validity, throughout the empire, of laws made by the legislature of any British possession establishing the legality of marriages contracted in any such possession, provided that at the time of such marriage both of the parties thereto were, according to the law of England, competent to contract the same.—Colonial Marriages Act, 28 and 29 Vic. c. 64 (29th June, 1865).
 9. Removing doubts as to the necessity of reserving for the Queen's assent Bills passed by Australian legislatures, altering or repealing laws for the imposition of duties of customs.—29 and 30 Vic. c. 74 (6th August, 1866).
 10. Enabling the legislature of any British possession to provide for the examination of, and to grant certificates of competency to, persons intending to act as master, mate or engineer on board British ships.—30 Vic. c. 11, s. 38; re-enacted in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, 57 and 58 Vic. c. 60, s. 102.
 11. Authorizing the legislature of any British possession to regulate the coasting trade of that possession, subject to the condition that all British ships shall be treated in exactly the same manner as ships of the possession, and subject to Her Majesty's treaty obligations, with respect to ships of foreign states.—32 and 33 Vic. c. 11, s. 4; re-enacted in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, 57 and 58 Vic. c. 60, s. 736.
 12. Confirming the Acts of legislatures of British possessions in imparting the privileges of naturalization to aliens within the limits of such possessions.—Naturalization Act, 33 and 34 Vic. c. 14, s. 16 (12th May, 1870).
 13. Authorizing the legislature of any British possession to make provision for carrying into effect the Imperial law relating to surrender of fugitive criminals, from foreign countries, suspected to be in such British possession.—Extradition Act, 33 and 34 Vic. c. 52, s. 18 (9th August, 1870).
 14. Enabling the Parliaments of the Australian colonies to pass laws imposing preferential and differential duties on goods, wares and merchandise, the produce of the Australian colonies.—Australian Colonies Duties Act, 36 and 37 Vic. c. 22 (26th May, 1873).
 15. Enacting that where the legislature of any British possession provides for the survey of and grants certificates for passenger steamers to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade, such certificates are to be in force as if granted under the Imperial Act.—39 and 40 Vic. c. 80, s. 17; re-enacted in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, 57 and 58 Vic. c. 60, s. 280.
 16. Enacting that where any force of volunteers, or of militia, or any other force, is raised in a colony, any law of the colony may extend to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men belonging to such force, whether within or without the limits of the colony; and that where any such force is serving with Her Majesty's regular forces, then so far as the law of the colony has not provided for the government and discipline of such force, the Imperial law shall apply.—Army Act, 1881; 44 and 45 Vic. c. 58, s. 177.

17. Authorizing the legislature in any British possession to constitute courts to make enquiries into charges of incompetency or misconduct on the part of masters, mates or engineers of ships, or as to shipwrecks or other casualties affecting ships, in cases occurring within or outside the limits of such possessions.—45 and 46 Vic. c. 76; re-enacted in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, 57 and 58 Vic. c. 60, s. 478.
18. Enacting that where the legislature of any British possession provides for the fixing and certifying of load lines on British ships registered therein, and such provision is satisfactory to Her Majesty, certificates given thereunder shall be as effective as if given under the Imperial Act.—53 Vic. c. 9, s. 3; re-enacted in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, 57 and 58 Vic. c. 60, s. 444.

(2) VICTORIA.

FOUNDATION.—On 5th January, 1802, Lieutenant Murray, in command of the Lady Nelson, whilst exploring the great indentation in the southern coast reported by Lieutenant Grant, discovered the heads leading into an expanse of inland water, to which he gave the name of Port King, in honour of Governor King, but which the Governor afterwards altered to Port Phillip, as a compliment to his predecessor, the founder of the Sydney settlement. On 9th March, “the united colours of Great Britain and Ireland” were hoisted on the ship and on the shores of the port, a volley was fired, and the place was taken possession of in the name of King George III. On 20th January, 1803, Mr. Charles Grimes, Surveyor-General of New South Wales, entered the port in the Cumberland, explored the coast line, and ascended the Yarra as far as Dight's Falls (Studley Park). During the same year Lieutenant-Colonel David Collins was sent from England to Port Phillip in charge of an expedition, consisting in all of 400 souls, with instructions to establish a penal settlement on the shores of the port. The first ship of the expedition, the Ocean, arrived on 7th October, and the second, the Calcutta, on 11th October. Collins was not satisfied with the place, and on 27th January, 1804, with the consent of the Sydney Government, he abandoned the attempt to form a settlement at Port Phillip, and removed his charges to Sullivan's Cove, on the Derwent, Tasmania.

The Port Phillip District was first reached overland from Sydney by Hume and Hovell, in 1824. In November, 1834, Messrs. Edward and Francis Henty established a pastoral station at Portland. They are considered to have been the pioneer settlers of the southern part of the continent. In 1835, an association was formed in Van Diemen's Land to colonize Port Phillip. On 31st May, 1835, John Batman sailed up the Yarra. In the same year John Pascoe Fawkner followed. A settlement was formed on the banks of the Yarra. On 29th September, 1837, Captain William Lonsdale arrived at Port Phillip, being appointed to act as Resident Magistrate; with him was Captain Hobson, after whom Hobson's Bay was named. Captain Lonsdale selected the site on which was built a town that afterwards grew into the city of Melbourne. On 1st October, 1839, Mr. Charles Joseph La Trobe became the head of the Port Phillip community under the title of Superintendent, a post which he occupied for fifteen years; Captain Lonsdale acted as secretary to the local Government.

In 1840, the territory of New South Wales was, for all purposes connected with the disposal of Crown lands, divided into three districts, known respectively as the North District, the Middle or Sydney District, and the Southern or Port Phillip District. The first of these Districts practically comprised all the lands north of latitude 32°, but it was expressly noted that its northern limits were not yet fixed. The second comprised nineteen counties, bounded on the north by the southern boundary of the first District and on the south by the southern boundaries of the counties of St. Vincent and Murray, "and thence by the rivers Murrumbidgee and Murray to the eastern boundary of the Province of South Australia." The third, or Port Phillip District, included all the lands to the south of the southern boundary of the Sydney District.—Jenks' Gov. of Vict., p. 40.

By the Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76 (30th July, 1842) New South Wales was granted a Legislative Council consisting of 30 members, 12 of whom were to be appointed by Her Majesty, and 18 to be elected by the qualified inhabitants of the colony. The old Council was authorized to divide the colony into electoral districts for the return of elective members, but the Imperial Act specially provided that the District of Port Phillip, the town of Sydney, and the town of Melbourne should be electoral districts; that the district of Port Phillip should return at least five members, the town of Sydney two members, and the town of Melbourne one member, and that for the purpose of the Act, the northern and north-eastern boundary of the Port Phillip District should be a "straight line drawn from Cape Howe to the nearest source of the river Murray, and thence the course of that river to the eastern boundary of the Province of South Australia." It was by this Act that the colony of Victoria, afterwards to be created, lost the Murrumbidgee as its northern boundary.

SEPARATION.—By the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59 (5th August, 1850), intituled "An Act for the better Government of Her Majesty's Australian colonies," it was provided "that after such provisions as hereinafter mentioned shall have been made by the Governor and Council of New South Wales, and upon the issuing of the writs for the first election in pursuance thereof, as hereinafter mentioned, the territories now comprised within the said District of Port Phillip, including the town of Melbourne, and bounded on the north and north-east by a straight line drawn from Cape Howe to the nearest source of the river Murray, and thence by the course of that river to the eastern boundary of the colony of South Australia, shall be separated from the colony of New South Wales, and shall cease to return members to the Legislative Council of such colony, and shall be erected into and thenceforth form a separate colony, to be known and designated as the colony of Victoria." The Legislative Council of New South Wales was empowered to determine the number of members of which the Legislative Council of Victoria should consist. It was also authorized to pass an Electoral Act fixing the electoral districts for which the elective members should be returned.

The powers and functions of the Victorian Legislative Council were, by this Constitutional Act, similar to those of the re-organized Legislative Council of New South Wales and the newly constructed Councils of Van Diemen's Land and South Australia, viz., (1) to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the colony; (2) to impose taxation, including the imposition of customs duties; (3) to appropriate to the public service the whole of the public revenue arising from taxes, duties, rates, and imposts. Her Majesty was authorized by letters patent to appoint a Court of Judicature to be styled "the Supreme Court of the Colony of Victoria." The restrictions on the powers and functions of the Legislative Council of Victoria were similar to those of the Councils of New South Wales, Van Diemen's Land, and South Australia, viz., (1) that no such law should be repugnant to the law of England; (2) that no such law should interfere with the sale and appropriation of the waste lands of the Crown within the colony; (3) that no customs duties of a differential character should be imposed; (4) that it should not be lawful for the Council to pass any Bill appropriating to the public service any sum of money for any purpose unless the Governor should have previously recommended that provision for such appropriation be made.

The qualifications of electors and of elective members of the proposed Legislative Council of Victoria were to be the same as those of the electors and elective members of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, under the Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76, as amended by 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59.

This Act was proclaimed on 11th January, 1851. The old Legislative Council of New South Wales met on 28th March for the purpose of making electoral and judicial arrangements required to bring the new Act into force in Victoria. Two Acts were passed specially concerning Victoria. The first was 14 Vic. No. 45 (N.S.W.), which provided that "all justices of the peace, and other officials holding office or commonly resident within the Port Phillip District at the passing of the Act, shall continue to act as though the Separation Statute had not been passed, until removed or re-appointed by the Government of Victoria." The other Act was 14 Vic. No. 47 (N.S.W.), which provided that "the Legislative Council of Victoria shall consist of 30 members, 10 nominee and 20 elective."

These arrangements having been made, the old Legislative Council of New South Wales was dissolved and re-elected on the lower franchise. On 1st July, 1851, the writs for the election of 20 elective members of the Legislative Council of Victoria were issued. On 15th July Mr. La Trobe announced his appointment as Lieutenant-Governor of the colony. In this manner the colony of Victoria was called into existence and received the first pulsation of autonomous political life.

POLITICAL PROGRESS.—The Act of 1850, by the liberality of its provisions in creating so many new Australian Constitutions, as well as giving scope and room for the development of the best energies of the young Commonwealth, was a recognition, on the part of the Imperial Government and Parliament, of the success of the experimental legislation in British North America in 1840, and in the senior settlement of Australia in 1842. In one particular the Act of 1850 contained a very large and important grant of power to the newly-created legislatures. By section 32, it was lawful for the Governors and Legislative Councils of New South Wales, Victoria, Van Diemen's Land, South Australia, and Western Australia respectively to amend the provisions or laws for the time being in force, under the Act or otherwise, concerning the election of elective members of such Legislative Councils respectively, or the qualification of electors and elective members of the same; or to establish in the said colonies respectively, instead of the Legislative Council, a Council and a House of Representatives, or other separate Legislative Houses. The only proviso to this power was that such bills should be reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure. It was under this section that a few years afterwards the present Constitution Act of Victoria was drawn up and sent to the Imperial Government for ratification by the British Parliament. This was, indeed, an important concession. It was the first grant of power to the Australian colonists to alter the form and structure of their Constitutions, subject to Imperial control. Thus were continued the foundations of Parliamentary Institutions in Australia, commenced by the Act of 1842. They were truly miniature legislatures to start with, but it was certain that their progress and development would be guided by the natural laws of growth and evolution; and time has demonstrated the elasticity and vitality of the transplanted political system of the mother country.

The new Legislative Council of Victoria, partly nominated and partly elected, was convened for the despatch of business on 11th November, 1851. The official members were:—Mr. W. Lonsdale, Colonial Secretary; Mr. (afterwards Sir) W. F. Stawell, Attorney-General; Mr. (afterwards Sir) Redmond Barry, Solicitor-General; Mr. C. H. Ebdon, Auditor-General; and Mr. R. W. Pohlman, Chairman of the Court of Requests. Mr. J. F. Palmer was elected Speaker.

In his inaugural speech to the Council the Lieutenant-Governor said:—"In now formally opening this first session, I would offer to you, and through you, to the inhabitants of the colony at large, my most hearty congratulations upon the event which, after much delay, has at length crowned your wishes. Under the provisions of the recent Imperial Act, and Her Majesty's favour, you meet here to-day as the representatives of the people of an independent colony of the British Empire, with power to watch over the general interests and to control your own affairs, which has hitherto been, from circumstances, in a great measure denied to you; and it is my earnest prayer to God that you may be endowed with wisdom and prudence, which are requisite for the due discharge of the important duties entrusted to you."

THE NEW CONSTITUTION.—The next important stage in the constitutional history of Australia was that which was consummated by the attainment of complete local legislative independence coupled with complete local Executive authority. The Legislative Councils, partly nominated and partly elected, together with the system of personal government, were doomed to be swept away, and to give place to a more perfect type of legislature, and to a responsible administration according to the British model. The discovery of gold, which was announced to the world a few months after the separation of Victoria from New South Wales, soon began to attract a large and ever-increasing population to the shores of Australia, and new and exciting events followed one another in rapid succession. The legislature of New South Wales took the lead in the movement for an extension of Constitutional power, and the Home Government promptly and willingly agreed to grant the reform of the Constitution asked for.

Reference has been made to, and an extract given from, Sir John Pakington's despatch to the Governor of New South Wales promising to give effect to the wishes of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, that a Constitution resembling that of Canada, based on a bicameral legislature, should be adopted, and suggesting that the Legislative Council should proceed to frame one. A similar despatch, dated 18th January, 1853, offering the same concessions, was received by the Lieutenant-Governor of Victoria. The Victorian Legislative Council appointed a select committee of twelve members, chosen by ballot, to consider and report on the best form of government for the colony. The committee subsequently brought up a report accompanied by a Draft Bill. On 25th January, 1854, the Bill was read a second time, committed and reported. On 24th March it was passed, and on the 28th it was reserved for the Queen's assent.

The Constitution, so sent to England, proposed to create a bicameral legislature, consisting of a Legislative Council, to be composed of 30 members, elected by qualified voters, and a Legislative Assembly, consisting of double that number, elected on a more liberal franchise. The Queen, with the advice and consent of this legislature, was authorized "to make laws in and for Victoria in all cases whatsoever;" to impose and levy duties of Customs; to appropriate public revenue for specific purposes. All Bills for appropriating any part of the revenue or imposing any duty, rate, tax, rent, return, or impost, were required to originate in the Assembly and could be passed or rejected but not altered by the Council. The Assembly could not originate any vote, resolution, or Bill for the appropriation of the consolidated revenue for any purpose which should not have been first recommended by a message of the Governor to the Assembly. The appointment to public offices was to be vested in the Governor with the advice of the Executive Council, excepting in the case of officers liable to retire on political grounds, whose appointment was vested "in the Governor alone." Sec. 37. See p. 46, supra. The Bill also contained clauses similar to those of the New South Wales Bill, relating to the assent of the Governor to Bills and Her Majesty's power to disallow the same; relating to boundaries of the Australian colonies; and providing that it should not come into force until the control of the sale and appropriation of the waste lands of the Crown within the colony should be vested in the legislature to be created. The legislature was authorized to amend the Constitution, subject to the condition that Bills altering the Constitution of the two Houses should be passed by an absolute majority in each House and should be reserved for the Queen's assent.

The Constitution, so drawn, granted powers to the proposed bicameral legislature in excess of the authority conferred by 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59. In this respect the Select Committee of the Victorian Council were influenced by the same political considerations as the Select Committee of the New South Wales Council. They wished to secure under the new Constitution "other and additional powers and functions" beyond those vested in the old Council. In so doing they ran the same risk of having the Royal assent withheld. In fact it was known that, owing to the excess of powers proposed to be granted by the Constitution, the Royal assent could not be legally given, and that fresh Imperial legislation would be required in order to legalize the Constitution. The powers and functions granted by the Bill were:—

1. To make laws in and for Victoria in all cases whatsoever.
2. To impose taxation, including duties of customs.
3. To appropriate revenue.
4. To legislate concerning the waste lands of the Crown.
5. To amend the Constitution of the Council and Assembly, subject to certain conditions.

Accompanying these grants were several restrictions and other provisions relating to electoral matters similar to those embodied in the New South Wales Bill. As the Bill contained matters in excess of the powers conferred by the Enabling Act, the law officers of the Crown advised that it was not competent for Her Majesty to assent to the Bill without the authority of Parliament. In order to enable that assent to be given, a Bill was brought into Parliament, to which the proposed Constitution was added as Schedule A; amended, however, by the omission of clauses relating to the assent of the Governor to Bills, Her Majesty's power to disallow Bills, and respecting the boundaries of the Australian colonies. It was intitled "A Bill to enable Her Majesty to assent to a Bill, as amended, by the legislature of Victoria to establish a Constitution in and for Victoria." Section 1 enabled Her Majesty to assent to the Bill. Section 2 repealed Imperial Acts inconsistent with the Constitution, and vested the entire management and control of the waste lands of the Crown in the new legislature. The provisions of former Acts relating to the disallowance of Bills were preserved. The new legislature was authorized to repeal or alter all or any of the provisions of the reserved Bill subject to the conditions therein prescribed.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.—The Bill was passed and assented to on 16th July, 1855; it is known as the Victorian Constitution Statute; whilst the Act contained in the Schedule is known as the Victorian Constitution Act. The new Constitution was proclaimed on 23rd November, 1855. The first Responsible Government was composed of Mr. W. C. Haines, Chief Secretary; Mr. (afterwards Sir) W. F. Stawell, Attorney-General; Mr. (afterwards Sir) C. Sladen, Treasurer; Mr. C. Pasley, Commissioner of Public Works; Mr. H. C. E. Childers, Commissioner of Trade and Customs; Mr. (afterwards Sir) A. Clarke, Surveyor-General; and Mr. (afterwards Sir) R. Molesworth, Solicitor-General; Mr. (afterwards Sir) Wm. H. F. Mitchell (without office). The Ministers were all returned to seats in the first elections for the Legislative Assembly, which took place in the spring of 1856; they met the new Parliament as a Cabinet, and resigned on the passing of an unfavourable resolution upon the subject of the Estimates, in March, 1859. Mr. (afterwards Sir) John O'Shanassy, the mover of the resolution, was then, in accordance with Cabinet practice, invited to form a Ministry.—Jenks' Gov. of Victoria, p. 215.

ENLARGED LEGISLATIVE POWERS.—The Constitution of Victoria, like that of the other Australian colonies, was subsequently enlarged and improved by further grants of power, contained in Imperial Acts applicable to the colonies, of which a summary has been given, under the heading of "New South Wales," pp. 49-51, supra.

REFORMS.—By the Legislative Council (Reform) Act, 1881 (45 Vic. No. 702), the number of members of the Council was increased from 30 to 41; and by the Act 52 Vic. No. 995, passed in 1888, the number was increased to 48, distributed among the fourteen provinces. The term of membership has been reduced from ten years to six years, and the qualification of members and electors has been lowered. Members of the Council must be of the full age of 30 years, natural born or naturalized subjects, and possessed of freehold property in Victoria of the annual value of £100. Electors of the Council must be adult males, natural born or naturalized subjects, and possessed of a qualification either (1) as freeholders or mortgagors in possession of land of the annual value of £10, or leaseholders to the annual value of £25; or (2) as graduates, members of the learned professions, or military or naval officers. No property qualification is required for membership of the Assembly; members of that House are paid at the rate of £300 per annum for their services. The franchise for the Assembly is manhood; every natural-born or naturalized male subject of the age of 21 years, if resident for 12 months in Victoria and for one month in an electoral district, is entitled to be enrolled as a voter for that district. Every such person is also entitled to vote in every electoral district in which he is seised in fee of lands worth £50, or of the annual value of £5, or in which his name is entered on a municipal roll as a ratepayer. By the Act 22 Vic. No. 89 (1859), the duration of the Assembly was reduced from five years to three years. The number of members of the Assembly has been increased from 60 to 95.

CONSTITUTIONAL STRUGGLES.—Since the adoption of the Victorian

Constitution it has been subjected to some severe strains, consequent on disputes between the two Houses respecting their powers in matters of taxation and appropriation. During those controversies questions of great Constitutional importance were raised and discussed. Among these may be mentioned the action of the Assembly in tacking the proposed new tariff to the annual Appropriation Bill in 1865; its rejection by the Council and the consequent deadlock; the insertion of the proposed grant to Lady Darling in the Annual Appropriation Bill in 1867; its rejection by the Council and consequent deadlock; the insertion of provision for payment of members in the annual Appropriation Bill of 1877; its rejection by the Council and the consequent deadlock, leading to "Black Wednesday" dismissals; the Victorian delegation to England in October, 1878, and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's despatch of 3rd May, 1879. In that famous despatch the Colonial Secretary said:—

"I observe that the address of the Legislative Assembly of February 14th, 1878, dwells almost exclusively on the necessity of securing to that House sufficient financial control to enable adequate supplies to be provided for the public service, and it is prominently urged in Mr. Berry's letter of February 26th, in proof of the necessity for finding some solution of the present constitutional difficulty, that 'scarcely a year passes but it becomes a question whether the supplies necessary for the Queen's service will be granted.' But this difficulty would not arise if the two Houses of Victoria were guided in this matter, as in others, by the practice of the Imperial Parliament, the Council following the practice of the House of Lords, and the Assembly that of the House of Commons. The Assembly, like the House of Commons, would claim and in practice exercise the right of granting aids and supplies to the Crown, of limiting the matter, manner, measure, and time of such grants, and of so framing the Bills of Supply that these rights should be maintained inviolate; and as it would refrain from annexing to a Bill of Aid and Supply any clause or clauses of a nature foreign to or different from the matter of such a Bill, so the Council would refrain from any steps so injurious to the public service as the rejection of an Appropriation Bill."—Todd, Par. Gov. Col., 2nd Ed., p. 746.

(3) TASMANIA.

FOUNDATION.—This island, which down to the year 1853 was known as Van Diemen's Land, was, until its circumnavigation by Flinders and Bass in 1798, thought to be connected with the mainland. In 1803, in consequence of the presence of French exploring vessels in Australian waters, an apprehension was felt that the French meditated the annexation of unoccupied territory along the Australian coast. In order to remove any impression that Van Diemen's Land was unclaimed by the British nation, the Sydney Government decided to formally take possession of it. Accordingly Governor King despatched Lieutenant John Bowen to the Derwent in charge of the Albion and the Lady Nelson, which conveyed a number of soldiers and prisoners thither to form the nucleus of a settlement. The pioneering party anchored off Risdon Cove on the left bank of the Derwent on 12th September, 1803. In 1804, Colonel David Collins abandoned an attempt to form a settlement on the shores of Port Phillip, and removed with his charges to the Derwent. Not approving of the site chosen at Risdon Cove by Bowen, he selected another one on the south bank of the Derwent, known as Sullivan's Cove, which in after years grew into the city of Hobart, so named after Lord Hobart, the Secretary of State for the colonies. In 1804, Collins superseded Bowen as commandant of the Derwent settlement. In the same year Colonel Patterson, by direction of Governor King, planted a camp at George Town on the Tamar, but it was subsequently removed to a better situation at York Town, and eventually to the present site of Launceston. In 1805, it was decided to abandon the prison settlement on Norfolk Island, and some of the free colonists were transferred to the Derwent, where "New Norfolk" was founded.

SEPARATION.—By Section 44 of the Act 4 Geo. IV. c. 96 (19th July, 1823), intituled "An Act to provide . . . for the better administration of Justice in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land," the Crown was empowered to constitute and erect the island of Van Diemen's Land into a separate colony independent of New South Wales. On the 13th October, 1823, a charter of Justice was issued by the Crown instituting a Supreme Court for Van Diemen's Land. Mr. John Lewis Pedder became the first Chief Justice of the colony. The Court was opened for business on 24th May, 1824. Pursuant to an Order in Council dated 14th June, 1825, the separation and independence of Van Diemen's Land were proclaimed. The new colony then received a Lieutenant-Governor, an Executive Council, and a Legislative Council of its own. The Governor of New South Wales was entitled the "Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief" of the eastern part of the continent, and the Lieutenant-Governor of Van Diemen's Land exercised all the powers and functions of Governor when the Governor of New South Wales was not present on the Island. The Executive Council consisted of the Lieutenant-Governor, the Chief Justice, the Colonial Secretary, the Colonial Treasurer, and the Chief Military Officer. The Legislative Council consisted of seven members nominated by His Majesty, its functions, under sec. 24 of the Imperial Act, being to make laws and ordinances for the peace, welfare and good government of the colony, provided that such laws were not repugnant to the law of England.

By the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 83 (28th July, 1828), the Crown was authorized to re-model and improve the Supreme Courts of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land. The remaining sections of the Act providing for the constitution, appointment, and powers of the Legislative Councils in and for both colonies, and providing for the introduction and operation of "all laws and statutes in force within the realm of England," were made applicable alike to New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land. See "New South Wales," pp. 37-8, supra.

The Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76 (30th July, 1842), intituled "An Act for the Government of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land," created a new Legislative Council for New South Wales, but it did not do so for Van Diemen's Land. The whole of the provisions of that Act, with several minor exceptions, were confined to New South Wales.

FIRST REPRESENTATIVE LEGISLATURE.—For their first instalment of the Representative System of Government, the people of the southern island had to wait till the passing of that important Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59 (1850), intituled "An Act for the better government of Her Majesty's Australian colonies." By section 7 of this Act, it was provided that the legislature already existing in Van Diemen's Land, under the Act of 1828, might establish within the colony a Legislative Council, to consist of not more than 24 members, of whom one-third should be nominated by Her Majesty and the remainder elected by the inhabitants of the colony. Upon the issue of the writs for the election of the new Legislative Council, all prior legislation relating to the constitution, appointment and powers of the old Legislative Council should be repealed. The Governor of Van Diemen's Land, with the advice and consent of the new Legislative Council so established, had authority to make laws for the peace, welfare and good government of the colony; to appropriate to the public service the whole of the revenue arising within the colony from taxes, duties, rates and imposts, and to impose duties of customs. The Council, however, could not pass any laws repugnant to the law of England, or interfere in any manner with the sale or appropriation of the waste lands of the Crown; nor could it pass any Bill appropriating to the public service any sum of money, unless the Governor first recommended that provision for the appropriation should be made (sec. 14).

Section 7 of this Act was an enabling section, valuable in its immediate grant of power, but especially valuable as a precedent, showing the inclination of the Imperial Government to entrust the people of the colonies not only with representative institutions, but also with the power of drafting their own constitutional instruments. The old Council of 1828 was to establish the new Council and make arrangements for dividing the colony into convenient electoral districts. The qualifications of members and of electors for the new Council were made similar to those of the members and electors of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, under 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76 as amended by 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION.—During the governorship of Sir William Denison, the new Legislative Council of Van Diemen's Land, in the exercise of power conferred by 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59 s. 32, proceeded to draft a Constitution "for the establishment of the Parliament of Van Diemen's Land." It was proposed that the new Parliament should consist of a Legislative Council and a House of Assembly in place of the existing Council. The Council was to consist of 15 members, elected by the qualified voters of the colony. The House of Assembly was to consist of 30 members elected on a more popular franchise than that of the Council. Bills for appropriating any part of the revenue, or imposing any tax, rate, duty, or impost, were required to originate in the Assembly, and the Assembly could not originate or pass any vote, resolution, or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue for any purpose which should not have been first recommended by the Governor to the House.

The Bill so drawn did not, on its face, disclose the powers and functions of the proposed bi-cameral legislature. For those powers and functions reference has to be made to sec. 14 of the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, which defines the powers and functions of the Legislative Council created under that Act. The bi-cameral legislature created to replace that Council could, under sec. 32, exercise only "the powers and functions of the Legislative Council for which the same may be substituted." No law-making power was ever given to this bi-cameral legislature, except by reference, and to this day the laws of Tasmania are made in pursuance of the powers given by the original Enabling Act (13 and 14 Vic. c. 59), and not by the so-called Constitution. In fact it is not a Constitution; it is a graft on, or a development of a pre-existing Constitution, viz., the Enabling Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, secs. 7, 14, and 32. See Notes on the Constitution of South Australia by the Hon. Sir R. C. Baker, p. 10.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.—The Bill so drawn, and called "the Constitution," was passed by the Legislative Council on 31st March, 1854, and was reserved by the Lieutenant-Governor for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure. It was assented to and proclaimed on 24th October, 1856, and the first Parliament was opened on 2nd December, 1856. Sir Henry Edward Fox Young was appointed the first Governor-in-Chief of the colony under the new system of Responsible Government. The first Responsible Ministry was composed of Mr. William T. N. Champ, Colonial Secretary and Premier; Mr. T. D. Chapman, Colonial Treasurer; Mr. F. Smith, Attorney-General; Mr. J. W. Rogers, Solicitor-General; Mr. H. F. Anstey, Secretary for Lands and Works; Mr. W. E. Nairn (without office).

ENLARGED LEGISLATIVE POWERS.—At about the same time an Imperial Act was passed (18 and 19 Vic. c. 56) authorizing the legislature of each of the Australian colonies to sell, dispose of, and legislate concerning the waste lands of the Crown in the colony. In 1865 the Colonial Laws Validity Act (28 and 29 Vic. c. 63) removed the common law restriction which prevented colonial legislatures from passing any law repugnant to the law of England. In 1875 the prohibition contained in the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, preventing colonial legislatures from passing any law providing for the imposition of differential duties, was by the Australian Colonies Duties Act (36 and 37 Vic. c. 22) abolished, as far as intercolonial duties were concerned. Other Imperial Acts applicable to the colonies and enlarging the powers of the Parliament of Tasmania, in common with those of the other Australian Parliaments, are specified under the heading of "New South Wales," pp. 49-51, supra.

CHANGE OF NAME.—In the year 1853, on the acquiescence of the Imperial Government in the cessation of transportation (finally abolished in 1857 by 20 and 21 Vic. c. 3), the name "Tasmania" was generally and voluntarily adopted instead of Van Diemen's Land. A despatch from the Duke of Newcastle, giving the approval of the Colonial Office to the change, was published in the Gazette of 3rd May of that year. But it was not until an Act, 19 Vic. No. 17, was passed in December, 1855, that the change was legalized. This is intituled "An Act to obviate any doubts which might otherwise arise from the change in the name of the colony of Van Diemen's Land to Tasmania," and it came into operation on 1st January, 1856.

REFORMS.—There are at present 18 members of the Legislative Council of Tasmania. The qualifications of members of the Council are: male; 30 years; natural born or naturalized subjects; resident three years in the colony. The tenure is six years; one-sixth of the members retiring each year. The qualifications of electors for the Council are: male; 21 years; natural born or naturalized subjects, possessed of freehold estate of the annual value of £15 or leasehold estate of the annual value of £30; or University graduates, barristers, solicitors, or medical practitioners. The qualifications of electors of the House of Assembly, of which there are 37 members, are: male; 21 years; natural born or naturalized subjects; owners or occupiers of property whose names appear on an assessment roll in the district for which the vote is claimed or who are in receipt of an income of £40 per annum, and who have continuously resided in the district for over twelve months. In the city districts of Hobart and Launceston a modification of the Hare system of preferential voting is in force. Members of both Houses receive £100 per year each.

In Tasmania the elective Legislative Council has claimed absolute equality of power with the Legislative Assembly, except in the origination of Money Votes. Not only has it claimed, but it has been permitted, to amend Tax Bills, Supply Bills, and even Bills for the appropriation of Supplies for the annual services of the Government.

(4) SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

FIRST STATUTORY AUTHORITY.—This province originally comprised that part of the colony of New South Wales lying between the meridians of 132° and 141° of east longitude, bounded on the south by the Southern Ocean, and on the north by 26° parallel of south latitude. By the Act 24 and 25 Vic. c. 44, a strip of territory, comprising 80,000 square miles, lying between South Australia and Western Australia, called "no man's land," was on 10th October, 1861, added to the province, thus extending its western limits to 129° east longitude, the former western boundary of New South Wales. On 6th July, 1863, the vast tract of country known as the Northern Territory, formerly a part of New South Wales, was, by letters patent, added to the province.

In 1829, Mr. Edward Gibbon Wakefield published a pamphlet under the title of "A Letter from Sydney," in which he propounded a new system of colonization, the essence of which was that the Crown should sell the waste lands of Australia at substantial prices for cash and apply the proceeds to the promotion of immigration and the making of roads. In 1831, a company was formed in England with the object of promoting systematic colonization in South Australia on the lines laid down by Mr. Wakefield. Objection was taken to giving legislative power to an irresponsible company, and the scheme fell through. Amended proposals were afterwards submitted to the Imperial Government, and on 15th August, 1834, the Act 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 95 was passed, intituled "An Act to empower His Majesty to erect South Australia into a British possession or province, and to provide for the colonization thereof." This Act enabled His Majesty, with the advice of the Privy Council, to erect and establish South Australia into a British province and to authorize and empower one or more persons resident in the province to make, ordain, and establish such laws, institutions, and ordinances, to impose such duties and taxes, and to appoint such officers and to constitute such courts as might be necessary for the peace, order, and good government of the people of the province. It also empowered the King, with the advice of the Privy Council, to appoint colonization commissioners, who were to have the control of the Crown lands. Power was given to make orders and regulations for the survey and sale of the lands, and to employ portion of the money so derived in conducting the immigration of labourers from Great Britain. In the exercise of these powers the province was erected and established, and a Governor, a Judge, seven Commissioners, and other officials were appointed. The Governor, with the concurrence of the Chief Justice, the Colonial Secretary, and the Advocate-General, or two of them, was authorized to make laws and impose taxes.

Captain (afterwards Admiral Sir) John K. H. Hindmarsh, R.N., was appointed the first Governor; Colonel Light, Surveyor-General; Colonel Torrens, Chairman of the Commission in England; Mr. (afterwards Sir) James Hurtle Fisher, Resident Commissioner; Colonel Gouge, Colonial Secretary; Sir J. W. Jeffcott, Judge; Mr. Charles Mann, Advocate-General; Captain Thomas Lipson, Naval Officer; Mr. George Stevenson, Governor's Secretary and Clerk of Council.

The first ship despatched to South Australia by the Commissioners was the Cygnets, which in July, 1836, arrived at Kangaroo Island, where there was a small whaling station. Among the passengers was Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Strickland Kingston, who was one of a party of survey officers. The ships Duke of York and Lady Mary Pelham, conveying immigrants, sailed in February, 1836, and arrived at Kangaroo Island in August following. Shortly afterwards the Rapid arrived with an additional survey party under Colonel Light. Not satisfied with Kangaroo Island, he searched along the main land for a site suitable for the settlement. A tract on the Torrens River was eventually selected at a suitable spot. It was called Adelaide in honour of the Queen of William IV. On 28th December, 1836, Governor Hindmarsh arrived in the Buffalo. He issued a proclamation at Glenelg, announcing the establishment of the Government. Thus began colonization in South Australia.

A CROWN COLONY.—In May, 1841, the settlement being in considerable financial difficulties, Governor Gawler was recalled, being succeeded by Captain (afterwards Sir) George Grey. The British Government decided to lend the colony sufficient money to pay its debts, to re-model the system of government and to abolish the colonization commission. South Australia then became a Crown colony. In 1842 the Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 61 was passed, intituled "An Act to provide for the better government of South Australia." Her Majesty was empowered to constitute a nominated Legislative Council consisting of the Governor and seven other persons resident therein, with power to make laws for the government of the colony.

That system of government continued in force until the inauguration of a new scheme under the Constitutional Act, 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59 (5th August, 1850), already referred to. Section 7 of that Act authorized the legislature, then by law established in South Australia, to establish a Legislative Council consisting of not more than 24 members, of whom one-third were to be appointed by Her Majesty, and the remainder were to be elected by the qualified inhabitants. Section 14 gave the Governor, with the advice and consent of this Legislative Council, power to make laws for the peace, welfare, and good government of the province, and to appropriate to the public service the whole of the revenue arising from taxes, duties, rates, and imposts, provided that no such law should be repugnant to the law of England, or interfere with the sale or appropriation of the waste lands of the Crown. The qualifications of members and electors of the new Council were to be the same as those of the members and electors of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, under the Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76, as amended by 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59. The Council could not pass any law appropriating to the public service any sum of money unless the Governor should first recommend to the Council that provision should be made for such appropriation. On 21st July, 1851, the Legislative Council, consisting of 24 members, was constituted.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION.—In 1853 the Legislative Council of South Australia, in pursuance of the power conferred by sec. 32 of the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, passed a Bill to establish a bi-cameral legislature for South Australia, consisting of a Legislative Council of not less than 12 members to be nominated by the Crown, and a House of Assembly of 36 members to be elected by the inhabitants. The qualifications of electors and members were defined in the Bill, which, inter alia, contained a provision limiting the right of the Crown in the disallowance of Bills. The Bill was passed by the Council and reserved for the Queen's assent, which was refused on the ground that its provision limiting the Crown's right of disallowance of Bills was in excess of the power conferred in sec. 32.

On 15th August, 1855, the old Council of 1851 was dissolved by proclamation, and a new Council was duly constituted, partly by election and partly by nomination. In the meantime a copy of the Constitution which had been passed by the Tasmanian Legislative Council was forwarded by the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Governor, Sir Richard Graves McDonnell, with an intimation that a Bill drawn on similar lines would be sanctioned. A second Bill to create a bi-cameral legislature for South Australia was then introduced into the newly-constituted Council. It provided for the creation of two elective Houses to take the place of the Council created by the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59. This Bill was to be called a Constitution Act. Like its Tasmanian model, however, it conferred no law-making power on the bi-cameral legislature, except by reference. In order to ascertain the principal legislative powers and functions of the Parliament of South Australia, reference has to be made to the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, defining the legislative powers and functions of the Council for which it was substituted.

According to that Act the Parliament was authorized to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of South Australia; to raise revenue by various methods of taxation, including the imposition of duties of customs, and to appropriate the public revenue for public purposes. By the proposed new Constitution all Bills for appropriating any part of the revenue of the province, or for imposing, altering, or repealing any rate, tax, duty, or impost, were required to originate in the House of Assembly. Neither House could pass any vote, resolution, or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the revenue for any purpose, unless the Governor should have first recommended to the House of Assembly that provision should be made for such appropriation. The appointment to all public offices under the Government of the province was vested in the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Executive Council, except the appointment of certain political officers, required to be members of Parliament, whose appointment and dismissal was vested in the Governor alone. After the first general election no person could hold the office of Chief Secretary, Attorney-General, Treasurer, Commissioner of Crown Lands, or Commissioner of Works, for any period longer than three months, unless he were a member of the Council or of the House of Assembly. This Bill, though described as a Constitution, was in fact not a Constitution, but, like that of Tasmania, a graft on, or a development of a pre-existing Constitution.—Sir R. C. Baker, Notes on the Constitution of South Australia, "Adelaide and Vicinity," p. 10. It was passed by the Council on 4th January, 1856, and was reserved by the Governor for the signification of the Queen's pleasure. It received the Royal assent, and was proclaimed on 24th October, 1856.

ENLARGED LEGISLATIVE POWERS.—At about the time when the Bill received the Royal assent, the Imperial Act (18 and 19 Vic. c. 56) was passed, authorizing the legislature of each of the Australian colonies to sell, dispose of, and legislate concerning the waste lands of the Crown in the colony. In 1865, the Colonial Laws Validity Act (28 and 29 Vic. c. 63) removed the common law restriction which prevented colonial legislatures from passing any law repugnant to the law of England. In 1873, the prohibition contained in the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, preventing colonial legislatures from passing any law providing for the imposition of differential duties, was by the Australian Colonies Duties Act (36 and 37 Vic. c. 22) abolished as far as intercolonial duties were concerned. A list of other Imperial Acts enlarging the powers of the Parliament of South Australia, in common with those of the Parliaments of the other Australian colonies, will be found under the heading of "New South Wales," pp. 49-51, supra.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.—The election of members of the two new Houses took place in March, 1857. The first session of the new Parliament commenced on 22nd April, 1857, during the Governorship of Sir Richard Graves McDonnell. The first Responsible Ministry was formed by Mr. B. T. Finnis, Chief Secretary, and his colleagues were Mr. R. D. Hanson, Attorney-General; Colonel R. R. Torrens, Treasurer; Mr. C. Bonney, Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration; and Captain A. H. Freeling, Commissioner of Public Works, succeeded by Mr. (afterwards Sir) Samuel Davenport. Mr. James Hurtle Fisher was appointed President of the Council; and Mr. George Strickland Kingston first Speaker of the House of Assembly.

RELATIONS OF THE TWO HOUSES.—In 1857, a dispute arose between the two Houses of the South Australian Parliament as to their respective powers in dealing with Money Bills. A Bill to repeal certain duties of tonnage was passed by the Assembly and sent to the Council. The Council amended it as it would an ordinary Bill. The Bill as amended was sent back to the Assembly, which raised a question of privilege. The Assembly contended that the Council had no right to modify any Money Bill, but that it could only either pass or reject such a Bill. The Council replied that it had an undoubted right to amend all Bills whatsoever sent up to it by the Assembly. The dispute was eventually settled by a compromise, commonly called "the Compact of 1857," which was adopted by resolutions of both Houses. This "Compact" defines those Bills, which the Council cannot amend in the ordinary way, as being "all Bills the object of which shall be to raise money, whether by way of loan or otherwise, or to warrant the expenditure of any portion of the same," and provides "that it shall be competent for the Council to suggest any alteration in any such Bills, except that portion of the Appropriation Bill which provides for the ordinary annual expenses of the Government."

In 1881, an Act to amend the Constitution of South Australia (No. 236) was passed, which provided that "Whenever any Bill for any Act shall have been passed by the House of Assembly during any session of Parliament, and the same Bill, or a similar Bill with substantially the same objects and having the same title, shall have been passed by the House of Assembly during the next ensuing Parliament, a general election of the House of Assembly having taken place between such two Parliaments, the second and third reading of such Bill having been passed in the second instance by an absolute majority of the whole number of members of the said House of Assembly, and both such Bills shall have been rejected by, or fail to become law in consequence of any amendments made therein by the Legislative Council, it shall be lawful for, but not obligatory upon, the Governor of the said province, by proclamation to be published in the Government Gazette, to dissolve the Legislative Council and House of Assembly, and thereupon all members of both Houses of Parliament shall vacate their seats, and members shall be elected to supply the vacancies so created; or for the Governor to issue writs for the election of one, or not more than two, new members for each district of the Legislative Council: Provided always that no vacancy, whether by death, resignation, or any other cause, shall be filled up while the total number of members shall be 24 or more;" and that "in the event of the Council being dissolved, six members shall be elected for each of the said districts, and the names of such members shall be placed on the roll of members for the said districts in the order provided for in Section 12 of this Act, and thereafter the several periodical retirements of members referred to in Sections 8 and 13 of this Act shall date from the day of their election." Hitherto no double dissolution has taken place under this section.

REFORMS.—By the Constitution Amendment Act, 1894 (No. 613, assented to in 1895), the South Australian Parliament granted to women possessing the necessary qualification the right to vote for members of both Houses of Parliament.

The Legislative Council of South Australia at present is composed of 24 members who are theoretically elected for nine years. Every three years eight members whose names stand first on the roll retire and are eligible for re-election. The qualifications of members of the Council are: male; 30 years; natural-born or naturalized subjects; resident in the Province for three years if natural-born, and five years if naturalized; no property qualification. The qualifications of electors for the Council are: adults; natural-born or naturalized subjects; ownership of freehold property of the clear value of £50; or ownership of leasehold estate of the clear annual value of £20; or occupation of a dwelling house of the clear annual value of £25. The Assembly consists of 54 members, elected for a period of three years, subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor. They, as well as members of the Council, are entitled to £200 per year each for their services. Manhood suffrage for Assembly elections was adopted in 1856; and in 1895 the franchise was extended to women. Under the Electoral Code, 1896, all British subjects of the age of 21 years, inhabitants of South Australia, who have been registered upon any Assembly roll for six months, may vote for members of the Assembly. There is no plural voting; and provision is made for absent electors to poll their votes.

(5) WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

FIRST STATUTORY AUTHORITY.—During the French scare of 1826, when the French were suspected of designs to annex unoccupied portions of the Australian continent, Governor Ralph Darling despatched from Sydney a detachment of the 39th Regiment with a number of convicts, in all seventy-five persons, in command of Major Lockyer, to occupy King George's Sound, with a view to taking possession of the western part of the continent. In 1827-8, Captain James Stirling, in H.M.S. Success, surveyed the coast from King George's Sound to Swan River, and being favourably impressed with its suitability for settlement, he recommended the formation of a colony there. In 1829, Captain Fremantle, in H.M.S. Challenger, was sent to do pioneering work; he hoisted the British flag on a spot near the mouth of Swan River, which now bears his name. On 1st June, 1829, Captain (afterwards Sir) James Stirling arrived at Swan River in the Parmelia, with 800 intending settlers, from which date the history of the colony commences. Captain Stirling was the first Lieutenant-Governor, and the officials associated with him were:—

Mr. Peter Brown, Colonial Secretary; Lieutenant J. S. Rowe, R.N., Surveyor; Mr. C. Sutherland, Assistant-Surveyor; Mr. H. Morgan, Storekeeper; Mr. W. Shilton, Clerk to the Secretary; Mr. J. Drummond, Agriculturist; and the Rev. J. B. Wittenoom, first colonial Chaplain.

In the same year the first Imperial Act applicable to Western Australia was passed, viz., 10 Geo. IV. c. 22. It was intituled "An Act to provide until the 31st day of December, 1834, for the government of His Majesty's settlements in Western Australia, on the western coast of New Holland." It will be noticed that the name "Australia," first suggested for the continent in 1814 by Matthew Flinders, is here used and for the first time sanctioned by an Imperial Act. See p. 33, supra. By that Act the King, with the advice of the Privy Council, was empowered to make, ordain, and to authorize any three or more persons resident within the settlements, to make, ordain, and constitute laws, institutions, and ordinances for the peace, order, and good government of His Majesty's subjects and others within the settlements.

In 1831 Captain Stirling was appointed "Governor and Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's settlements on the west coast of Australia," and, by letters patent, Vice-Admiral, with authority from Cape Londonderry (lat. 13° 44' S.) to West Cape Howe, in lat. 35° 8' S., and from Dirk Hartog Island (long. 112° 52' E.) to long. 129° E. He was authorized to appoint an Executive Council, to provide for the defence of the colony, to institute local government and dispose of the land according to British law. The members of the first Council were:—Colonial Secretary and Military Commander, Captain Irwin; Surveyor-General and Advocate-General, Mr. G. F. Moore; Commissioner of Civil Courts and Chairman of Sessions, Mr. W. H. Mackie; Resident Magistrates, Mr. G. Leake, Mr. H. Whitfield, Colonel J. Molloy, and Sir R. Spenser. Under the Act of George IV., a Legislative Council was formed consisting of members of the Executive Council and two nominated members, the Governor being President and Mr. (afterwards Sir) Luke S. Leake Speaker. In 1839 Mr. John Hutt succeeded Captain Stirling as Governor. For fifty years the history of the colony was uneventful except for the explorations of Major Warburton, Mr. Ernest Giles, and Mr. (afterwards Sir) John Forrest.

A REPRESENTATIVE LEGISLATURE.—By the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59 (5th August, 1850) sec. 9, it was enacted "that upon the presentation of a petition signed by not less than one-third in number of the householders within the colony of Western Australia, praying that a Legislative Council according to the provisions of this Act be established within such colony, and that provision be made for charging upon the revenue of such colony all such part of the expenses of the civil establishment thereof as may have been previously defrayed by Parliamentary grants, it shall be lawful for the persons authorized and empowered to make, ordain, and establish laws or ordinances for the government of the said colony, by any law or ordinance to be made for that purpose, subject to the conditions and restrictions to which laws or ordinances made by such persons are now subject, to establish a Legislative Council within such colony, to consist of such number of members as they shall think fit, and such number of the members of such Council as is equal to one-third part of the whole number of members of such Council, or, if such number be not exactly divisible by three, one-third of the next greater number which is divisible by three, shall be appointed by Her Majesty, and the remaining members of the Council shall be elected by the inhabitants of the said colony." Under this Act Western Australia, in 1870, was granted a Legislative Council consisting of 26 members, nine of whom were nominated and 17 were elected.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT SOUGHT.—Three years after the grant of this instalment of Representative Institutions a movement was commenced in Western Australia in favour of Responsible Government as it existed in the Eastern colonies. Earl Kimberley, in reply to the first application, said: "Her Majesty's Government would not be disposed to resist any widespread and sustained desire which might prevail in the colony for Responsible Government." In 1874 a draft of a Constitution Bill was sent to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who, however, decided that the colony was not yet ready for the change. On 9th April, 1884, the Governor, Sir Napier Broome, reported that though he saw no valid reason for withholding free institutions from the colony, after its inhabitants should have expressed a general and decided wish to take upon themselves the burden and responsibility of that form of government, he was strongly of opinion that, until such a wish was expressed, which certainly it had not been as yet, it would be a mistake to make such a great and irretrievable change. He also said that Western Australia must be separated into two parts, and that the northern portion, above the 26th degree of latitude, should remain for the present a Crown colony. On 6th July, 1887, the Legislative Council of Western Australia (1) affirmed the desirability of the concession of self-government, but (2) protested against the division of the colony. On 12th July, 1887, the Governor reported that having carefully considered the whole matter, he strongly supported both the first and second of the resolutions, and gave his reasons why he had changed his opinion in respect to the suggested division of the colony in his despatch of three years previous, but added that it was only a matter of time when Western Australia would be separated into two or more colonies.

In a despatch, dated December, 1887, the Secretary of State intimated that Her Majesty's Government favoured the view that, in any new constitutional scheme, the colony should be divided at about latitude 26° (or in the neighbourhood of the Murchison River); that it should be lawful for the legislature of Western Australia to regulate, by Act passed in the usual way, the sale, letting, and other disposal of the waste lands of the Crown south of that line, and the disposal of proceeds arising therefrom; and that all the regulations affecting the sale, letting, disposal and occupation of waste lands of the Crown in the territory north of that line should remain under the control of Her Majesty's Government, the proceeds of all land sales being invested at interest, to form a fund of which the principal would be reserved for the benefit of any colony or colonies, which might thereafter be created in such northern territory, except so far as it might from time to time be expended for the special advancement of the district in which it was raised.

PREPARATION OF A NEW CONSTITUTION.—In 1889, the Legislative Council was dissolved and a general election took place, the principal question being the introduction of Responsible Government. The new Council passed a resolution, without dissent, in favour of the proposed change. A new Constitution was then drafted by the Council. It provided for the creation of a bi-cameral legislature, composed of an elective Upper House of 15 members, and an elective Lower House of 30 members. To this legislature it was proposed to give powers and functions similar to those vested in the legislatures of the eastern colonies, including the disposition of the waste lands of the Crown. It was further provided that, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, Her Majesty might divide the colony of Western Australia by separating therefrom any portion thereof, and either erect the same or any part thereof into a separate colony or colonies, or subdivide any colony so erected, or re-unite to the colony of Western Australia any part of any colony so created. The sum of £5,000 per year was appropriated for the benefit of the aboriginal natives within the colony, to be expended in providing them with food and clothing and in promoting their education. Pensions were provided for Sir Malcolm Fraser, Colonial Secretary; Mr. Charles N. Warton, Attorney-General; Mr. A. O'Grady Lefroy, Colonial Treasurer; and Mr. John Forrest, Surveyor-General and Commissioner of Crown Lands, upon their retirement from office on political grounds.

The Bill was forwarded to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who, on 31st August, 1888, returned it with suggested amendments—the principal being that the members of the Council should be nominated, instead of elected. The Legislative Council agreed to accept the proposed amendments, subject to the provision that after the expiration of six years, or as soon as the colony acquired a population of 60,000, the Upper House should be constituted by election, instead of nomination. The Bill was passed and reserved on 29th April, 1889. This compromise was accepted by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Lord Knutsford, and on 11th July, 1889, he moved the second reading of a Bill to enable Her Majesty to assent to a Bill for conferring a Constitution on Western Australia. One of the grounds suggested, as justifying the change, was that it was desirable that all the colonies on the Australian continent should, as soon as practicable, be placed on the same footing. Until there was uniformity of government, there could be little chance of any system of federation, to which he looked forward as a change which would largely tend to increase the wealth and strength of the colonies. The Bill was passed by the House of Lords, but it encountered strong opposition in the House of Commons, where the principal objection raised was the inadvisability of handing over such a vast area of country, viz., 978,000 square miles, to a Government responsible to only a small population, not exceeding 40,000 inhabitants. On the 26th August the Bill was withdrawn.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.—In the next session of Parliament, however, the Bill received the concurrence of both Houses. It became law on the 25th July, 1890; the new Constitution was proclaimed on 21st October, 1890. It is embodied in the Imperial Act, 53 and 54 Vic. c. 26. The first Responsible Ministry was composed of Sir John Forrest, Colonial Treasurer and Premier; Mr. Geo. Shenton, Colonial Secretary (succeeded by Mr. Stephen Hy. Parker); Mr. Edward Horne Wittenoom, Minister of Mines; Mr. Stephen Burt, Q.C., Attorney-General (succeeded by Mr. R. W. Pennefather); Mr. William Edward Marmion, Commissioner of Crown Lands (succeeded by Mr. Alexander Robert Richardson); Mr. Harry Whittall Venn, Commissioner of Railways and Public Works.

REFORMS.—On 18th July, 1893, the population of the colony being then beyond 60,000, the legislature of Western Australia passed an Act, 57 Vic. No. 14, to amend the Constitution, abolishing the nominee Council and substituting one elected by the qualified inhabitants of the colony.

In the session of 1899 a "Constitution Acts Amendment Act" was passed by both Houses of the West Australian Parliament, and reserved on 16th December for the Royal assent. This Act, when assented to, will introduce several important changes. Besides consolidating previous Constitution Amendment Acts, it increases the numbers of both Houses, extends the franchise for both Houses to women, reduces the period of residence in the colony necessary in order to qualify as an elector, and reduces the duration of the Assembly to three years from the date of its first meeting. The Legislative Council is to consist of 30 members, returned by 10 electoral provinces. Under this Act the qualifications of Councillors are:—Male; 30 years; a British subject, either natural-born and resident in the colony two years, or naturalized and resident for five years. Every adult person, being a natural-born or naturalized British subject, resident six months in the colony, is entitled to be registered as a Council elector in every Province in which he or she has a freehold qualification of £100 capital value, a household or leasehold qualification of £25 a year, or a Crown lease or license of £10 a year. For membership of the Assembly, of which there are to be 50 members, the qualifications are: male; 21 years; a British subject, either natural-born and resident in the colony for one year, or naturalized for five years and resident two years. Every adult person, being a natural-born or naturalized British subject, is entitled to be registered as a voter if he or she has resided in the colony for six months, and is entitled to vote after being registered for six months; and is also entitled to a property vote in every district in which he or she has a freehold qualification of £50 capital value, a leasehold or household qualification of £10 a year, or a Crown lease or license of £5 a year.

(6) QUEENSLAND.

FOUNDATION.—In 1823 Lieutenant Oxley, the Surveyor-General of New South Wales, was directed by Sir Thomas Brisbane, Governor of New South Wales, to inspect Port Bowen, Port Curtis, and Moreton Bay, in order to ascertain which, if any of them, was suitable for the establishment of a new penal settlement. In the course of his explorations he discovered a large river flowing into Moreton Bay, which he named the Brisbane, and explored for the distance of fifty miles. He was so satisfied with the country that he reported in favour of the establishment of a penal depôt on the banks of the Brisbane. In September, 1824, in company with Lieutenant Miller, who was in charge of a detachment of the 40th regiment, Oxley returned to the Brisbane River and formed the nucleus of a prison settlement, comprising thirty convicts, near the present site of the city of Brisbane. In the following year the Brisbane River was further examined by Major Lockyer of the 57th regiment: Captain Miller was the first Commandant. In 1839 it was determined to abandon Moreton Bay as a penal settlement. Sir George Gipps laid out the plan of Brisbane in 1841. On the 4th May, 1842, free settlement commenced; in the same year Captain J. C. Wickham was appointed Police Magistrate and afterwards Government Resident.

PROVISION FOR SEPARATION.—The Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76 (30th July, 1842) empowered Her Majesty, by letters patent, to separate from New South Wales any part of the territory of that colony lying to the northward of 26° south latitude, and to erect such territory into a separate colony or colonies. It was subsequently found that the 26th parallel was not far enough south to meet the requirements of a new colony, and by the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59 s. 34 it was declared that upon the petition of the inhabitant householders of that part of the territory of New South Wales lying to the northward of the 30° of south latitude, Her Majesty might detach such territory from the colony of New South Wales and erect it into a separate colony or colonies. By the Constitution Statute and Act of New South Wales, 18 and 19 Vic. c. 54 (16th July, 1855), the power previously granted to alter the northern boundary of New South Wales was distinctly preserved, and Her Majesty was authorized, by letters patent, to erect into a separate colony or colonies any territory which might be so separated from New South Wales. It was further enacted that Her Majesty, by such letters patent or by Order in Council, might make provision for the government of any such new colony, and for the establishment of a legislature therein, in manner as nearly resembling the form of government and legislature established in New South Wales as the circumstances of the new colony would permit.

In 1843, the Moreton Bay settlers found themselves included in a large electoral district constituted under the Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76 for the purpose of returning representative members to the new Legislative Council of New South Wales. In 1851, Moreton Bay was made a separate electoral district, and was assigned one elective member in the Council of New South Wales; in 1853, it was assigned an additional member. When the new Constitution of New South Wales came into force in 1856 the Moreton Bay district was divided into eight electorates, returning nine members to the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales.

SEPARATION.—Petitions in favour of separation from the parent colony were signed and forwarded to the Imperial Government so early as the year 1851. It was not until 1859 that it was decided to grant a separation. On 6th June, 1859, letters patent were issued erecting the Moreton Bay district into a separate colony, under the name of Queensland, and appointing Sir George Ferguson Bowen to be Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief thereof. The boundary of the new colony was defined as a line commencing on the seacoast at Point Danger, in latitude about $28^{\circ} 8'$ south, running westward along the Macpherson and Dividing Ranges and the Dumaresq River, to the McIntyre River, thence by the 29th parallel of S. latitude to the 141st meridian of E. longitude; on the west, the 141st meridian of longitude from the 29th to the 26th parallel, and thence the 138th meridian north to the Gulf of Carpentaria, together with all the adjacent islands, their members and appurtenances in the Pacific Ocean. The Governor was authorized to appoint an Executive Council to advise and assist him in the government of Queensland. The Constitution of Queensland was embodied in an Order in Council bearing the same date as the letters patent.

THE CONSTITUTION.—The Order in Council provided that there should be within the colony of Queensland a Legislative Council and a Legislative Assembly, with the advice and consent of which Her Majesty should have power to make laws for the peace, welfare, and good government of the colony in all cases whatsoever. The Legislative Council was to be composed of persons appointed by the Governor, subject to the proviso that not less than four-fifths of the members so appointed should consist of persons not holding any office of emolument under the Crown except as naval or military officers. The members of the Council were to hold their seats for the term of their natural lives. The Legislative Assembly was to consist of members elected by the qualified inhabitants of the colony. The Assembly was to continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the same, subject, however, to be sooner dissolved by the Governor.

The powers and functions granted to this legislature were substantially the same as those granted to New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania, and similar restrictions were imposed. With reference to the relative powers of the two Houses in financial matters, the Council could not originate any Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any new rate, tax, or impost. The Assembly could not originate or pass any vote, resolution, or Bill for appropriation of any part of the public revenue to any purpose which should not have been first recommended by a message from the Governor.

The formation of the new colony was proclaimed in the London Gazette on 3rd June, 1859; Sir George Bowen arrived in Brisbane on 10th December, 1859. The Order in Council was published in the Queensland Government Gazette on 29th December, 1859. The first Parliament under the new Constitution was convened for the despatch of business on 29th May, 1859. The first Responsible Ministry was composed of the Hon. Robert George Wyndham Herbert, Colonial Secretary; Mr. Ratcliffe Pring, Attorney-General; Mr. Robert Ramsay McKenzie, Colonial Treasurer; Mr. Maurice Charles O'Connell, without portfolio. The Act 24 and 25 Vic. c. 44 (22nd July, 1861) was passed to validate and effectuate the Order in Council establishing the Government of Queensland, and to remove all doubts as to the legality of arrangements made by the Crown upon the erection of Queensland into a separate colony. On 28th December, 1867, the Queensland legislature passed an Act to consolidate the law relating to the Constitution of the colony. The Act begins with a long recital, referring to the Order in Council ordaining the Constitution; the Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76, relating to the Royal assent to Bills, the disallowance of Bills reserved, and the Governor's conformity to instructions; and the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, relating to the reservation of Bills. It then proceeds to re-enact the Order in Council, in the shape of a local statute, in which is embodied, in addition to the Order in Council, all the constitutional law of the colony passed up to that date.

RELATIONS OF THE TWO HOUSES.—In 1885 a dispute arose between the two branches of the legislature with reference to their relative rights and powers concerning money Bills. The two Houses had agreed to the following joint standing order: "In all cases, not herein provided for, having reference to the joint action of both Houses of Parliament, resort will be had to the rules, powers, and practice of the Imperial Parliament." The following questions were referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for their determination:—(1) Whether the Constitution Act, 1867, confers on the Legislative Council powers co-ordinate with those of the Legislative Assembly in the amendment of Bills, including money Bills? (2) Whether the claims of the Legislative Assembly as set forth in its message of 12th November, 1885, are well founded? The answer of the Privy Council was as follows:—"Their Lordships agree humbly to report to your Majesty that the first of these questions should be answered in the negative, and the second in the affirmative."

REFORMS.—The number of members of the Legislative Council of Queensland is about 41; their qualifications and tenure being the same as those of the members of the Legislative Council of New South Wales. The duration of the Legislative Assembly was, in 1890, reduced to three years. There are 72 members of the Assembly, returned by 61 electorates; they are entitled to payment of £300 a year each for their services. Every person qualified to vote at the election of members of the Assembly is qualified to be a member thereof. The qualifications of electors are: male; 21 years; natural-born or naturalized subjects; resident in an electoral district for six months. Owners of freehold estate of the clear value of £100, or £10 leaseholders, have the right to vote in every district in which the property is situated.

(7) NEW ZEALAND.

FOUNDATION.—In 1823, New Zealand was under the nominal protection of the Government of New South Wales, and the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of that colony was extended to embrace the crude groups of settlements which were gradually being formed along the coasts of the islands. In 1826, Captain Herd arrived at Hauraki Gulf with sixty settlers, but he had to abandon the attempt to settle on account of the hostility of the natives. In 1831, thirteen chiefs appealed to the English Government for protection against traders and others with whom they had come into conflict. Accordingly, in 1833, Mr. James Busby was appointed Resident at the Bay of Islands, and shortly afterwards Lieutenant McDonnell, R.N., was appointed to act in a similar capacity at Hokianga. European population continued to increase at the Bay of Islands until 1837, when the Government of New South Wales despatched Captain Hobson to enquire into the lawless state of affairs at Kororareka, the main settlement. No action was taken to establish a government in any part of New Zealand until 1839, when the New Zealand Company sent a colonizing expedition, under the command of Colonel William Wakefield, to Port Nicholson, where he took possession in the name of the company, fired a royal salute, and hoisted "the New Zealand flag." Other adventurers subsequently arrived at the same locality and the town of Wellington was founded.

THE QUEEN'S SOVEREIGNTY.—This action of a private company forced the hands of the Imperial Government, and it was then decided to annex the islands to New South Wales. Letters patent were prepared extending the jurisdiction of New South Wales so as to include New Zealand, and Captain Hobson was appointed Lieutenant-Governor under Sir George Gipps, the Governor of New South Wales. Captain Hobson proceeded to the Bay of Islands, and Kororareka, which he named Russell, became the seat of government. Captain Hobson convened a conference of native chiefs and British subjects, at which he read his commission and a proclamation, asserting the Queen's authority in the islands and declaring that transactions in land which had not received confirmation by the Government would be considered illegal. Subsequently Captain Hobson entered into negotiations with the native chiefs of the north island, resulting in the Treaty of Waitangi being signed by a number of chiefs, ceding the sovereignty of New Zealand to Great Britain; and in consideration thereof they were guaranteed the preservation of their proprietary interests in the soil, subject to the condition that the Crown was to have the right of pre-emption—that is the first right of purchase—of all Maori lands. On 21st May, 1840, the sovereignty of the Queen over the islands was proclaimed.

SEPARATION.—By the Act 3 and 4 Vic. c. 62 (7th August, 1840), Her Majesty was empowered to erect into a separate colony or colonies any islands comprised within the colony of New South Wales. By letters patent bearing date 16th November, 1840, Her Majesty erected the islands of New Zealand into a separate colony, independent of New South Wales, and the Governor and certain other residents of the colony were appointed a Legislative Council with power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government thereof. The new colony was proclaimed on 3rd May, 1841. Captain Hobson was the first Governor of New Zealand, a post which he occupied until his death in 1842. He was succeeded by Captain (afterwards Admiral) R. Fitzroy. The seat of government was, on account of outrages by the natives, removed from Russell to Auckland. Governor Fitzroy was succeeded in 1845 by Captain (afterwards Sir George) Grey.

In 1846 an Act for the Government of New Zealand (9 and 10 Vic. c. 103) was passed by the Imperial Parliament. This Act contained a scheme for the division of the colony into two provinces, one styled New Ulster, comprising almost the whole of the northern island; and the other New Munster, comprising the middle and southern islands; each province having a separate Lieutenant-Governor, and a separate Executive Council charged with the administration of local affairs. For the whole of the colony there was to be a Governor-in-Chief and a Legislative Council having power to make laws of general application. This plan of government, however, did not work satisfactorily, and the operation of the Act was suspended. The movement in favour of Representative and Responsible Government made considerable progress during Governor Grey's term of office. In 1851 he recommended the Imperial Government to pass an amending law granting a new Constitution in place of that embodied in the suspended Act.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION.—On 30th June, 1852, the Act 15 and 16 Vic. c. 72 came into force in New Zealand, under which a system of provincial and general government was inaugurated. Six provinces were established, viz., Auckland, Canterbury, New Plymouth, Nelson, Otago, and Wellington, the number being subsequently increased to nine. Each province was to be ruled by a Superintendent and a provincial Council. The Superintendent was to be elected by the qualified inhabitants of each province voting as one body; each Council was to consist of not less than nine members elected by the qualified inhabitants of its province voting in districts. The Superintendent, with the advice and consent of the Council of each province, was empowered to make all such laws and ordinances as might be required for the peace, order, and good government of the province, provided that the same were not repugnant to the law of England, or to the law of the colony otherwise enacted. Generally speaking the powers and functions of the Councils were of a local and municipal character. The Superintendent could, according to his discretion, assent to a Bill passed by the Council of his province, or he could withhold his assent or reserve the Bill for the signification of the Governor's pleasure.

The Act further provided that there should be within the colony of New Zealand a General Assembly, to consist of the Governor, a Legislative Council, and a House of Representatives. Members of the Council, of whom there were to be not less than 10, were to be appointed by the Queen; they were to hold their seats for life, subject to resignation, forfeiture for non-attendance, and other disabilities. The House of Representatives was to consist of not less than 24 nor more than 42 members, elected by the qualified inhabitants of the colony. Each House of Representatives was to continue in existence for five years, unless sooner dissolved by the Governor. The General Assembly was to have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of New Zealand, provided that no such laws should be repugnant to the law of England, and that Bills passed by the General Assembly should control and supersede any law or ordinance in any way repugnant thereto passed by the provincial councils. Under subsequent Imperial legislation the powers and functions of the General Assembly of New Zealand were, in common with those of the Parliaments of Australia, greatly enlarged.

Sir George Grey was, on 13th September, 1852, appointed Governor of the colony under the new Constitution; he, however, was appointed Governor of Cape Colony before the arrangements were completed for the inauguration of the new Representative system. To Colonel Wynyard, the officer commanding the Imperial troops, was assigned the important task of bringing the new machinery of government into operation.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT.—The first session of the General Assembly was opened at Auckland on 25th May, 1854. Great dissatisfaction was expressed when it was found there was no provision in the Constitution, or in the Governor's instructions, for the introduction of Responsible Government. The official members of the old Executive Council continued to hold office, although none of them were members of the new Parliament, which had no control of the Executive except by the refusal of supplies. The Constitution did not make it obligatory that official members of the Executive Council should be members of the legislature. The Governor informed the House of Representatives that he had no power to supersede the Executive Council which was in existence before the Constitution was passed. During the first three months of the session no business was done by the new Parliament. The Governor then sent a message informing the Parliament that he would urge the Imperial Government to amend the Constitution by making provision for the appointment of Responsible Ministers. The Parliament was then prorogued for a fortnight. In the meantime four members of the House of Representatives were made members of the Executive Council. Upon the re-opening of Parliament an amendment to the Address-in-Reply was carried, in the House of Representatives, by 22 votes to 4, declaring that the House had no confidence in a mixed Executive consisting partly of members of Parliament and partly of Government officials. The four new ministers then resigned. As the result of the action of the House of Representatives the Governor subsequently received authority from the Imperial Government to appoint Responsible Ministers, subject to the condition that the official members of the old Executive Council were to be granted pensions to which they were entitled by Imperial regulations.

In September, 1855, Colonel Gore Browne became Governor of New Zealand, and in his first message to the General Assembly he communicated the desire of Her Majesty's Government that the colony should enjoy "the fullest measure of self-government which is con sistent with its allegiance to the British Crown," and that accordingly he would, as speedily as possible, "carry out in its integrity the principle of ministerial responsibility, being convinced that any other arrangements would be ineffective to preserve the harmony between the legislative and executive branches of the government, which is so essential to the successful conduct of public affairs." In April, 1856, the Governor commenced negotiations with one of the leaders of the House of Representatives for the formation of his first Government, with the result that the Bell-Sewell Ministry took office, which they held from 7th May to 20th May, 1856; they were succeeded by the Fox Ministry, which held office from 20th May to 2nd June, 1856, which was followed by the Stafford Ministry, holding office from 2nd June, 1856, to 12th July, 1861.

The system of Provincial Government remained in force as an integral part of the Constitution until the 1st November, 1876, when it was abolished by an Act of the General Assembly, and most of the powers and functions previously exercised by Superintendents and Councils were vested in municipal institutions of the ordinary type. In 1865 the seat of Government was, by an Act of the General Assembly, removed from Auckland, and, on the recommendation of certain commissioners, appointed by the Australian Governors at the request of the General Assembly, Wellington became the capital.

REFORMS.—The Constitution of the Legislative Council was altered by an Act which came into operation on 17th September, 1891; under which all members added subsequently to that date were appointed for the limited period of seven years instead of for life. They are, however, eligible for re-appointment. Members of the Council are paid £150 per year for their services. For membership of the House of Representatives no property qualification is required, and every adult person whose name is properly registered is entitled to vote at the election of members of the House. The House consists of 74 members, including four Maori representatives, who are paid at the rate of £240 per year. Its duration from the return of the writs was, in 1879, reduced from five years to three years, subject to being sooner dissolved by the Governor.

PART IV.

THE FEDERAL MOVEMENT IN AUSTRALIA.

(1) THE GERM OF FEDERATION.

THE BEGINNINGS OF SEPARATION.—Early Australian history, naturally enough, is a history of isolation; of the separate progress of widely distant coast settlements, and their endeavours to become self-sufficient and to obtain independent self-governing institutions. As we have already seen, New South Wales once comprised (nominally) the whole of the continent of Australia east of the 129th meridian (the present eastern boundary of Western Australia), together with the “adjacent islands,” and Tasmania. But for many years it meant little more than the settlement at Sydney. Hobart was founded in 1803, and Moreton Bay in 1824, both being administered from Sydney. The first actual separation was in 1825, when Van Diemen’s Land was erected into a separate colony. Western Australia in 1829, and South Australia in 1836, were also founded as separate colonies. The mainland of Australia was thus parcelled out into three great divisions, while the island of Van Diemen’s Land formed a fourth. The Port Phillip settlement, definitely colonized in 1836, and the Moreton Bay settlement, continued to form part of New South Wales. In 1839 New Zealand was also proclaimed a dependency of New South Wales; but in 1841 it was proclaimed as a separate colony.

INTERCOLONIAL RECIPROCITY ATTEMPTED.—The actual isolation of these settlements prevented any need of union being felt; and the settlers were too absorbed in their daily needs to give much attention to the political wants of the future. Nevertheless some early attempts were made to secure reciprocal freetrade between the colonies—attempts which were unfortunately thwarted by unsympathetic Secretaries of State. All the colonies imposed import duties for purposes of revenue; and as trade developed, these duties began to wear a protective aspect. For many years after the separation of Van Diemen’s Land it was the practice in New South Wales—contrary to the strict letter of the law—to admit imports from Van Diemen’s Land free, though levying duties on similar goods from elsewhere; whilst Van Diemen’s Land reciprocated by inserting in her Customs Duties Acts an exemption in favour of imports from New South Wales. The separation of New Zealand made the need of intercolonial freetrade more apparent; and in 1842 the Legislative Council of New South Wales passed an Act to permit goods the produce or manufacture of New Zealand or Van Diemen’s Land to be imported free of duty. In debate the Collector of Customs suggested that, to prevent jealousy, the exemption should be extended to South Australia also, though the trade with that colony was as yet inconsiderable. The suggestion, however, was not adopted. In fact South Australia.

as the pet colony of the Colonial Office, was not regarded with too much favour in New South Wales.

This attempt to introduce an instalment of intercolonial freetrade was frustrated by the disallowance of the Act. Lord Stanley, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, first sent a circular despatch, dated 28th June, 1843, to the Governors of all the colonies, dealing generally with the subject of differential duties. He took the ground that a policy of discrimination would involve the commercial treaties and the foreign relations of Great Britain, and could not be satisfactorily dealt with except by the Home Government; and stated roundly that "Her Majesty's Government decidedly object in principle to the assumption by the colonial legislatures of the office of imposing differential duties on goods imported into the respective colonies." In a subsequent despatch to the Governor of New South Wales, announcing the disallowance of the Act, Lord Stanley further objected to the principle of differential duties on the ground that they would lead to retaliation, and to a system of protection and preferences.

GOVERNOR FITZROY'S SUGGESTION.—Intercolonial barriers were thus allowed to grow up, and the fiscal policies of the colonies gradually drifted apart. In 1843, we find the Legislative Council of New South Wales carrying, on the motion of Mr. Richard Windeyer, a resolution asking for the disallowance of certain Acts of the Legislature of Van Diemen's Land, imposing a duty on tobacco and coal imported from New South Wales. And in 1846 the Legislative Council of Van Diemen's Land passed an Act abolishing the exemption of imports from New South Wales, and thus subjecting them to an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. This step was taken ostensibly to comply with Lord Stanley's wishes; but really (according to Sir John Eardley Wilnot, the Governor of Van Diemen's Land) to secure protection to the local farmers. Once more, on Mr. Windeyer's motion, the Legislative Council of New South Wales protested, asking that the Act should be disallowed; and Governor Fitzroy, in a despatch dated 29th September, 1846, forwarding this resolution to the Colonial Office, made the first recorded suggestion of the need of some central intercolonial authority—a suggestion which we may may shrewdly suspect to have been inspired by his Colonial Secretary, Mr. E. Deas-Thomson. He wrote:—"I feel much diffidence in offering an opinion so soon after my arrival in this part of the world; but it appears to me that, considering its distance from Home, and the time that must elapse before the decision of Her Majesty's Government upon measures passed by the Legislatures of these colonies can be obtained, it would be very advantageous to their interests if some superior functionary were to be appointed, to whom all measures adopted by the local Legislatures, affecting the general interests of the mother country, the Australian colonies, or their intercolonial trade, should be submitted by the officers administering the several Governments, before their own assent is given to them."

(2) EARL GREY'S SCHEMES.

EARL GREY'S DESPATCH.—Meanwhile the agitation for the separation of the Port Phillip district, and for more completely representative institutions, was going on; and Lord John Russell's administration had begun, with Earl Grey as Secretary of State for the Colonies. Earl Grey, in his famous despatch of 31st July, 1847, announced his Government's intention to bring in a Bill to erect the southern part of New South Wales into a separate colony, to be called Victoria. Incidentally, he foreshadowed some changes in the Constitution of New South Wales. He proposed to establish a Legislature of two Houses instead of one, and made the startling suggestion that the House of Assembly should be elected by District Councils, or municipal bodies, instead of directly by the people. But to us to-day the most interesting part of his constitutional scheme was that which at the time received the least attention—the idea, previously hinted at by Governor Fitzroy, of a General Assembly to deal with matters of common Australian interest. We must give Earl Grey credit for recognizing that besides municipal and provincial interests on the one hand, which would be the care of the local Legislatures, and Imperial interests on the other hand, which would be the care of the Imperial Government, there must be general Australian interests which would need to be regulated by a central Australian authority. He wrote accordingly the first recorded statement of the case for Australian union:—

“The principle of local self-government (like every other political principle) must, when reduced to practice, be qualified by many other principles which must operate simultaneously with it. To regulate such affairs with reference to any one isolated rule or maxim would, of course, be an idle and ineffectual attempt. For example, it is necessary that, while providing for the local management of local interests, we should not omit to provide for a central management of all such interests as are not local. Thus, questions co-extensive in their bearing with the interests of the Empire at large are the appropriate province of Parliament.

“But there are questions which, though local as it respects the British possessions in Australia collectively, are not merely local as it respects any one of those possessions. Considered as members of the same Empire, those colonies have many common interests, the regulation of which, in some uniform manner and by some single authority, may be essential to the welfare of them all. Yet in some cases such interests may be more promptly, effectively, and satisfactorily decided by some authority within Australia itself than by the more remote, the less accessible, and in truth the less competent authority of Parliament.”

And in due course he went on to outline his project for union:—

“Some method will also be devised for enabling the various legislatures of the several Australian colonies to co-operate with each other in the enactment of such laws as may be necessary for regulating the interests common to those possessions collectively, such, for example, are the imposition of duties of import and export, the conveyance of letters, and the formation of roads, railways, or other internal communications traversing any two or more of such colonies. . . . The subject of your own despatch of the 29th September, 1846, viz., the imposition of discriminating duties, in any Australian colony, on goods, the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other Australian colony, will also be adverted to, and provided for, in that part of the contemplated Act of Parliament which will relate to the creation of a central legislative authority for the whole of the Australian colonies."

RECEPTION OF THE DESPATCH.—This despatch was greeted in New South Wales with a storm of indignation. The colonists resented the idea of constitutional changes as to which they had not been consulted, and were especially alarmed at the suggestion of indirect election, which would take away the instalment of representative institutions which they had lately won. Public meetings were held everywhere to express "apprehension and dismay" at the proposed changes, and to protest against any change about which the people of the colony had not been consulted. But amidst all this uproar very little was said about the federal proposal. When mentioned at all, it was usually in a tone of mild approval—as being unobjectionable, and possibly even useful, but of little immediate importance.

In May, 1848, Mr. William Charles Wentworth brought before the Legislative Council of New South Wales a set of resolutions affirming that the separation of Port Phillip might be effected without any material change in the Constitution of New South Wales, and protesting generally against Earl Grey's proposals. One of these resolutions was "That the only useful amendment in our present Constitution suggested in the despatch is the proposition relative to a Congress from the various colonial legislatures in the Australian colonies, with power to pass laws on intercolonial questions; that such a Congress, if not too numerous, might be got together for short periods at certain intervals." A set of resolutions framed by a Committee of the Council was ultimately substituted, and these were considered in Committee. One of them, which was passed "almost without remark," declared "That this Council cannot acquiesce in any plan of an intercolonial Congress, in which the superior wealth and population of New South Wales, as compared with the other colonies of the Australian group, both individually and collectively, shall not be fully recognized as the basis of representation." These resolutions, however, never got beyond the Committee stage. Mr. Edward Deas-Thomson, Mr. Robert Lowe (afterwards Viscount Sherbrooke), and others, wished to express approval of the proposal for a two-chambered legislature; and in spite of the protests of Wentworth, who complained that this introduced a debatable detail into a question of constitutional principle, they succeeded in carrying it. On this rock the Council split. On Wentworth's motion, the resolutions were shelved by leave being obtained to sit again that day six months. Consequently, though the wish to protest was unanimous, no protest was ever made by the Council.

The "apprehension and dismay," however, had their effect. In a despatch of 31st July, 1848, Earl Grey disclaimed any wish to impose unwelcome constitutional changes on the colonies. The project of making District Councils serve as constituencies to the Legislature would be given up; and the division of the Legislature into two Houses would be left for the colonists themselves to effect whenever they wished. The idea of an intercolonial Legislature, however, was adhered to. Earl Grey pointed out that communication by land between New South Wales and Port Phillip was already completely established; that the trade of Port Phillip with South Australia was becoming not inconsiderable; and that the intercourse would yearly increase. If these portions of Australia were under independent legislatures, tariff differences would inevitably grow up. The extreme inconvenience of this would necessitate some means of providing for a uniform commercial policy, in order to give free scope for the development of their resources and their trade. How this could best be done was a question of some difficulty, which he reserved for more mature consideration.

COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.—The details of Earl Grey's scheme were soon forthcoming. In 1849 a Committee of the Privy Council—the Committee on Trade and Plantations—was commissioned to enquire into the constitutional changes which it might be advisable to make in the Government of the Australian colonies. (For the nature and history of this Committee, see Jenks' Government of Victoria, p. 3.) The Committee brought up a report in which it recommended that the southern part of New South Wales should be established as a separate colony, to be called Victoria; that each of the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Van Diemen's Land should have a legislature of one House, of whose members one-third were to be nominated by the Crown, and two-thirds elected; and that the Legislature of each colony should be empowered to alter its own Constitution. On the subject of a uniform tariff and a federal legislature the Committee reported as follows:—

“There yet remains a question of considerable difficulty. By far the larger part of the revenue of the Australian colonies is derived from duties on customs. But if, when Victoria shall have been separated from New South Wales, each province shall be authorized to impose duties according to its own wants, it is scarcely possible but that in process of time differences should arise between the rates of duty imposed upon the same articles in the one and in the other of them. There is already such a difference in the tariffs of South Australia and New South Wales, and although, until of late, this has been productive of little inconvenience, yet with the increase of settlers on either side of the imaginary line dividing them, it will become more and more serious. The division of New South Wales into two colonies would further aggravate this inconvenience, if the change should lead to the introduction of three entirely distinct tariffs, and to the consequent necessity for imposing restrictions and securities on the import and export of goods between them. So great indeed would be the evil, and such the obstruction of the intercolonial trade, and so great the check to the development of the resources of each of these colonies, that it seems to us necessary that there should be one tariff common to them all, so that goods might be carried from the one into the other with the same absolute freedom as between any two adjacent counties in England.

“We are further of opinion that the same tariff should be established in Van Diemen’s Land also, because the intercourse between that island and the neighbouring colonies in New Holland has arisen to a great importance and extent, and has an obvious tendency to increase. Yet fiscal regulations on either side of the intervening strait must of necessity check, and might perhaps to a great extent destroy, that beneficial trade.

“If the duties were uniform, it is obvious there need be no restrictions whatever imposed upon the import or export of goods between the respective colonies, and no motive for importing into one goods liable to duty which were destined for consumption in another; and it may safely be calculated that each would receive the proportion of revenue to which it would be justly entitled, or at all events that there would be no departure from this to an extent of any practical importance.

“Hence it seems to us that a uniformity in the rate of duties should be secured.

“For this purpose we recommend that a uniform tariff should be established by the authority of Parliament, but that it should not take effect until twelve months had elapsed from the promulgation in the several colonies of the proposed Act of Parliament. That interval would afford time for making any financial arrangements which the contemplated change might require in any of them, and by adopting the existing tariff of New South Wales (with some modifications, to adapt it to existing circumstances) as the general tariff for Australia, we apprehend that there would be no risk of imposing upon the inhabitants of these colonies a table of duties unsuited to their actual wants. We should not, however, be prepared to offer this recommendation, unless we proposed at the same time to provide for making any alteration in this general tariff which time and experience may dictate, and this we think can only be done by creating some authority competent to act for all those colonies jointly.

“For this purpose we propose that one of the Governors of the Australian colonies should always hold from Your Majesty a commission constituting him the Governor-General of Australia. We think that he should be authorized to convene a body to be called the General Assembly of Australia, at any time and at any place within Your Majesty’s Australian dominions which he might see fit to appoint for the purpose. But we are of opinion that the first convocation of that body should be postponed until the Governor-General should have received from two or more of the Australian legislatures addresses requesting him to exercise that power.

“We recommend that the General Assembly should consist of the Governor-General, and of a single House, to be called the House of Delegates. The House of Delegates should be composed of not less than 20 nor of more than 30 members. They should be elected by the legislatures of the different Australian colonies. We subjoin a schedule explanatory of the composition of this body, that is, of the total number of delegates, and of the proportions in which each colony should contribute to that number.

“We think that Your Majesty should be authorized to establish provisionally, and in the first instance, all the rules necessary for the election of the delegates, and for the conduct of the business of the General Assembly, but that it should be competent for that body to supersede any such rules and to substitute others, which substituted rules should not, however, take effect until they had received Your Majesty’s sanction.

“We propose that the General Assembly should also have the power of making laws for the alteration of the number of delegates, or for the improvement in any other respect of its own constitution. But we think that no such law should come into operation until it had actually been confirmed by Your Majesty.

“We propose to limit the range of the legislative authority of the General Assembly to the ten topics which we proceed to enumerate. These are :—

1. The imposition of duties upon imports and exports.
2. The conveyance of letters.
3. The formation of roads, canals, or railways, traversing any two or more of such colonies.
4. The erection and maintenance of beacons and lighthouses.
5. The imposition of dues or other charges on shipping in every port or harbour.
6. The establishment of a General Supreme Court, to be a Court of original jurisdiction or a Court of Appeal for any of the inferior Courts of the separate provinces.
7. The determining of the extent of the jurisdiction, and the forms and manner of proceeding of such Supreme Court.
8. The regulation of weights and measures.
9. The enactment of laws affecting all the colonies represented in the General Assembly, on any subject not specifically mentioned in the preceding list, but on which the General Assembly should be desired to legislate by addresses for that purpose presented to them from the Legislatures of all those colonies.
10. The appropriation to any of the preceding objects of such sums as may be necessary, by an equal percentage from the revenue received in all the Australian colonies, in virtue of any enactments of the General Assembly of Australia.

“By these means we apprehend that many important objects would be accomplished which would otherwise be unattainable, and by the qualification which we have proposed, effectual security would, we think, be taken against the otherwise danger of establishing a central legislature in opposition to the wishes of the separate legislatures, or in such a manner as to induce collisions of authority between them. The proceedings also of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, with reference to the proposed changes in the Constitution, lead us to infer that the necessity of creating some such general authority for the Australian colonies begins to be seriously felt.”

The schedule referred to was as follows :—

“Each colony to send two members, and each to send one additional member for every 15,000 of the population according to the latest census before the convening of the House.

“On the present population the numbers would be as follows :—

	Population by last Census.	Number of Members.
New South Wales ...	155,000	12
Victoria	33,000	4
Van Diemen's Land (de- ducting convicts) ...	46,000	5
South Australia, ...	31,000	4
	265,000	25

THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES GOVERNMENT BILL.—This report was adopted by the Privy Council, and Earl Grey forwarded it to the Governors of the three colonies with a despatch dated 24th May, 1849, in which he announced that a Bill, passed in strict accordance with the recommendations of the Committee, would be introduced forthwith into Parliament. This was done; and the “Bill for the Better Government of the Australian Colonies,” as first introduced in 1849, not only provided for the separation of Victoria, and for the establishment of a General Assembly on the lines of the report, but actually prescribed, and set out in a schedule, a uniform tariff for the four colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, Van Diemen's Land, and South Australia.

The colonies, however, did not take kindly to Earl Grey's well-meant constitutional schemes and “didactic despatches.” The Legislature of New South Wales, strangely enough, held its peace altogether, after the shelving of the discussion mentioned above. But the Legislative Council of South Australia, on 15th December, passed a resolution condemning the proposed General Assembly for the following reasons :—

1. There is a great dissimilarity in the pursuits and interests of the several provinces.
2. The overwhelming preponderance that the larger colonies would have in the Assembly would be greatly injurious to the lesser.
3. The Council cannot see any point upon which benefit would accrue to any of the provinces by the establishment of such an Assembly.

This opinion was endorsed by a public meeting held in Adelaide on 21st December to protest against the proposed constitutional changes. And from Tasmania Governor Denison, in a despatch of 28th December, though agreeing that “an absolute and unrestricted freedom of intercourse is most advantageous,” expressed a fear that the proposed uniform tariff would operate injuriously on the revenue of his colony.

Nor was the reception of the scheme in England more favourable. The Parliamentary Agent for New South Wales, Mr. Francis Scott, included the proposed General Assembly in a sweeping disparagement of the whole scheme (see despatch published in the Sydney Morning Herald, 26th November, 1850); whilst a writer in the Spectator (9th May, 1850; reprinted in the Sydney Morning Herald, 30th October) waxed sarcastic over the presumption of Downing-street in venturing to frame a tariff to suit all the Australian colonies. The Bill was dropped for the session; and in a despatch of 18th August, 1850, Earl Grey wrote that it would be reintroduced as soon as Parliament reassembled, but with one important modification. The provision for "a uniform tariff to be established by the Act itself, and unalterable except by the General Assembly when convoked," would be omitted. He emphasized the importance of intercolonial freetrade, but admitted that "enquiry and discussion have rendered it evident that the proposed uniformity could not be carried into practical effect without a variety of subsidiary arrangements which could only be well considered and matured on the spot."

The Bill, therefore, when reintroduced in 1850, did not impose a uniform tariff, but merely empowered the General Assembly to frame one. The scheme was also modified in other respects. The General Assembly was only to take effect as to such colonies as should signify their desire for its establishment. And one remarkable addition was made to the list of its powers by enabling it to make laws "for selling, demising, granting licenses for the occupation of, and otherwise disposing of, waste lands of the Crown in the colonies represented in such General Assembly, and for appropriation of money to arise from the disposition."

Both in the Commons and in the Lords the federal clauses were critically discussed, and the debates are interesting because they show a keen appreciation of the importance of the question. Both sides of the argument were well represented. On the one hand, the advantages of uniform legislation were urged; on the other, the measure was denounced as "republican," and as a step towards a declaration of independence. It was objected that the large colonies would overwhelm the small—to meet which argument the basis of representation was altered in Committee by increasing the element of equality, at the expense of the proportional element; that is to say, by allowing each colony four members, and an additional one for every 20,000 of population. And then it was objected that the small colonies would dominate the large. The weightiest arguments against the clauses, however, were that they were not asked for, and indeed were protested against, by the colonies, and that the scheme was premature. Earl Grey contended that these objections were met by the provision which left each colony free to join the General Assembly or not; and he claimed that within a few years such an Assembly would probably be found desirable, though he admitted that it was not likely to be established at once. The clauses were carried in Committee in both Houses; but the opposition which they had aroused ultimately induced the Government to abandon them before the Bill became law. The separation of Victoria, and the establishment of the new Constitutions, were accordingly effected without any provision for an intercolonial legislature.

DESPATCH ACCOMPANYING CONSTITUTION.—When sending out the new Constitutional Act (13 and 14 Vic. c. 59), Earl Grey wrote as follows of the federal clauses:—

“24. The clauses giving power for the establishment, under certain circumstances, of a General Assembly for two or more of the colonies were omitted from the Bill in its progress through the House of Lords. This omission was not assented to by Her Majesty’s Government in consequence of any change of opinion as to the importance of the suggestions on this point which are contained in the report of the Committee of the Privy Council. But it was found on examination that the clauses in question were liable to practical objections, to obviate which it would have been necessary to introduce amendments entering into details of legislation which there were no means of satisfactorily arranging without further communication with the colonies.

“25. Her Majesty’s Government have been the less reluctant to abandon, for the present, this portion of the measure which they proposed, inasmuch as even in New South Wales it appeared, as far as they could collect the opinion which prevails on the subject, not to be regarded as of immediate importance, while in the other colonies objections had been expressed to the creation of any such authority.

“26. I am not, however, the less persuaded that the want of some such central authority to regulate matters of common importance to the Australian colonies will be felt, and probably at a very early period; but when this want is so felt, it will of itself suggest the means by which it may be met. The several legislatures will, it is true, be unable at once to give the necessary authority to a General Assembly, because the legislative power of each is confined of necessity within its territorial limits; but if two or more of these legislatures should find that there are objects of common interest for which it is expedient to create such an authority, they will have it in their power, if they can settle the terms of an arrangement for the purpose, to pass Acts for giving effect to it, with clauses suspending their operation until Parliament shall have supplied the authority that is wanting. By such Acts the extent and objects of the powers which they are prepared to delegate to such a body might be defined and limited with precision, and there can be little doubt that Parliament, when applied to in order to give effect to an arrangement so agreed upon, would readily consent to do so.” (Despatch, 30th August, 1850; N.S.W. Votes and Proc., 1851, p. 37.)

REASONS OF FAILURE.—It is matter for regret that this opportunity was missed of sliding from the first, into some form of federal union; but Earl Grey’s scheme was foredoomed to failure. In the first place, it was unfortunate in its author. The colonists, struggling for self-governing institutions, had many grievances against the Colonial Office; and Earl Grey, in particular, had made himself intensely unpopular by his well-meant, though injudicious, attempts to remodel their institutions. Consequently the merits of this particular proposal hardly received due recognition. But apart from this, it is probable that the colonies, though recognizing the abstract advantages of a partial union, would have rebelled against any concrete proposal that could have been submitted. Each colony was chiefly bent on securing absolute power to manage its own affairs, and the importance of union was rather future than present. The whole ineffectual episode, however, is interesting for two reasons. In the first place, it showed that a satisfactory scheme of Australian union must be worked out in Australia, not in England. And in the second place, the different criticisms made upon the scheme in the different colonies afford an instructive parallel with the anti-federal objections of our own time, and show that the real difficulties of the problem were inherent from the first. Then, as now, Tasmania was more dependent than New South Wales upon a revenue tariff. Then, as now, New South Wales claimed predominance, and the smaller colonies feared being swallowed up. By constructing the General Assembly on a basis intermediate between equal representation and proportional representation, Earl Grey had done the best he could with a single Chamber; but to be effectual, each basis required a separate Chamber, and probably a two-chambered Federal Legislature would have been out of the question at that time. The Home Government can hardly be blamed for deciding that the problem was one which they could not solve, but which the colonies must be left to work out for themselves.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.—Earl Grey, however, did not give up his federal idea altogether. The establishment of a Federal Legislature was unavoidably postponed; but something like a Federal Executive could be created without statutory authority. Accordingly Earl Grey sent out to Sir Charles Fitzroy, the Governor of New South Wales, four separate Commissions appointing him Governor of New South Wales, Van Diemen's Land, South Australia, and Victoria respectively; and also another Commission appointing him "Governor-General of all Her Majesty's Australian possessions, including the colony of Western Australia." The Queen's representatives in the three colonies of Van Diemen's Land, South Australia, and Victoria were given the title of "Lieutenant-Governors" (Jenks' Government of Victoria, p. 155). In an accompanying despatch, dated 3rd January, 1851, it was explained that the Governor-General was not expected to interfere with matters affecting merely the internal administration of the other colonies. But the expanding interests and increasing relations of the colonies with each other would require concert on a variety of subjects, and the Governor of the mother colony ought to have a general authority to superintend the initiation and foster the completion of measures calculated to promote the common welfare. The Lieutenant-Governors would be instructed to communicate with the Governor-General as to all measures affecting intercolonial interests, and to be guided by his judgment on all such matters. Especially, as the relations of Victoria with New South Wales would necessarily be intimate, there should be no alteration of the import duties of either colony without previous communication between them. If any necessity should arise for the Governor-General to visit any of the colonies of Van Diemen's Land, South Australia, or Victoria, he would, by virtue of his commission as Governor of such colony, supersede the Lieutenant-Governor, and assume the Government during his stay (Parl. Papers, 1851, xxxv., 40).

The Governor of New South Wales was thus constituted a sort of advisory over-lord of the whole of Australia; and was also empowered in an emergency to exercise the functions of Governor of any of the three colonies of Van Diemen's Land, South Australia and Victoria. In other words, a kind of Federal Executive was, in name at least, actually constituted. But without a Federal Legislature the Governor-Generalship was little more than an empty title. The visiting power was never used at all—and indeed was never meant to be used except in some unforeseen emergency. When Sir Charles Fitzroy's term ended, the system of giving the Governor of New South Wales separate Commissions as Governor of the other colonies was dropped, and the Lieutenant-Governors were raised to the rank of full-blown Governors. The title of Governor-General continued to be borne by the Governor of New South Wales until the Governorship of Sir John Young in 1861, but it seems to have had little practical value. The only notable occasion on which the Governor-General concerned himself with intercolonial interests was when Sir W. Denison (then Governor of New South Wales) endeavoured in 1855 to secure harmony between the tariffs of New South Wales and Victoria. Shortly afterwards responsible government was inaugurated in both colonies, and the Commission of Governor-General fell into disuse. Its last shred of utility was, of course, gone when the several Governors ceased to have active control of the administration.

(3) THE CONSTITUTIONAL COMMITTEES OF 1853.

Meanwhile suggestions for federal union had come from statesmen in both New South Wales and Victoria. The colonists had been deeply disappointed with the Constitutions of 1850 (13 and 14 Vic. c. 59), and continued to agitate for the grant of responsible government similar to that which had been conceded to the Canadian provinces between 1841 and 1848. The Legislatures began by "Remonstrances," but soon proceeded to the more practical work of framing the desired Constitutions for themselves, according to the powers recently conferred on them.

WENTWORTH'S CONSTITUTIONAL COMMITTEE.—In New South Wales, a Select Committee of the Legislative Council was appointed in 1853, on Wentworth's motion, to prepare a new Constitution. On 28th July it brought up its report, with a draft Constitution Bill annexed. The Bill itself contained no federal provision; but the report concluded with the following recommendation:—

"One of the more prominent legislative measures required by this colony, and the colonies of the Australian group generally, is the establishment at once of a General Assembly, to make laws in relation to the intercolonial questions that have arisen, or may hereafter arise, among them. The questions which would claim the exercise of such a jurisdiction appear to be as follows:—

1. Intercolonial tariffs, and coasting trade.
2. Railways, roads, canals, &c., running through any two of the colonies.
3. Beacons and lighthouses on the coast.
4. Intercolonial penal settlements.
5. Intercolonial gold regulations.
6. Postage between the said colonies.
7. A general Court of Appeal from the courts of such colonies.
8. A power to legislate on all other subjects which may be submitted to them by addresses from the Legislative Councils and Assemblies of the other colonies; and to appropriate to any of the above objects the necessary sums of money, to be raised by a percentage on the revenues of all the colonies interested.

“As it might excite jealousy if a jurisdiction of this importance were to be incorporated in the Act of Parliament, which has unavoidably become a necessary part of the measures for conferring a Constitution on this colony, in consequence of the defective powers given by Parliament to the Legislative Council, your Committee confine themselves to the suggestion that the establishment of such a body has become indispensable, and ought no longer to be delayed; and to the expression of a hope that the Minister for the Colonies will at once see the expediency of introducing into Parliament, with as little delay as possible, a Bill for this express object.”

In this suggestion nothing was definite except the list of federal subjects. There was no hint of an opinion as to the shape which the Assembly ought to take; and we must suppose either that the Committee had not considered the matter, or that they were satisfied with the scheme already proposed by the Home Government. One thing is clear; however, that Wentworth himself did not at that time contemplate a real national unity for Australia, or indeed anything more than a General Assembly to secure uniform legislation on a few matters of common interest. In the course of the debate on the Constitution, he took occasion to ridicule the scheme propounded by Dr. Lang of a “great federation of all the colonies of Australia, of New South Wales, Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia; each State to have a separate local government and sending members to Congress to form a great central government.” These words, according to the report, were greeted by the House with “shouts of laughter”—directed in part, no doubt, at Dr. Lang’s republican ideas of “cutting the painter.” An elaborate scheme of Federation would certainly have been premature; but to a prophetic eye it need have had nothing of the ridiculous.

VICTORIAN CONSTITUTIONAL COMMITTEE.—The Committee appointed in Victoria in September, 1853, to draft a new Constitution for that colony, also dealt with the question, but in an even vaguer way. Its report contained these passages:—

“From the great extent of Australia, and the widely differing circumstances of its several colonies, your Committee do not think it essential for local legislation that uniformity of institutions should prevail. They have followed, as far as principle permitted, the Bills proposed in New South Wales and South Australia. . . .

“But they do feel most strongly that there are questions of such vital intercolonial interest that provision should be made for occasionally convoking a General Assembly for legislating on such questions as may be submitted to it by the Act of any Legislature of one of the Australian colonies.”

This report was dated 9th December, 1853, when the report of Wentworth's Committee had been available for some five months; but in place of Wentworth's list of eight subjects, it only proposed to give the General Assembly power to legislate on questions “submitted to it” by the legislatures.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S REPLY.—The Home Government, however, in enacting the Constitutions, did not think proper to make any provision for a General Assembly. The Constitution Acts (18 and 19 Vic. c. 54 and c. 55) were passed in 1855, and in the despatch accompanying them to Australia Lord John Russell, then Secretary of State for the Colonies in Lord Palmerston's Ministry, wrote:—“I need scarcely say that the question of introducing into the measures lately laid before Parliament clauses to establish a federal union of the Australian colonies for purposes of common interest has been very seriously weighed by Her Majesty's Government; but they have been led to the conclusion that the present is not a proper opportunity for such enactment, although they will give the fullest consideration to any propositions on the subject which may emanate in concurrence from the respective legislatures.”

There is no reason to suppose that Lord John Russell had changed his opinion as to the desirableness of a federal union; but Earl Grey's adventures had taught him that devising colonial constitutions, even with the best intentions in the world, was thankless work for an English statesman. Two of the Australian colonies had expressed opinions in favour of a General Assembly, but there had been no concurrence—and indeed no conference—on the subject between the colonies, and no definite scheme was before him. The colonies had, by dint of much remonstrance, obtained recognition of the right to frame their own constitutions; and the Home Government naturally preferred to await more definite propositions.

(4) AUSTRALIAN EFFORTS, 1854-1863.

In its next stage the movement began to take a more definite shape. Already in 1852 Dr. Lang had propounded an elaborate scheme of federation on the American plan (“Freedom and Independence for the Golden Lands of Australia”); but his bellicose tone and his clamour for separation from the mother-country robbed him of influence. In 1854 a series of thoughtful letters in the Sydney Morning Herald, over the signature of “John Adams,” dealt convincingly with the need of union, and discussed many of the details. The writer of these letters was the Rev. John West, then residing in Tasmania, but afterwards editor of the Sydney Morning Herald. Two years later the Herald returned to the theme, discussed the difficulties and the advantages, and recommended that the Home Government should take action by passing a law enabling the colonies to establish a federation. (Leading article, 23rd October, 1856. In Wentworth's Memorial the article is wrongly attributed to the Melbourne Argus.) And in the following week, on 29th October, 1856, Deas-Thomson, who had for many years been Colonial Secretary under the old official system, and who then represented the Parker Government in the Upper House, spoke hopefully in the House of the near probability of some federal arrangement. There were seven great questions, he said, which ought to be submitted to a representative Federal Assembly; namely, a uniform tariff, the land system, the management of the goldfields, postal communication, intercolonial railways, intercolonial telegraphs, and coast lighthouses.

WENTWORTH'S MEMORIAL.—These hints were not lost upon Wentworth, who was then living in England, and whose farewell words when leaving Australia in 1854 had been:—"Whatever may be my destiny, believe me that my latest prayer shall be for the happiness and prosperity of the people of Australia, and for its rapid expansion into a nation, which shall rule supreme in the southern world." (Sydney Morning Herald, 21st March, 1854.) He lost no time in showing not only that these words were sincere, but that his convictions of the importance of Australian union were deepening. He prepared a Memorial to Mr. Henry Labouchere, Secretary of State for the Colonies, and also the draft of a short Enabling Bill; and at a meeting of the "General Association for the Australian Colonies," held in London on 31st March, 1857, with Wentworth himself in the chair, the Memorial and the Draft Bill were adopted. For the Memorial and correspondence see Votes and Proc., Leg. Ass. of N.S.W., 1857, i. 383.

The Memorial emphasized the need of a Federal Assembly, and the inconvenience resulting from the want of it, and illustrated the "clumsy contrivances" that had to be resorted to where intercolonial action was necessary. It was "not to be wondered at that a strong feeling of discontent should be growing up among the inhabitants of these colonies; from their being compelled to resort to such indirect, tedious, and illegal expedients in substitution of that federal authority without which their several Constitutions must continue incomplete as regards all measures and undertakings which require the joint action and co-operation of any two or more of them." It referred to Earl Grey's scheme, to the report of the Constitutional Committee, to Deas-Thomson's recent speech, and to other indications of opinion, and besought the Government to anticipate graver inconveniences by taking action at once. A Federal Assembly could only originate in an Imperial Act of Parliament, which might either constitute such a body directly, or give to the Legislatures of any two or more colonies a permissive power to form a federation themselves. The latter course—the passing of a permissive Act—was what the Memorialists thought "the most desirable, if not the only course which can now be adopted." They expressed the opinion that "a complete equality of representation, as between all the Australian colonies, should be insisted upon, without reference to the extent of their population." They also suggested that to prevent jealousy the Federal Assembly might, in the first instance, be "perambulatory."

The Bill which was subjoined, and which contained only five short clauses, was merely an "Enabling Bill," with a few constitutional outlines thrown in. It empowered any two or more of the Legislatures of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania, to send four persons to form a Convention "for the purpose of creating a Federal Assembly." The only rules laid down by the Act for the constitution of the Assembly were—(1) that when created it should have power to amend its own constitution; (2) the extent of its legislative powers was defined, practically on the basis of Deas-Thomson's speech; (3) the Federal Assembly should be summoned by the Governor-General (or Senior Governor), and its Acts were to be subject to the Royal assent; (4) the Federal Assembly was to appoint its own president, and fix its own expenses and the salaries of its officers; (5) the necessary expenses were to be apportioned by the Federal Assembly among the several colonies, and were to be provided for by the several Legislatures; (6) any colony which did not join at the outset might afterwards join the Federation, and have the right of sending the same number of representatives as should be fixed for all the other colonies.

It is to be noticed that this Bill, whilst it provided for equal representation in the preliminary Convention, did not expressly bind the Convention to establish equal representation in the Federal Assembly; though the provision as to the representation of colonies which might afterwards join seemed to contemplate equal representation. It is also to be noticed that the Convention was empowered actually to establish a Federal Assembly, without further reference to the Imperial Parliament; and in the constitution of that Assembly it was to have a free hand, subject only to the conditions already mentioned. The use of the term "Federal Assembly" in place of "General Assembly" marks a distinct stage in advance, as showing that the national aspect was becoming more prominent. The scope of the legislative power of the Assembly was also enlarged, being defined to extend to tariffs, lighthouses, gauges of connecting railways, navigation of connecting rivers, intercolonial telegraphs and postage, the upset or minimum price of land, management of the gold-fields, coinage, weights and measures, defence, a court of appeal, penal settlements, and any other matter which might be submitted to it. On the other hand it was not to have any power of raising revenue for itself, but was to rely on contributions levied from the Legislatures of the colonies.

This notable scheme met with a discouraging reception from Labouchere, who, in acknowledging the Memorial, admitted the inconvenience arising from the want of means of joint action, but said that after weighing the reasons for and against the scheme, he had "arrived at the decided opinion that Her Majesty's Government would not in reality promote the object of the Memorialists by introducing such a measure as that of which the outlines are given in the Memorial, notwithstanding its purely permissive character." He thought that the colonies would not consent to entrust such large powers to an Assembly thus constituted, or to be bound by federal laws imposing taxation or involving appropriation; and even if they did consent to establish such a system, the result would probably be dissension and discontent. He would not think himself warranted in making such a proposal—merely permissive though it was—unless he were himself satisfied that it was founded on just and constitutional principles, and also that it was likely to be acceptable to the colonies concerned. He promised, however, to send copies of the correspondence to the several Governors, and to give his best attention to any suggestion which he might receive from the colonies in reply; and meantime he hoped that even if a federal scheme should prove impracticable and premature, much might be done by negotiation and concerted legislation.

Under the circumstances, Wentworth could do nothing but express his regret at the delay which the reference to the Governors would cause, and his hope that the reference would be made as soon as possible, that the opinions of the several Legislatures might be obtained.

Disappointing as Labouchere's decision may have seemed, the justness of his criticisms can to-day hardly be disputed. There were very slight indications that the colonies asked for a General Assembly at all—merely the reports of a couple of committees, the opinions of one or two statesmen, and some newspaper extracts. And there were no indications at all that the basis outlined in the Bill had any sanction from Australia. Nor is it certain that the colonies would have taken advantage of the Act if passed. In view of the extent to which colonial rights of self-government had already been conceded, postponement for further consideration by the colonies was no more than prudent.

VICTORIAN SELECT COMMITTEE.—Meanwhile the question of union was already being considered in Australia. In January, 1857, Mr. (afterwards Sir) Charles Gavan Duffy, who had recently arrived in Victoria, obtained the appointment of a Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly of that colony "to enquire into and report upon the necessity of a federal union of the Australasian colonies for legislative purposes, and the best means of accomplishing such an union if necessary." The Committee held five sittings, at only two of which a quorum was obtained—either from a want of interest in the question, or perhaps, as Mr. Rusden suggests in his History of Australia, from a suspicion that Mr. Duffy, like Dr. Lang, was aiming at a separation from the mother-country. Its report, which is a most interesting one, was not brought up till September. The Committee were unanimous as to the ultimate necessity of a federal union. As to the time of accomplishing it they differed; but they were all agreed that it was "not too soon to invite a mutual understanding on the subject," and they added that "most of us conceive that the time for union is come."

On the best means of originating the union they were also unanimous. No single colony ought to dictate the programme of union; the delicate and important questions involved could be solved only by a conference of delegates from all the colonies. The course they recommended, therefore, was "that such a Conference be immediately invited." As to the form which the union should take, they expressed no opinion at all; but they went on to state, in the form of queries, some of the questions which the Conference would have to face: whether there should be "merely a Consultative Council authorized to frame propositions for the sanction of the State Legislatures, or a Federal Executive and Assembly with supreme power on national and intercolonial questions, or some compromise between these extremes;" whether the Federal Legislature should consist of one or two branches; whether it was to have the power of taxation, or only of assessment on the several states; where the federal body should sit, or whether it should be rotatory, and so forth.

With regard to the Conference, they recommended specifically that each Legislature should send three delegates, two of whom might be members of Assembly and one member of Council; and that the Conference be empowered to frame a plan of federation to be afterwards submitted for approval, either to the Legislatures or directly to the people, or to both, and to receive final legislative sanction. The report concluded with the remark—apparently aimed at Wentworth's Memorial—that "your Committee are fully convinced that a negotiation demanding so much caution and forbearance, so much foresight and experience, must originate in the mutual action of the colonies, and cannot safely be relegated even to the Imperial Legislature."

The recommendations of the Committee were shortly afterwards adopted by both Houses of the Victorian Parliament, and were transmitted to the other colonies.

NEW SOUTH WALES SELECT COMMITTEE.—In August of the same year (1857) Deas-Thomson had obtained a Select Committee of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, "to consider and report on the expediency of establishing a Federal Legislature invested with the necessary power to discuss and determine all questions of an intercolonial character arising in the Australian colonies generally, and to suggest the manner in which the object can be best obtained." This Committee began their proceedings by agreeing that it was expedient to establish a Federal Assembly, and then went on to sketch out a scheme. They had before them Wentworth's Memorial, and followed in the main his suggestions. The initiative was taken by Sir W. W. Burton, an ex-judge of the Supreme Court, on whose motion it was resolved that the Federal Assembly should consist of delegates chosen by the several Legislatures; that each colony should be represented by an equal number of delegates, namely, four; and that the Assembly should have power to legislate on all intercolonial subjects which might be submitted to it by the Legislatures of two or more colonies interested, "and on no other subject." This last was the only substantial point on which the Committee's scheme differed from Wentworth's. Deas-Thomson then brought up a series of resolutions taken almost bodily from Wentworth's Bill—to which the Committee acknowledged their obligations—and these were carried. The Committee had evidently intended to embody this scheme in their report; but at this stage they received the report of the Victorian Select Committee, and determined to fall into line with it.

Their report, which was brought up in October, stated that the Committee had become forcibly impressed with the expediency of adopting some comprehensive measure for a Federal Assembly at as early a date as possible. They recognized the difficulties of suggesting a measure acceptable to all the colonies, but conceived that these difficulties would rather increase than diminish with delay. They were confident that when the advantages were considered, there would be such a concurrence of opinion as would lead to the adoption of some safe and practicable measure. They had no hesitation in recommending immediate action, in the firm belief that the Federal Union of the Australian colonies would contribute more effectually to their general prosperity and advancement than any other measure that could be devised.

They pointed out that the matter could not be definitely settled without Imperial legislation, "to which there would, of course, be no objection if the general principles of the measure were previously agreed upon"—a phrase which indicates their acquiescence in Labouchère's reply to Wentworth. They also referred to that reply "as establishing the fact that no measure providing for federal union will be adopted unless initiated and recommended by the colonies themselves."

They heartily endorsed the Victorian proposition of a Conference, which they unanimously recommended to the House. They explained that before receiving the Victorian report they had made some progress in drawing up the outlines of a scheme, and they referred to these proceedings, not with the intention of dictating their views, but in the hope of assisting the delegates, if appointed.

Finally, they expressed a decided opinion that the matter could no longer be postponed without the danger of creating serious antagonism and jealousy, which would embarrass, if not entirely prevent, its future settlement on a satisfactory basis. Accordingly, they urged that the concurrence of the Assembly be invited, and further steps taken without delay.

The Committee were evidently in earnest; and had they been well backed up, union might have been achieved. Unfortunately, however, other influences were at work. During the deliberations of the Committee, the Parker Government, of which Deas-Thomson was a member, had been replaced by the Cowper administration, with Mr. (afterwards Sir) James Martin as Attorney-General and the dominating personality of the Cabinet. Neither Cowper nor Martin cared anything for federal union; and the colony, in the exercise of newly-won responsible government, was engrossed in such questions as the franchise, the reform of the Upper House, and the land question. Moreover the rivalry between New South Wales and Victoria was already leading to jealousy and bad feeling. The stream of immigration to the goldfields had suddenly given Victoria the lead in population; and Duffy's overtures were received with suspicion, as part of a scheme of Victorian aggrandisement. Deas-Thomson succeeded in securing the adoption of his report by the Council, which then sent a message to the Assembly, asking its concurrence in joint resolutions. Joint resolutions, based on the Victorian recommendations, were agreed to in conference, and their consideration by the Assembly was fixed for 18th December; but on 17th December the Cowper Government was defeated on a Crown Lands Bill, and a dissolution followed. On the reassembling of Parliament in March, 1858, the federal question was shelved. The Governor's speech announced that "the question of a Federal Legislature is still under discussion by the Legislatures of the neighbouring colonies, but I am of opinion that the consideration of this subject may, without inconvenience, be deferred to future consideration." This announcement was received without protest. In the Address-in-Reply, the Assembly agreed that the discussion "may, under existing circumstances, be deferred;" whilst the Council resolved more emphatically that it "must, under existing circumstances, be deferred." No hint was given of what the "circumstances" were; but they doubtless comprised suspicion of Victoria, and an engrossing interest in domestic legislation. Deas-Thomson seems to have resigned himself to the inevitable.

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN SELECT COMMITTEES.—In South Australia, Select Committees of each House were appointed in 1857 to consider the question of federal union, and in November they brought up reports couched in identical terms. They were of opinion that under existing circumstances the formation of a Federal Legislature would be premature, but that nevertheless there were so many topics in which the colonies had a common interest, and in which uniform legislation would be desirable, that it was expedient to adopt some measures to secure these objects. They mentioned, as subjects which might be added to Wentworth's list, the following:—Patents and copyrights, law of insolvency, professional qualifications, uniform time of meeting of Parliaments. With a view to the discussion of the question, they adopted the Victorian suggestion that a Conference should be held; but they recommended that it should not be authorized to bind the Legislature, but only to discuss and report. These recommendations were adopted by both houses, and delegates were appointed to represent South Australia at any Conference which might be held.

OTHER PROCEEDINGS.—Notwithstanding the backwardness of New South Wales, Mr. Duffy kept up his exertions, and in December, 1857, obtained a second Select Committee of the Victorian Assembly, which in the following February brought up a progress report, urging that delegates should be appointed to meet the delegates from other colonies. This report was adopted by both Houses. Shortly afterwards the Tasmanian Parliament took the question up. The House of Assembly resolved "That in the event of the Conference of delegates from the Australian colonies assembling previously to the next meeting of Parliament, it will be expedient that this colony should be represented at such Conference." The Council concurred, and delegates were appointed, to act in such capacity only until the next session.

In January, 1860, Mr. Duffy obtained a third Select Committee, which in February brought up a progress report recommending a renewal of negotiations with New South Wales, South Australia, and Tasmania, for a Conference on the subject of Federal Union. It was pointed out that the two latter colonies, when a Conference was first proposed, had promptly acceded; and "though an objection originated with New South Wales which retarded any joint action," there was reason to believe that it was of a temporary nature, and had disappeared before the urgency with which the question was invested by the necessity of a united defence of Australia in case of war. The disappearance of the "temporary objection" in New South Wales is presumably an allusion to the downfall of the Cowper Ministry; and Mr. Duffy's renewed invitation seems to have been inspired by the hope that Mr. William Forster, the new Premier of New South Wales, would be more favourable. But he was once more disappointed. The resolutions were forwarded to the other colonies, and the Governments of South Australia and Tasmania promised to give the matter attention. But New South Wales took no steps whatever. Dr. Lang, indeed, in the Legislative Assembly, obtained Select Committees in two consecutive sessions to consider the question; but though the Committees met and deliberated, no report was brought up.

QUEENSLAND.—In 1859 the Moreton Bay district was severed from New South Wales and became the new colony of Queensland. The Victorian Government accordingly included Queensland in their last invitation. The Colonial Secretary of that colony, Mr. (afterwards Sir) R. G. W. Herbert, in reply, stated that his Executive Council approved of the Conference, as a means of ascertaining the views of the colonies, and determining how far a federal union would be either practicable or expedient. On both these points the Council, with the information before them, entertained serious doubts. Without wishing to prejudge the question, they saw grave obstacles to the creation of a central authority which might "tend to limit the complete independence of the scattered communities peopling this continent," or interfere with their direct relations with the mother-country. At the same time, they were alive to the importance of uniform legislation on certain subjects, and were willing to discuss the matter in Conference.

Queensland, in short, was not enamoured of the federal idea. She was enjoying her new isolation, and looked on federation as a kind of re-annexation. "Complete independence" was her ideal for the moment.

FAILURE OF FEDERAL PROPOSALS.—For the time, therefore, the project of a federal union failed. That there was no Conference on the subject was due to the backwardness of New South Wales; but even had a Conference been held, it is more than doubtful whether there would have been any practical result. In no colony was there any general enthusiasm, or even interest, in the subject; though in all there were a few far-sighted statesmen who recognized the essential unity of Australia. Even in Victoria, whose statesmen showed the most eagerness for union, there was nothing approaching a real federal movement. Local politics, and the development of local institutions, engrossed the attention of the people; and probably no colony would have been prepared to accept the compromises and the partial sacrifice of local independence which a federal union would have involved. The best justification of the inaction of the Imperial Government is the want of interest shown by the colonies themselves.

(5) THE TARIFF QUESTION, 1855-1880.

Though Federation proved unattainable for the time, continued efforts were made to mitigate the evils arising from conflicting tariffs and intercolonial duties. These constituted the chief practical inconvenience of disunion; and there were many attempts to establish border treaties, commercial reciprocity, intercolonial freetrade, or customs unions. To take up the story of these it is necessary to go back a few years.

TARIFF DIFFERENCES.—We have seen (p. 79, supra) how the tariffs of the colonies drifted apart from the first. In August, 1852, shortly after the separation of Victoria, Deas-Thomson succeeded in greatly simplifying the tariff of New South Wales by restricting it to a very few articles—chiefly stimulants, narcotics, tea, coffee, and sugar. In the same month an almost identical tariff was established in Victoria. South Australia and Tasmania, however, retained longer lists of dutiable articles; and so early as 1854 Victoria began to increase her duties. Deas-Thomson, however, still hoped to see uniformity established; and in September, 1855—on the eve of the establishment of Responsible Government—the Governor-General, Sir W. Denison (presumably at Deas-Thomson's suggestion), sent a message to the Legislative Council recommending the assimilation of the New South Wales tariff to that of Victoria. (Notes and Proc., Leg. Ass. of N.S.W., 1855, i. 233.) He pointed out the objections which existed to the maintenance of custom-houses on the Murray border, and to differences between the tariffs of the two colonies. At the time of separation an attempt had been made to provide against these difficulties by creating a General Assembly; but this attempt had failed. The result had been the adoption of different tariffs in the two colonies, and as a corollary the establishment of custom-houses on the common border. That system, if continued, would lead to great annoyance; and he had suggested to Sir Charles Hotham, the Governor of Victoria, that it would be desirable for the Governments of the two colonies to agree not to levy any duties on goods passing by land from one colony to the other. The difference between the tariffs of the two colonies would, however, throw difficulties in the way of such an agreement; and seeing that the state of the revenue in New South Wales required a revision of the tariff, he suggested that it was a favourable opportunity to bring the two tariffs into harmony by adopting the Victorian tariff. In his letter to Sir Charles Hotham, Sir William Denison expressed his expectation that, when uniformity was once secured, future modifications of the respective tariffs would be discussed between the two Governments.

The Council, however, did not altogether accept this advice, and modified the Governor-General's tariff; but the tariff as finally adopted was still a rough approximation to that of Victoria.

MURRAY CUSTOMS TREATIES.—Two kinds of traffic had to be dealt with in connection with the collection of customs on the Murray. First, there was the traffic across the river between the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria. Then there was the traffic up and down the river, which, when the navigability of the Murray had once been established, soon became considerable, and which involved the three colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia. Immediately after the adoption of the New South Wales tariff of 1855, an agreement was made between the Governments of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, that no duties should be collected on goods crossing the Murray, and that duties on goods carried up the Murray from South Australia, for consumption in New South Wales or Victoria, should be collected by the South Australian Government according to the South Australian tariff, the proceeds being divided equally between New South Wales and Victoria. These arrangements were validated by statute in each colony. (In Victoria, by the Customs Regulation Act, 1854, 17 Vic. No. 17; in New South Wales by the Murray Customs Duties Act, 1855, 19 Vic. No. 21; in South Australia by the Murray Customs Act, 1856, No. 6.) Accordingly, on 1st November, 1855, trade between New South Wales and Victoria, across the river Murray, became free. At that time the balance of trade was with New South Wales, and the freedom of the Murray was conceded by Victoria at the request of New South Wales. Dissatisfaction, however, soon arose. New South Wales complained that by the adoption of the South Australian tariff on Murray-borne goods she was losing revenue—especially on tobacco. Victoria complained that equal distribution of the duties collected by South Australia was not fair, seeing that most of the Murray-borne goods were for consumption in Victoria. In 1857, after much correspondence (Votes and Proc., L.A. of N.S.W., 1862, ii. 647), during which an assimilation of tariffs was unsuccessfully mooted, a new arrangement was made, by which the New South Wales tariff was adopted as that which the Government of South Australia should levy on Murray-borne goods. This arrangement was sanctioned in New South Wales by the River Murray Customs Act, 1857, and in South Australia by the Murray Customs Act, 1857, No. 2, and remained in force until 1864.

UNIFORM TARIFF PROPOSALS.—In March, 1862, the Colonial Secretary of South Australia opened a correspondence with the other colonies on the subject of the desirability of a uniform tariff in all the colonies. (Votes and Proc., Leg. Ass. of N.S.W., 1862, ii. 647.) He expressed the opinion that, until the means of communication improved, complete Federation would be impossible. Meanwhile, as one step towards union, his Government intended to seek legislative authority for admitting free of duty the produce of any colony which made a reciprocal concession; and he suggested an intercolonial Conference at Melbourne to consider the question of a uniform tariff. The proposal was favourably received. Mr. Duffy, still intent on a Federal Union, promptly obtained a fourth Select Committee, which brought up a report urging that the Conference on a uniform tariff would afford a favourable opportunity to consider the larger question of Australian Federation. This report was adopted by both Houses of the Victorian Parliament, but met with no response from the other colonies. The Conference, after some delay, met at Melbourne in March, 1863, being attended by three delegates from each of the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania. The subject of Federation was not considered at all; the Conference reporting that "although the question has, during some years, occupied the attention of several of the Legislatures, the delegates had no instructions in the matter, and it did not seem probable that its discussion at present would be attended with any benefit." Several subjects of intercolonial administration and legislation were dealt with; but the most important part of the business was the discussion of the question of a uniform tariff, intercolonial freetrade, and the fair distribution of the customs duties.

The Conference resolved that it was "desirable to settle the basis of a uniform tariff for the Australian colonies, and also for Tasmania." They agreed that the ad valorem mode of levying duties was open to so many objections that it ought not to be resorted to; and they framed a tariff, the adoption of which they undertook to urge upon their respective Parliaments. They also gave it as their opinion that the tariff which had been agreed upon, after the fullest deliberation, ought not to be altered by any one colony, nor without consideration at a future Conference.

Then came the question of intercolonial duties and their distribution. On this point the Conference resolved that "customs duties ought to be paid to the revenues of those colonies by whose population the dutiable articles were consumed." The strict fulfilment of this would have involved the maintenance of the objectionable border custom-houses; so they added a resolution to the effect that the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia ought to co-operate to secure to each the revenue to which it was legally entitled, either by distribution of the revenue in proportion to population, or by some other mode which might be considered equitable and practicable.

New South Wales and Victoria, however, failed to agree on any "equitable mode" of distributing the revenue. Cowper, for New South Wales, offered to accept any one of three methods: either (1) division according to population; or (2) keeping entries of border imports and making periodical settlements between the Governments; or (3) payment of a fixed annual sum to New South Wales, estimated on the excess of revenue lost by New South Wales, as compared with Victoria, by the freedom of the border. None of these propositions, however, satisfied the Victorian Premier, Mr. (afterwards Sir) James McCulloch, who "failed to discover any equitable grounds for disturbing the existing arrangement entered into at the instance of the Government of New South Wales." The "existing arrangement" was the freedom of the border without any adjustment of accounts. This did not suit New South Wales. The claim of that colony to receive the revenue on imports consumed in the colony arose from the fact that the balance of intercolonial trade was at that time with Victoria. As Victoria definitely rejected all the terms proposed, the New South Wales Government put an end to the "existing arrangement," and on 19th September, 1864, began to collect duties on the Murray, having previously passed an Act (7 Vic. No. 24) to remove doubts as to the legality of this course.

In April, 1865, at the instance of New South Wales, a Conference was held at Sydney between representatives of the two colonies to reconsider the matter. (Votes and Proc., L.A. of N.S.W., 1865, i. 675). As a result a new agreement was entered into, by which on 1st September, 1865, the Murray border again became free, subject to a yearly payment of a fixed sum by Victoria to New South Wales. The duties on Murray-borne goods from South Australia were to be collected by Victoria, according to the Victorian tariff. This agreement was revised in 1867, and expired on 1st February, 1872. (Votes and Proc., L.A. of N.S.W., 1867-8, ii. 305; N.S.W. Act, 31 Vic. No. 1.) At the Conference of 1873 a new agreement was entered into; but Victoria retired from it on 31st January, 1873, owing to the abolition, under the Parkes Administration, of the New South Wales ad valorem duties which had been imposed by the Cowper Administration seven years previously. Since that date all attempts at agreement have failed, owing to the great difference between the tariffs of the two colonies, and duties have been collected on the border. For attempts at a similar agreement with Queensland, see N.S.W. Act, 25 Vic. No. 20; Votes and Proc., L.A. of N.S.W., 1871-2, i. 873. In 1876 an Act was passed in New South Wales (Border Duties Convention Act) to authorize Conventions with any of the adjoining colonies, but without any definite result.

INTERCOLONIAL CONFERENCES, 1863-1880.—During the whole of this period Intercolonial Conferences were resorted to, with varying success, as the only available method of securing uniform legislation and concerted administration on subjects of common concern. A certain amount of joint action was thus secured with respect to such matters as lighthouses, ocean postal services, telegraphic communication with Europe, alien immigration, defence, and so forth. Most of these Conferences had no direct bearing on the question of Federation, except to show the utter inadequacy of this method of dealing with intercolonial questions. (See G. B. Barton, Historical Sketch of Australian Federation, pp. 12-14.)

One of these Conferences, which was held at Melbourne in March, 1867, is of special interest, as it brings Mr. (afterwards Sir) Henry Parkes—then Colonial Secretary of New South Wales in the second Martin administration—into prominent notice as an advocate of Federation. The Conference met to discuss the question of postal communication with Europe, the Imperial Government having offered to pay half the subsidy for a steam postal service between Point de Galle (in Ceylon) and Australia. The Conference, however, had larger ideas; it passed resolutions in favour of establishing a fortnightly service by three routes—Torres Straits, Suez, and Panama—the colonies undertaking to pay half the necessary subsidy. A memorial to the Queen was drawn up, and it was resolved that a Federal Council should be established to carry the resolutions into effect. Mr. Parkes addressed to the Conference these notable words:—

"I think the time has arrived when these colonies should be united by some federal bond of connection. I think it must be manifest, to all thoughtful men, that there are questions projecting themselves upon our attention, which cannot be satisfactorily dealt with by any one of the individual Governments. I regard this occasion, therefore, with great interest, because I believe it will inevitably lead to a more permanent federal understanding. I do not mean to say that, when you leave this room to-night, you will see a new constellation of six stars in the heavens. I do not startle your imagination, by asking you to look for the footprints of six young giants in the morning dew, when the night rolls away; but this I feel certain of, that the mother-country will regard this congress of the colonies just in the same light as a father and mother may view the conduct of their children when they first observe those children beginning to look out for homes and connections for themselves. I am quite sure that the report of this meeting in your city of Melbourne, little as it may be thought of here, will make a profound impression upon the minds of thoughtful statesmen in England. They will see that, for the first time, these offshoots of Empire in the Southern Hemisphere can unite, and that, in their union, they are backed by nearly 2,000,000 souls."—Melbourne Argus, 18th March, 1867.

A Bill to establish the proposed Federal Council was shortly afterwards introduced by Mr. Parkes in the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales. This Bill, to which the resolutions of the Conference were annexed in the schedule, was carried through both Houses, and reserved for the Royal assent. It was, however, shelved by the Home Government. The Duke of Buckingham, then Secretary for State, informed the Governor of New South Wales, in a despatch dated 5th January, 1868, that if the resolutions in the schedule had received Imperial assent, or had continued to command the assent of the colonies, or if the Act had created a Federal Council to deal generally with postal communication or any other subject of inter-colonial interest, he would have recommended that it be assented to; but as the powers of the Council were confined to a definite scheme, to the details of which Her Majesty's Government could not agree, he was unable to submit it to the Queen.—Votes and Proc., Leg. Ass. of N.S.W., 1868-9, i. 535.

COMMERCIAL FEDERATION.—Besides the border treaties, continued efforts were made to secure some more comprehensive scheme of customs union or commercial reciprocity. The Constitutions of all the Australasian colonies, except New Zealand, contained a prohibition—originating in the Australian Colonies Government Act of 1850 (13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, sec. 31)—against any duties upon imports from "any particular country or place" which were not equally imposed on imports from "all other countries and places whatsoever." These prohibitions stood in the way of colonial legislation for reciprocity; and in 1866 the Executive Council of New South Wales adopted a minute asking for their repeal so far as to allow free importation from any one colony. (See despatch from Sir John Young to the Secretary for State, 21st December, 1866; Votes and Proc., L.A. of N.S.W., 1868-9, ii. 109.) Lord Buckingham, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, replied in a despatch of 7th January, 1868, that the Home

Government would gladly aid the establishment of a Customs Union embracing all the adjacent colonies, and providing for a uniform tariff, intercolonial freetrade, and an equal division of the customs duties; they might even consider any partial relaxation of the existing rule; but they could not propose the repeal of the clause which prevented differential duties. That would enable the colonies to discriminate against foreign nations, and even against the mother-country, and might seriously embarrass treaty relations. Thereupon the Government of New Zealand proposed an intercolonial Conference to consider the question of a Customs Union. In 1870 Tasmania renewed the proposal; and a Conference was accordingly held at Melbourne, in June and July, 1870, between delegates from New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania, at which the most important question considered was the establishment of a Customs Union, with a uniform tariff and intercolonial freetrade. (Votes and Proc., L.A. of N.S.W., i. 583.)

This time the uniform tariff was the stumbling-block. All the colonies agreed that a uniform tariff was desirable; but when they proceeded to frame such a tariff, the fiscal policies of New South Wales and Victoria proved irreconcilable. The Victorian delegates (Messrs. J. G. Francis and James McCulloch) absolutely declined to surrender the principle, recognized by the Victorian tariff, of discriminating between raw materials and manufactured goods. The New South Wales delegates (Messrs. Charles Cowper and Saul Samuel) declined to consider any proposition to amend their tariff in the direction of such a principle. On articles subject to a "fixed" duty—such as spirits, wines, beer, tobacco, tea, &c.—an agreement could probably have been arrived at; but the determination of each colony to adhere to its fiscal principles made a Customs Union between them impossible.

An effort was then made to patch up an agreement between Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania; but here again insuperable difficulties disclosed themselves. With a Customs Union of all the colonies, Victoria had been willing to agree to intercolonial freetrade and the distribution of revenue on a population basis. But with New South Wales standing out, Victoria considered that "the prospective advantages were diminished," and offered very different terms—namely, that distribution should be governed by contribution, that the Victorian tariff should be accepted as the common basis, and that the Victorian Parliament should retain the power to alter the tariff. The other colonies promptly rejected this proposal, and all hope of a Customs Union fell through.

The Conference reported, however, that though they had not arrived at a definite conclusion, they had a deep conviction of the importance of the question; and they prepared a memorial to the Home Government praying for the removal of the existing restrictions on intercolonial commercial treaties.

On 31st July, 1871, Lord Kimberley, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, sent a circular despatch to the several Governors on the subject of colonial tariffs. (Votes and Proc., L.A. of N.S.W., 1871-2, i. 845.) He had received despatches from several of the Governors, intimating a desire for reciprocal agreements, and had received reserved Bills from New Zealand and Tasmania dealing with the subject. Like the Duke of Buckingham, he objected to conceding a general power to make reciprocal arrangements, but was favourable to a Customs Union with a uniform tariff. He cited the British treaty with the German Zollverein, to show that differential duties in the colonies would infringe the treaty obligations of the Empire.

Thereupon a further Conference was held at Melbourne in September, 1871, at which New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania were represented. Lord Kimberley's despatch was discussed, and some very plainly-worded resolutions were passed, claiming that the colonies had a right to enter into arrangements for reciprocity, that no Imperial treaty should limit this right, and that Imperial interference with colonial fiscal policies should absolutely cease. Lord Kimberley replied in a lengthy despatch of 19th April, 1872, in which he invited a "friendly discussion" of the whole question. He argued that compliance with the request would involve not only the repeal of the prohibition in the various Constitutions, but also the exclusion of the colonies from future commercial treaties containing stipulations against differential duties. (Votes and Proc., L.A. of N.S.W., 1872, i. 1015.)

Finally, a Conference, convened by Sir Henry Parkes, was held at Sydney in January and February, 1873, at which all the seven colonies were represented. With regard to intercolonial reciprocity, it was resolved to urge on Lord Kimberley the claims of the colonies, and to adopt a memorial to the Home Government for the removal of the restrictions which prevented the colonies agreeing to admit the products of any colony into any other colony free of duty. As to a Customs Union, it was resolved by a majority of one that such a union would be desirable, on the understanding that customs duties ought only to be levied for purposes of revenue, and not for purposes of protection. (Votes and Proc., L.A. of N.S.W., 1872-3, i. 1161.)

Lord Kimberley, though he maintained his own opinion, yielded to these repeated demands of the colonies, and introduced the Australian Colonies Duties Bill of 1873, which was passed, though Earl Grey and others opposed it as a step to commercial disunion. It merely provides that the legislature of any of the Australian colonies shall, for the purpose of carrying into effect any agreement with any other of such colonies, have full power to make laws for the remission or imposition of import duties on articles imported from such other colonies.

The colonies thus obtained full statutory powers to enter into arrangements for reciprocity, but the power was never used. The constitutional obstacle was removed, but the practical difficulties in the way of any customs union, short of the establishment of a Federal Parliament, remained.

VICTORIAN ROYAL COMMISSION, 1870.—After the failure of Deas-Thomson's and Duffy's Select Committees, very little was heard of any real proposal for Federation until 1870, when Mr. Duffy made a final effort. He secured the appointment, on 31st August, of a Royal Commission "to consider and report upon the necessity of a Federal Union of the Australian colonies for legislative purposes, and the best means of accomplishing such a union." On 3rd October the Commission brought up a "first report." As usual, there was unanimity as to the advantages of a Federal Union. As to the means of effecting a union, it was recognized that the form of union must be left to be decided by an accredited intercolonial Conference, and by the several legislatures. Opinion in the colonies seemed to be divided between a Constitution like that of the recently created Canadian Dominion on the one hand, or a mere Federal Council on the other. But they thought that a preliminary step, as to which there would probably be little difference of opinion, would be a permissive Imperial Act, authorizing the Queen to establish a Federal Union of any colonies which should agree upon terms. They thought that the best means of accomplishing a union was to remove, by such an Act, all legal impediments to it, and leave the colonies to determine, by negotiation among themselves, how and when they would avail themselves of the opportunity. They proposed to frame, and print with their second report, a Bill of this kind for transmission to the Imperial Parliament. Then followed some rather startling suggestions as to granting the colonies "sovereign rights" of making treaties, and remaining neutral in time of war—suggestious to which some of the delegates declined to subscribe. Neither the promised "second report" nor the proposed Bill were ever issued; and though the above report was circulated, no further steps were taken.

CONFERENCE OF 1880-1.—A distinct stage in the Federal movement is marked by a Conference which met at Melbourne in November and December, 1880, and afterwards at Sydney in the following January. (Votes and Proc., L.A. of N.S.W., 1881, i. 329.) At its first meeting only the three colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia were represented. Sir Henry Parkes submitted the "basis of a possible agreement as to customs duties." Briefly, it was to the effect that uniform duties of customs and excise should be levied on spirits, tobacco, and beer—such duties to be fixed, for the most part, at the highest rates then prevailing; that no customs duties should be levied except at the seaports; and that balances should be adjusted between the Governments on the basis of the intercolonial trade statistics of 1878-80. He declared that New South Wales was prepared to sign a Convention for three or five years on such a basis. The restriction of uniformity to the articles mentioned, of course, shirked the burning question of freetrade and protection. Mr. (afterwards Sir) Graham Berry, for Victoria, maintained that the only satisfactory solution of the border question was a completely uniform tariff—more than hinting, however, that the tariff must be mainly that of Victoria. The matter was discussed, and postponed to the Sydney session.

Resolutions were also passed, at the instance of Sir Henry Parkes, affirming (1) that the time had arrived when a Federal Council should be created to deal with intercolonial matters; (2) that such Council might be constituted, with limited powers, by Acts of the several Parliaments, each colony having an equal number of representatives:

(3) that the control of each colony over its own revenue should be preserved intact; and (4) that New South Wales should be requested to prepare the necessary Bill, to be submitted to the Conference at its next meeting.

The Sydney session in January was joined by delegates from all the seven colonies. The proposal of a uniform tariff ended with a mere recommendation that a joint commission should be appointed to frame a common tariff, and that the number of commissioners from each colony should be—Victoria, three; New South Wales, New Zealand, South Australia, and Queensland, two each; Tasmania and Western Australia, one each. No such commission was ever appointed, so that the proposal, like every other proposal for a uniform tariff, ended in talk.

The scheme for a Federal Council got a little further. Sir Henry Parkes brought up the promised Bill, together with the following interesting memorandum: "In respect to the Federal Council Bill now submitted, the following positions are assumed as hardly open to debate:—

- "1. That the time is not come for the construction of a Federal Constitution, with an Australian Federal Parliament.
- "2. That the time is come when a number of matters of much concern to all the colonies, might be dealt with more effectually by some federal authority than by the colonies separately.
- "3. That an organization which would lead men to think in the direction of federation, and accustom the public mind to federal ideas, would be the best preparation for the foundation of Federal Government.

"The Bill has been prepared to carry out the idea of a mixed body, partly legislative and partly administrative, as the forerunner of a more matured system of Federal Government. Care has been taken throughout to give effective power to the proposed Federal Council within prescribed limits, without impairing the authority of the colonies represented in that body.

"No attempt has been made to constitute the proposed council on any historical model, but the object has been to meet the circumstances of the present Australian situation, and to pave the way to a complete federal organization hereafter."

This memorandum, and Sir Henry Parkes' previous resolutions, define very clearly his federal policy at that time. The main obstacle to complete Federation was the difference in fiscal policy between New South Wales and Victoria. Victorian statesmen would not listen to any uniform tariff proposal except on the basis of protection; New South Wales statesmen were equally determined to maintain freetrade; and neither were willing to entrust the question to the free decision of a Federal Legislature. Neither a simple customs union, nor a Federation involving a customs union, was for the time attainable. Sir Henry Parkes believed that a time would come when the people of both colonies would place Federation above the fiscal question, and would be ready to entrust the settlement of that question to their joint representatives; but meanwhile the only form of Federation possible would be one which left the fiscal question out altogether. He believed that such a preliminary union would prepare the way for a more complete Federation.

The correctness of Sir Henry Parkes' judgment, that the time was not come for a more complete Federation, was strikingly shown in the Conference itself. An apple of discord was thrown into the discussion by Mr. Graham Berry, who made the startling proposition that, as the Council would need revenue of some kind, the revenues arising from the sale and occupation of public lands should be transferred to it. This suggestion received no support except from the Victorian delegates. It was presumably intended to prove, by a reductio ad absurdum, the uselessness and impracticability of a Federation which did not control the customs revenue.

A motion, that the Conference should agree to the Bill, and recommend it to the legislatures, was then put, and resulted in an equal division. New South Wales, South Australia, and Tasmania voted for it; Victoria, Queensland, and New Zealand against; whilst the West Australian delegates did not vote at all. The proposal for a Federal Council had, therefore, to be abandoned.

The only federal institution as to which the Conference could agree was an Australian Court of Appeal. A Bill for this purpose was framed and approved, and a resolution was passed recommending the Legislatures to memorialize the Home Government with a view to Imperial legislation on the subject. But recommendation is one thing, and action another; nothing further was done.

(6) THE FEDERAL COUNCIL.

EVENTS OF 1883.—Up to the year 1883 every proposal for any kind of Federation—complete or partial—had failed altogether. Some small degree of uniform legislation had been attained by conference; some temporary border treaties had been entered into between individual colonies; but no basis had been agreed on for any form of political union. But the events of 1883 helped to draw closer the bonds between the colonies, and to emphasize the need of joint action.

In June, 1883, the last section of the railway line between Sydney and Melbourne was completed, and the long-delayed junction between the railway systems of the two colonies was thus effected at the Murray River. A banquet held at Albury on that occasion, and attended by the Governors of both colonies and by many prominent statesmen, affords an interesting historical record of the after-dinner views of prominent men on the subject of Federation. The union of railways irresistibly suggested the greater political union; but most of the speakers spoke of Federation as a "far-off divine event" rather than as a practical policy. The Governors, of course, welcomed the joining of hands across the Murray as a step towards Federation. The speakers from the mother-colony did not respond very heartily. Sir John Robertson, in a characteristic speech, alluded to a "something called Federation," said that Victoria had separated of her own free will, and invited her to return as a repentant child to her mother. Mr. (afterwards Sir) Alexander Stuart, the New South Wales Premier, expressed his belief in slow development, and did not think that Federation could be "precipitated in a moment." Mr. James Service, the Victorian Premier, was the most ardent federalist of the gathering. "We want Federation" he said, "and we want it now. I have been now 30 years almost in public life, and I decline to subscribe to the doctrine that I am to die before I see the grand Federation of the colonies. There is no earthly reason for its being delayed. We imagine there are supreme difficulties in the way, but I believe they will crumble into dust; and I take this opportunity of telling my friend, the Premier of New South Wales, that we intend to test the question." Other Victorian speakers were less definite. Mr. Duncan Gillies said that a customs union must precede any other kind of Federation; whilst Mr. Graham Berry, though announcing that Victoria was "quite ready to unite," stipulated that Victorian manufacturing industries must be considered. In a word, every one was willing to federate; but Sir John Robertson's idea of Federation was the re-annexation of Victoria, Mr. Berry's idea was union under the Victorian tariff, and most of the others regarded it as a topic of after-dinner oratory rather than a matter of practical politics.

But whilst the development of intercolonial relations was deepening the conviction that union was needed, the real motive power—the stimulus to an active public interest—came from outside. Hitherto Australia had regarded foreign complications as antipodean matters which did not much concern her; but the external need of union was brought home to all the colonies by the increased activity of foreign Powers in the Pacific. In 1883 rumours became current of intended annexations by France and Germany. The Germans were credited with designs on New Guinea; and to forestall them Sir Thomas McIlwraith, Premier of Queensland, sent a magistrate to that island in April to take possession in the name of the Queen. His action, though generally approved in the colonies, was disavowed by the Home Government. The French, moreover, were openly coveting the New Hebrides, and were reported to be arranging to transport to New Caledonia a large number of recidivistes, or habitual criminals.

In this emergency the colonies found that disunion hampered them in making proper representations to the Imperial Government, and weakened the effect of what representations they made. Here was a practical and convincing argument for Federation; and it was made the most of. The Executive Council of Queensland, on 17th July, 1883, resolved that the Home Government should be invited to move in the direction of a federal union. What was wanted, however, was not Imperial action, but Australian action; and Mr. James Service—true to his promise at the Albury banquet—took the more practical step of urging an intercolonial conference. Accordingly, on 28th November, a "Convention" met in Sydney, at which the seven colonies were represented, and also Fiji.

Mr. Service immediately submitted a set of resolutions urging the annexation of, or a protectorate over, East New Guinea and the West Pacific Islands from the equator to the New Hebrides, in order to prevent them falling into the hands of foreign powers; affirming that the colonies were willing to bear a share of the cost; protesting against the French recidiviste proposals; and concluding with the following resolution:—"That, in view of the foregoing resolutions, and of the many subjects of pressing importance on which the colonies, though of one mind, are unable to obtain united action owing to the absence of some common authority, the time has now arrived for drawing closer the ties which bind the colonies to each other by the establishment of a Federal Union in regard to such matters as this Convention shall specifically determine."

It is certain that Mr. Service had in his mind the establishment of a real federal Government. The other delegates, however, were not prepared to go to this length; and Mr. (afterwards Sir) Samuel Griffith, Premier of Queensland, submitted the following resolution in favour of a Federal Council:—

"That it is desirable that a Federal Australasian Council should be created for the purpose of dealing with the following matters:—

"1. The marine defences of Australasia, beyond territorial limits.

"2. Matters affecting the relations of Australasia with the islands of the Pacific.

"3. The prevention of the influx of criminals.

"4. The regulation of quarantine.

"5. Such other matters of general Australasian interest as may be referred to it by Her Majesty or by any of the Australasian Legislatures."

Mr. Griffith's resolution was adopted, and on 3rd December a Committee was appointed, with Mr. William Bede Dalley (then Attorney-General of New South Wales in the Stuart Ministry) as chairman. The following day the Committee brought up its report, together with a "Bill to establish a Federal Council of Australasia," of which Mr. Griffith was the draftsman. The Bill was somewhat altered in Committee, the powers of the Federal Council (partly in consequence of outside criticism) being considerably reduced. The Bill provided for a Federal Council, and was to affect only those colonies whose legislatures passed Acts adopting it. It was not to come into force until four colonies at least had passed such adopting Acts. Each colony was to have two representatives, except Crown colonies, which were to have one each; and the mode of their appointment in each colony was left to the legislature. The first session was to be at Hobart, and subsequent sessions wherever the Council itself should decide.

The Council was to be a legislature merely, with no executive powers, and no control over revenue or expenditure. And even its legislative powers were very scanty. The matters over which it was given an independent legislative authority were only seven. Foremost of these were "the relations of Australasia with the islands of the Pacific," and "prevention of the influx of criminals"—the two burning questions which had led up to the Convention. The others related to fisheries in Australasian waters outside territorial limits, the service of civil process beyond the limits of a colony, the enforcement of judgments and of criminal process beyond the limits of a colony, the extradition of offenders, and the custody of offenders on Government ships beyond territorial limits. Those were the only matters on which the Council could legislate of its own motion. But there was a second list of matters which the legislatures of two or more colonies might refer to the Council, and on which the Council might then legislate, but only so as to affect the referring or adopting colonies. This list of matters, as to which the Council could only legislate by request, comprised defence, quarantine, patents and copyright, bills of exchange and promissory notes, weights and measures, recognition of marriage and divorce, naturalization, status of corporations, and "any other matter of general Australasian interest with respect to which the legislatures of the several colonies can legislate within their own limits, and as to which it is deemed desirable that there should be a law of general application." All laws of the Council were to be presented, for the Royal assent, to the Governor of the colony in which the Council was sitting.

The Bill was adopted by the Convention in the following resolution:—"That this Convention, recognizing that the time has not yet arrived at which a complete federal union of the Australasian colonies can be attained, but considering that there are many matters of general interest with respect to which united action would be advantageous, adopts the accompanying draft Bill for the Constitution of a Federal Council, as defining the matters upon which such united action is both desirable and practicable at the present time, and as embodying the provisions best adapted to secure that object, so far as it is now capable of attainment." A resolution was also passed pledging the Governments of the several colonies to invite their Legislatures to pass addresses to the Queen praying for legislation on the lines of the Draft Bill.

Meanwhile the proceedings of the Convention, and the Constitution of the proposed Federal Council, were being severely criticised in the Sydney press, and also in the New South Wales Parliament. The Convention had sat with closed doors; and it seems that at one time, in its zeal for prompt action, it had contemplated asking the Home Government to pass the Bill at once, without reference to the Legislatures. Even the agreement arrived at only gave the Legislatures the option of accepting or rejecting the scheme as it stood, and gave them no voice in deciding its details. There was a strong feeling in Sydney against making so important a constitutional change with so little consideration; and the Bill itself was objected to because the Council, to which power was given to override the local Legislatures, was merely a small, peripatetic, and more or less irresponsible body of delegates. Objection was made, in fact, to handing over powers of federal legislation to any less important and less representative a body than a real Federal Parliament.

In July and August, 1884, addresses to the Crown, praying for the enactment of the Federal Council Bill, were passed by the Legislatures of Victoria, Tasmania, Queensland, Western Australia, and Fiji: New South Wales and New Zealand, however, stood aloof. In New South Wales the Government pleaded the pressure of more important business for not dealing promptly with the matter. In the Legislative Assembly, on 25th March, a resolution had been carried, at the instance of Mr. L. F. Heydon, affirming that no Federal Council Bill should be enacted by the Imperial Parliament until it had been submitted to the Legislature of New South Wales. In the Legislative Council, in July, there had been considerable debate on resolutions moved by the Hon. John Stewart, protesting against any annexation of New Guinea as an unjustifiable interference with the liberty of the natives, and affirming that "any attempt to establish a Federal Government, having legislative jurisdiction over two or more colonies, is not at present necessary or desirable." The resolutions were eventually shelved by the "previous question." On 7th August, in consequence of telegraphic news from London that the Federal Council Bill was likely to be proceeded with shortly, Sir Alexander Stuart, the Premier of New South Wales, telegraphed to the Agent-General that such action would be premature until the Parliament of New South Wales had expressed an opinion. Political opinion in New South Wales was very much divided, and the attitude of the Government was consistently cautious and non-committal. At last, on 30th October, the resolutions were brought before both Houses—in the Assembly by the Treasurer, Mr. (afterwards Sir) George R. Dibbs, and in the Council by Mr. W. B. Dalley. In the Council the resolutions were carried by 13 votes to 9; in the Assembly they were defeated by one vote. Sir John Robertson and others frankly opposed union on the ground of mistrust of the other colonies; but the most general objection was that the scheme was premature, ill-conceived, and ineffective. The speech to which the most interest attaches was that of Sir Henry Parkes. He had taken no part in the proceedings of the "Convention," having been on a trip to England from early in 1883 until August, 1884. Since 1881, however, he had entirely changed his views as to the desirability of a Federal Council; and in his speech in opposition to the proposal he explained his position. His scheme of 1881 had been tentative, and avowedly designed to awaken interest in the question of Federation. He had long since given it up as impracticable. Federation had since become a living national question, and the proposed scheme for a Federal Council, besides being unauthorized in its origin, was incurably defective. The Council would be a "rickety body," composed of a very few members, and unfit to be entrusted with the power of overriding the local Parliaments. It would not only cause dissatisfaction and conflict, but it would "impede the way for a sure and solid Federation."

"Is it not better," he said, "to let the idea of Federation mature, to grow in men's minds, until the time comes when we can have a solid, enduring Federation? No good object can be served by creating a body such as this Council. It will add to our strife, it will add to our dissatisfaction with the working of our institutions, it will lead to endless complications, and it must result, at a very early stage, in an entire breakdown. It has not any inherent power, the Legislatures of these free countries will never give it inherent power, and it can never exist for any useful purpose. Considering the proud position in which we stand now—as free as any country in the world, with power to govern ourselves and maintain an attitude which commands the respect of great nations—we had better avoid joining in making a spectacle before the world which would cover us with ridicule.” (See also Parkes’ “Fifty Years in the Making of Australian History,” p. 503.)

New South Wales and New Zealand, therefore, stood out of the Federal Council scheme. Nevertheless the Home Government, acting on the addresses passed in the other colonies, decided to carry it through; and on 23rd April, 1885, the Earl of Derby introduced the Bill, somewhat apologetically, in the House of Lords. He admitted that it was a rudimentary and imperfect measure, but it was what the colonies had asked for, and would make a beginning. A good deal hung on whether New South Wales would come into the union or not, but he hoped that the objections of the Legislature would not be permanent. A real Federation was impossible for a time, owing to the difference of fiscal policy; the colonists themselves did not wish it, and did not think themselves ripe for it.

The Bill thus introduced differed in a few respects from the Bill adopted by the “Convention.” In the first place, a provision was inserted giving any colony the power to secede from the Council. This was done in the hope that New South Wales might thereby be induced to join, one of the objections of that colony being the irrevocableness of the compact. Next, power was given to the Queen, at the request of the colonies, to increase the number of members of the Council. It was hoped that this might lead to the gradual expansion and development of federal institutions. Lastly, the Council was given an additional power to legislate on any matter which, at the request of the colonial legislatures, the Queen should think fit to refer to it. The Home Government had further suggested a clause dealing with the question of expenditure involved in the action of the Council; but this was so strongly objected to by the colonial Governments that it was dropped, and in matters involving expenditure the Council was left powerless to do anything but advise or recommend.

The Bill passed through the British Parliament with very little debate. In the Lords it was supported by the Earl of Carnarvon, who had actively promoted the Canadian Union in 1867, and had endeavoured to secure a similar result among the South African colonies and States by the abortive “South African Union Act, 1877.” In the Commons, it was opposed by Sir George Campbell on the ground that the colonies would do better by developing their own territory than by meddling with the islands of the Pacific; and it was severely criticised by Mr. James Bryce, who regarded it as “a very scanty, fragmentary, and imperfect sketch of a Federal Constitution,” which did not seem to have been satisfactorily discussed in the colonies.

The Federal Council of Australasia Act, 1885, became law on 14th August. Between September and December in the same year the five colonies of Western Australia, Fiji, Queensland, Tasmania, and Victoria, in that order, passed adopting Acts; and all those colonies sent representatives to the first meeting of the Federal Council, which was held at Hobart from 25th January to 5th February, 1886. It began in a business-like way by passing an Interpretation Act, to govern the interpretation of federal statutes, and an Evidence Act to prescribe the mode of proving them in Court. It then began its substantive legislative work by passing Acts for the intercolonial service of civil process and enforcement of judgments. At its second session, in January, 1888, it passed an Act to regulate the Queensland Pearl-shell and Bêche-de-mer fisheries beyond territorial limits; and at its third session in 1889 it passed a similar Act with respect to West Australian fisheries. Meanwhile, in December, 1888, South Australia passed an adopting Act agreeing to join the Council for a period of two years. From 1891 to 1899 it met in alternate years, but did little to justify its existence; a fact which its friends ascribed to the aloofness of New South Wales. Possibly if New South Wales had joined, there might have been a few more federal statutes passed; but the powers of the Council were too scanty to enable it to be of any great service.

Fiji, though not withdrawing from the Council, was never represented after the first meeting. In 1892 Mr. F. W. Holder, Premier of South Australia, introduced a Bill to enable his colony to re-enter the Federal Council; but it was rejected by the Upper House. The new movement for a national Convention had already made it clear that the road to Australian Federation lay in another direction. Efforts, however, were still made to extend the sphere of the Council's work. Acts referring different matters to the Council were passed in some of the colonies, but without practical result. In 1893, also, the Legislatures of all the colonies represented requested the Queen to increase the number of members; and accordingly, by Order-in-Council of 3rd March, 1894, it was directed that each colony (excepting Crown colonies) should have five representatives. But all efforts to galvanize the Council into life were unavailing; and in January, 1899, it met at Melbourne for the last time.

(7) THE COMMONWEALTH BILL OF 1891.

FEDERAL DEFENCE.—The great effort at Federation which led to the framing of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 had for its immediate stimulus the recognized need of a national system of defence. The history of the new movement may, therefore, be appropriately introduced with a brief review of the attempts to deal with this subject.

The question of colonial defence began to assume prominence in 1878. In the previous year Lord Carnarvon (Secretary of State for the Colonies) had commissioned Lieutenant-General Sir W. D. Jervois to report upon the defences of the Australian colonies—a task which he carried out with the assistance of Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Peter Scratchley. As a result, the several colonies re-organized and increased their military forces, and devoted large sums to harbour defences and fortifications. The naval defence of Australia, and of Australian trade, was still left almost wholly to the Imperial Government; though Victoria established a small navy for the defence of Port Phillip, and New South Wales spent considerable sums upon the naval station at Sydney.

At the Intercolonial Conference held in Sydney in 1881 (see p. 107, supra) it was resolved that the Australian squadron ought to be increased and ought to be the sole charge of the Imperial Government; the colonies on their part undertaking their own land defences. The Home Government, however, thought that Australia ought to contribute towards the naval defence of her own trade; and a Royal Commission which had been appointed in England in 1879, with Lord Carnarvon as chairman, "to enquire into the defence of British possessions and commerce abroad," endorsed this view in its second report, dated 23rd March, 1882. In 1885 Admiral Sir George Tryon was appointed to the command of the Australian station, with instructions to discuss the matter; and owing to his negotiations some approach was made to an understanding. At the Colonial Conference held in London in April and May, 1887, presided over by Sir Henry Holland, and attended by representatives from all the British possessions, the basis of an agreement was settled, subject to ratification by the Australian Parliaments.

This agreement provided for an auxiliary fleet to be equipped and maintained at the joint expense of Great Britain and the colonies. No reduction was to take place in the normal strength of the Imperial fleet on the Australian station. The auxiliary fleet was to consist of five fast cruisers and two torpedo gunboats of the Archer (improved type) and Rattlesnake classes; of which three cruisers and one gunboat were to be kept always in commission, and the remainder held in reserve in Australasian ports. Great Britain was to pay the first cost of these vessels, and the colonies were to pay interest at five per cent. on the first cost to a sum not exceeding £35,000, and also the actual cost of maintenance, not exceeding £91,000, making a total of £126,000 a year, which was to be contributed by the colonies on a population basis. The fleet was to be under the control of the Naval Commander-in-Chief on the Australian Naval Station, and was to be retained within the limits of the station, which is bounded as follows:—

(N.) On the north, from the meridian of 95° E. long. by the parallel of 10° S. lat. to the meridian of 130° E. long.; thence northward on that meridian to the parallel of 2° N. lat., and thence on that parallel to the meridian of 136° E. long.; thence northward to 12° N. lat., and along that parallel to 160° W. long.

(W.) On the west by the meridian of 95° E. long.

(S.) On the South by the Antarctic circle.

(E.) On the east by the meridian of 160° W. long.

In peace or war, the ships were not to be employed beyond those limits without the consent of the colonial Governments. The agreement was to be for ten years, and only terminable, after that time, by a two years' notice.

This agreement was ratified, within a few months, by "Australasian Naval Force Acts," passed in the colonies of Victoria, South Australia, New South Wales, Tasmania, New Zealand, and Western Australia. The Queensland Parliament at first declined to ratify, but eventually came into line with the other colonies by passing the Australasian Naval Force Act, 1891. The Imperial Parliament made provision for its share of the expenditure by the Imperial Defence Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vic. c. 32). The auxiliary fleet arrived at Sydney on 5th September, 1891.

With respect to naval defence, therefore, some degree of federal action had been attained; but with regard to military defence it was otherwise. Each colony had a separate military force, consisting chiefly of partially paid or unpaid volunteers, with a small permanent force. There was no uniformity of organization or equipment, and no co-operation. The (Imperial) Army Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vic. c. 58, s. 177), provided that "where any force of volunteers or of militia, or any other force, is raised in India or a colony, any law of India or the colony may extend to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men belonging to such force, whether within or without the limits of India or the colony." There was some doubt, however, whether this section was sufficient to authorize the employment of the troops of one colony in another colony. See remarks by Sir Samuel Griffith, Proceedings of the Colonial Conference of 1887, pp. 294, 438-40.

The Colonial Conference of 1887 suggested that an Imperial officer should be appointed to report on the defences of the Australian colonies. In 1889 Major-General Sir J. Bevan Edwards was commissioned by the Home Government to inspect the military forces and defences of the Australian colonies, and to report on them. He accordingly made separate reports (dated 9th October, 1889) in respect of each colony, to which he attached a memorandum containing propositions for the re-organization of the forces of all the colonies. The points on which he laid stress were:—

- (1.) The federation of the forces of all the Australian colonies.
- (2.) The appointment of an Imperial officer, to advise and inspect in peace, and to command in war.
- (3.) A uniform system of organization and armament, and a common Defence Act.
- (4.) Amalgamation of the permanent forces into a fortress corps.
- (5.) A federal military college for the education of officers.
- (6.) The extension of the rifle clubs.
- (7.) A uniform gauge for railways.
- (8.) A federal small-arms manufactory, gun-wharf, and ordnance store.

SIR HENRY PARKES.—Earlier in 1889 Sir Henry Parkes, in a confidential correspondence with Mr. Duncan Gillies, Premier of Victoria, had suggested the creation of a Federal Parliament and Executive. In reply, Mr. Gillies had expressed the fear that the fiscal difficulty was insuperable at present, and had urged the claims of the Federal Council as the first step towards union.

On receipt of Major-General Edwards' memorandum, Sir Henry Parkes, on 15th October, telegraphed to the other Premiers suggesting a consultation on the subject. On the 22nd Mr. Gillies telegraphed a reply to the effect that a mere Conference would probably be barren of results, as the local Parliaments had no power to frame the necessary federal legislation. He pointed out that the necessary Imperial authority was already provided by the Federal Council Act, which enabled the Federal Council, upon a reference by the local Parliaments, to legislate as to "general defences." He therefore urged that Sir Henry Parkes should recommend his Parliament to give in its adhesion to the Federal Council.

This suggestion did not meet Sir Henry Parkes' approval. He had been watching the signs of the times, and had come to the conclusion that the popular sentiment was now ripe for a definite federal movement, at the head of which he resolved to place himself. At the time he was on a short visit to Brisbane, where he had been in consultation with, and had received encouragement from, the leading men of both political parties; and on his return journey he was no sooner within the territory of New South Wales than he opened out, at Tenterfield, with his famous speech of 24th October. He seized the opportunity of Major-General Edwards' report to emphasize the necessity of federal defence. For this purpose the Federal Council would be altogether inadequate, because it had no executive power, and it was not directly representative. Nor would it be enough to ask the Imperial Parliament to pass an Act authorizing the troops of the colonies to unite in one federal army under Imperial control. What was wanted was a strong central executive, under the control of the Australian people.

He believed that federal defence was necessary to the security of the colonies; and "feeling this, and seeing no other means of attaining the end, it seemed to him that the time was close at hand when they ought to set about creating a great national Government for all Australia. . . . As to the steps which should be taken to bring this about, a conference of the Governments had been pointed to, but they must take broader views in the initiation of the movement than had been taken hitherto; they must appoint a Convention of leading men from all the colonies—delegates appointed by the authority of Parliament who would fully represent the opinion of the different Parliaments of the colonies. This Convention would have to devise the Constitution which would be necessary for bringing into existence a Federal Government with a Federal Parliament for the conduct of national business."

Having thus set the ball rolling, Sir Henry Parkes, on 30th October, wrote to Mr. Gillies, reiterating his views as to the Federal Council, and making a definite proposition for the summoning of a Convention. "Believing that the time is ripe for consolidating the Australias into one, this Government respectfully invites you to join in taking the first great step—namely, to appoint representatives of Victoria to a National Convention for the purpose of devising and reporting upon an adequate scheme of Federal Government." He suggested that, in order to avoid any sense of inequality in debate or any party complexion, the number from each colony should be the same, and should be equally chosen from both sides in political life; and he further suggested six members from each colony as a convenient number. The form of union he had in mind is best described in his own words:—"The scheme of federal government, it is assumed, would necessarily follow close upon the type of the Dominion Government of Canada. It would provide for the appointment of a Governor-General, for the creation of an Australian Privy Council, and a Parliament consisting of a Senate and a House of Commons. In the work of the Convention, no doubt, the rich stores of political knowledge which were collected by the framers of the Constitution of the United States would be largely resorted to, as well as the vast accumulations of learning on cognate subjects since that time." Copies of this despatch were also forwarded to all the other Australian Premiers, with requests for their concurrence.

Mr. Gillies, however, was still diffident as to the immediate practicability of a full-blown Federal Government. That the matter might be fully considered, yet without altogether passing over the Federal Council, he proposed to Sir Henry Parkes, in a letter of 13th November, that instead of a Parliamentary Convention the representatives of the various colonies to the Federal Council should meet representatives from New South Wales to discuss and, if deemed necessary, to devise and report upon a scheme of Federation. He also suggested that, as the adoption of any such scheme would take time, New South Wales might advantageously join the Federal Council in the meantime. The most pressing problems of defence could be dealt with by mere federal legislation, such as the Council could effect, without the need of any executive authority. The other Premiers wrote in much the same strain; and on 28th November Sir Henry Parkes replied to Mr. Gillies consenting to "an informal meeting of the colonies for the purposes of preliminary consultation."

MELBOURNE CONFERENCE OF 1890.—Accordingly a Conference met in Melbourne on 6th February, 1890, at which the seven colonies were represented by the following delegates, accredited by their respective Governments:—New South Wales, Sir Henry Parkes (Premier) and Mr. William McMillan (Colonial Treasurer); Victoria, Mr. Duncan Gillies (Premier) and Mr. Alfred Deakin (Chief Secretary); Queensland, Sir Samuel Walker Griffith (Leader of Opposition) and Mr. John Murtagh Macrossan (Colonial Secretary); South Australia, Dr. (afterwards Sir) John Alexander Cockburn (Premier) and Mr. Thomas Playford (Leader of Opposition); Tasmania, Mr. Andrew Inglis Clark (Attorney-General) and Mr. Bolton Stafford Bird (Treasurer); Western Australia, Sir James George Lee Steere (Speaker); New Zealand, Captain William Russell Russell (Colonial Secretary) and Sir John Hall. Mr. Geo. H. Jenkins, C.M.G., Clerk of the Parliament (Victoria), acted as clerk of the Conference.

At a banquet held in celebration of the assembling of the Conference, two famous phrases originated. Mr. James Service, proposing the toast of "A United Australasia," spoke of the tariff question as "the lion in the path," which federalists must either slay or be slain by; and Sir Henry Parkes, in responding, made his historic utterance, "The crimson thread of kinship runs through us all."

It was recognized from the first that the Conference was only preliminary to a more representative and a more fully authorized gathering. Mr. Duncan Gillies was elected President of the Conference, and the course of procedure adopted was to frame resolutions in committee and to admit the public to the ensuing debates. The principal debate, which occupied four out of the seven sitting days of the Conference, was on a motion by Sir Henry Parkes:—"That, in the opinion of this Conference, the best interests and the present and future prosperity of the Australian colonies will be promoted by an early union under the Crown, and while fully recognizing the valuable services of the Convention of 1883 in founding the Federal Council, it declares its opinion that the seven years which have since elapsed have developed the national life of Australia in population, in wealth, in the discovery of resources, and in self-governing capacity to an extent which justifies the higher act, at all times contemplated, of the union of the colonies, under one legislative and executive government, on principles just to the several colonies."

This resolution met with no opposition. Everyone recognized the need of a Federal Executive, and admitted the insufficiency of the Federal Council. The "lion in the path" was made light of, most of the delegates sharing Sir Henry Parkes' confident belief that the colonies would be willing to entrust the tariff question to the free decision of the Australian people; whilst Sir Samuel Griffith contended that a federal tariff, though desirable, was not absolutely essential, and that Federation without intercolonial freetrade would be better than no Federation at all. Mr. Playford expressed himself disappointed at Sir Henry Parkes' "bald resolution," and would have liked a series of resolutions indicating the proposed constitution in outline. He also introduced "one or two notes of discord" by questioning the federal motives of Victoria, and the federal sincerity of New South Wales. Sir James Lee Steere also asked for more practical detail, and complained that "this motion was a kind of blank shot fired across our bows by Sir Henry Parkes to make us show our colours." He doubted whether Western Australia could afford to sacrifice her provincial tariff, and he advocated a very limited Federation, by a process of development out of the Federal Council. The other delegates heartily supported the motion, though some of them still hoped that, pending the achievement of a national Federation, New South Wales would join the Federal Council. Sir Henry Parkes replied in an eloquent speech, in which he defined, for himself and his colony, the high national standpoint from which he always looked, and tried to urge others to look, at this great question. "The main object for which, representing New South Wales, I stand here, is to say that we desire to enter upon this work of Federation without making any condition to the advantage of ourselves, without any stipulation whatever, with a perfect preparedness to leave the proposed Convention free to devise its own scheme, and if a central Parliament comes into existence, with a perfect reliance upon its justice, upon its wisdom, and upon its honour. I think I know the people of New South Wales sufficiently to speak in their name; and I think I can answer for it that an overwhelming majority of my countrymen in that colony will approve of the grand step being taken of uniting all the colonies under one form of beneficent government, and under one national flag."

The debate was closed by Mr. Duncan Gillies, the President, who was now beginning to take a more hopeful view of the prospects—

“lions” notwithstanding. “Now there is no one who is more anxious to see a great Federation—a Federation complete in the largest sense—than I am; but I confess that I see great difficulties—not insuperable, but great difficulties—in the way of bringing about this Federation, and I am very much afraid that even when delegates are appointed to the Convention our troubles will only have just begun. . . . And when we meet, as I hope we shall shortly meet, in Convention, I believe we shall be able, in thrashing out the whole of these questions, to come to a solution that will be satisfactory to the whole of our Parliaments. In fact, on the subject of the tariff, I feel perfectly confident that, if we are not able at once to level the barriers between the colonies so far as customs duties are concerned, we shall be able to arrive at some modification which will be satisfactory to all, and that modification may be a very reasonable one.” Sir Henry Parkes’ resolution was then unanimously agreed to, as were also the three following resolutions:—

“2. That to the union of the Australian colonies contemplated by the foregoing resolution, the remoter Australasian colonies shall be entitled to admission at such times and on such conditions as may be hereafter agreed upon.

“3. That the members of the Conference should take such steps as may be necessary to induce the Legislatures of their respective colonies to appoint, during the present year, delegates to a National Australasian Convention, empowered to consider and report upon an adequate scheme for a Federal Constitution.

“4. That the Convention should consist of not more than seven members from each of the self-governing colonies, and not more than four members from each of the Crown colonies.”

It was also agreed that the Premier of Victoria should convene the Convention, and arrange, after consultation with the other Premiers, the time and place of meeting.

Mr. Deakin then moved a further resolution, affirming that as the adoption of a Federal Constitution must take some time, and united action for defence and other purposes was a matter of urgency, “it is advisable that the Federal Council be employed for such purposes so far as its powers will permit, and with such an extension of its powers as may be decided upon, and that all the colonies should be represented on the Council.” This was, of course, an invitation for New South Wales and New Zealand to reconsider their attitude with regard to the Federal Council, and join that tentative body pending the adoption of a Federal Constitution. He thought that this would not only confer immediately the benefits of a partial union, but would also facilitate and hasten a more complete union. “If the two outstanding colonies,” he said, “would only seek to induce their Parliaments to enter temporarily into the Federal Council, and wed with us from to-day, instead of putting off our marriage for two or three years, they would give striking evidence of the strength of the federal spirit.” The representatives of the two truant colonies, however, declined to entertain the proposal for two reasons:—First, that they believed public opinion in those colonies to be against entering the Federal Council; and next, that if the motion were carried, there was danger that the lesser issue would overshadow the greater—or, as Captain Russell put it, it was possible that if they were satisfied to go into “the shanty of the Federal Council, they might never enter the palatial mansion of a Dominion Governor.” At the suggestion of several delegates, Mr. Deakin withdrew the motion. The proceedings closed with an address to the Queen, informing Her Majesty of the resolutions arrived at.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE PARLIAMENTS.—The Conference having thus recommended a National Convention, the next step was to obtain the requisite Parliamentary action. New South Wales led the way. On 7th May, Sir Henry Parkes introduced in the Legislative Assembly a series of resolutions, affirming the concurrence of the House in the resolutions of the Conference, appointing four members to act with three members of the Legislative Council as delegates to a National Convention to frame a Federal Constitution, and requiring “that the Constitution, as adopted by the Convention, be submitted as soon as possible for the approval of the Parliament of this colony.” On the same day similar resolutions were introduced by Mr. W. H. Suttor in the Legislative Council. In both Houses a protracted debate followed, extending, with many adjournments, over several months. In the Assembly Mr. George R. Dibbs, the leader of the Opposition, opposed them strongly, announcing himself as in favour of an ultimate “complete union” of Australia as an independent nation, but condemning the scheme outlined by Sir Henry Parkes. Mr. J. H. Want also opposed the whole scheme as being a fashionable fad. Mr. G. H. Reid, while admitting the advantages of Federation, was not prepared to sacrifice the freetrade policy of the colony, and suggested an amendment to make it clear that when the Constitution was drafted it should be submitted to Parliament, not merely for approval or disapproval as a whole, but for consideration in detail. Mr. T. M. Slattery moved an amendment recommending a “mutual system of defence,” and joint action on a basis somewhat similar to that of the Federal Council, with the addition of a general Court of Appeal; but this was defeated by an overwhelming vote of 92 against 10. The resolutions were finally agreed to, on the voices, on 10th September. Some discussion occurred over the delegates nominated by Sir Henry Parkes, inasmuch as Mr. Dibbs, though opposed to the scheme, claimed a right to be nominated. The question was settled by balloting for the delegates. In the Council, the resolutions were not finally passed until the 8th October. The whole discussion, in both Houses, showed a general passive assent to the general principle of Federation, coupled, however, with very divergent views as to the basis of union, considerable jealousy and mistrust of the other colonies, and a disinclination on the part of many members to any compromise on the tariff and other vital questions. Theoretical federalists were many, but earnest federalists were few; and there was as yet no popular impetus behind the movement—nothing more than a vague intellectual and sentimental assent to the principle.

In Victoria the matter was much more expeditiously dealt with. Resolutions similar to those carried in New South Wales were introduced in the Legislative Assembly by Mr. Gillies on 10th June, and carried on the same day. An amendment moved by Sir Bryan O'Loughlen, demanding a definite outline of the proposed scheme of Federation before the House concurred in the resolutions, received little support. In the Legislative Council, the resolutions were introduced by Mr. (afterwards Sir) H. Cuthbert on 1st July, and carried on 2nd July. Five delegates were appointed by the Assembly, and two by the Council, the Council carrying a resolution regretting that its right to a larger representation had not been recognized.

In the South Australian Assembly, the resolutions were moved by Dr. Cockburn (Premier) in the Assembly on 26th June, were supported by Mr. Thomas Playford (Leader of Opposition), and carried after considerable debate on 22nd July. In the Council they were moved by Mr. J. H. Gordon on 24th June, and carried on 2nd July. Five delegates were appointed by the Assembly and two by the Council.

In Tasmania, the resolutions were moved in the House of Assembly by Mr. B. S. Bird (Colonial Treasurer) on 3rd July, and passed on the following day. They were then concurred in by the Council, and delegates elected—four by the Assembly, two by the Council, and one by both Houses together.

In Queensland, the resolutions were moved in the Assembly by Mr. B. D. Morehead (Premier) on 9th July, and carried on the 15th. In the Council, they were moved by Mr. A. J. Thynne, on 23rd July, and carried on 6th August. Five delegates were appointed by the Assembly and two by the Council.

In New Zealand, Federation was a matter of remote interest, and in spite of repeated inquiries by Sir George Grey as to the intentions of the Government, nothing was done till 6th September, when Captain Russell introduced the resolutions in the House of Representatives, with an addendum "that the delegates so appointed shall not be authorized to bind this colony in any way." The debate showed a friendly but non-committal interest in the question, the balancing considerations being the Australasian trade of the colony on the one hand, and its foreign trade on the other. The resolutions were carried on the 12th September, and on the 15th were moved and carried in the Council. Two delegates were appointed by the House of Representatives and one by the Council.

In Western Australia nothing was done until the 23rd February, 1891, when the Federal Convention was on the point of meeting. The resolutions were then moved and carried in both Houses on the same day, and seven delegates were appointed—five members of the Assembly and two of the Council.

THE SYDNEY CONVENTION OF 1891.—The first National Australasian Convention, "empowered to consider and report upon an adequate scheme for a Federal Constitution," was duly convened at Sydney on the 2nd March, 1891. The delegates from the several colonies were:—

New South Wales: Sir Henry Parkes (Premier), Mr. W. McMillan (Treasurer), Sir J. P. Abbott (Speaker), Mr. G. R. Dibbs (Leader of Opposition), Mr. W. H. Suttor (Vice-President of Executive Council), Mr. Edmund Barton, and Sir Patrick Jennings.

Victoria: Mr. Alfred Deakin (ex-Chief Secretary), Mr. James Munro (Premier), Lieutenant-Colonel W. Collard Smith, Mr. H. J. Wrixon (ex-Attorney-General), Mr. Duncan Gillies (ex-Premier), Mr. H. Cuthbert (ex-Minister of Justice), and Mr. Nicholas Fitzgerald.

Queensland: Mr. J. M. Macrossan (ex-Colonial Secretary), Mr. John Donaldson (ex-Colonial Treasurer), Sir S. W. Griffith (Premier), Sir Thomas Mellwraith (Treasurer), Mr. A. Rutledge, Mr. A. J. Thynne (ex-Minister for Justice), and Mr. Thomas Macdonald-Patersou.

South Australia: Mr. Richard Chaffey Baker, Mr. John H. Gordon (ex-Minister of Education), Sir John C. Bray (Chief Secretary), Dr. John A. Cockburn (ex-Premier), Sir John W. Downer, Mr. Charles C. Kingston, and Mr. Thomas Playford (Premier).

Tasmania: Mr. William Moore (President of Legislative Council), Mr. Aye Douglas (ex-Premier), Mr. A. Inglis Clark (Attorney-General), Mr. W. H. Burgess, Mr. Nicholas J. Brown (Speaker), Mr. Bolton S. Bird (Treasurer), and Mr. Philip O. Fysh (Premier).

Western Australia: Mr. John Forrest (Premier), Mr. W. E. Marmion (Commissioner of Crown Lands), Sir James G. Lee Steere (Speaker), Mr. John A. Wright, Mr. John W. Hackett, Mr. Alexander Forrest, and Mr. W. T. Loton.

New Zealand: Sir George Grey, Captain W. R. Russell, and Sir Harry A. Atkinson (Premier).

In each colony the delegates had been chosen from both sides of political life; so that, although in three colonies (Victoria, Queensland and South Australia) there had been a change of Ministry since the appointment of delegates, yet the Premier of each colony was among its representatives. Of the other delegates, nine were ex-Premiers, whilst nearly all either were or had been Ministers of the Crown.

The first business done by the Convention was to appoint Sir Henry Parkes as President—an honour accorded to him as being not only the Premier of the colony where the Convention sat, but also “the immediate author of the present movement.” Sir Samuel Griffith was appointed Vice-President. Mr. Frederick William Webb, Clerk of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, was appointed Secretary to the Convention. The question of the admission of the press and public was then dealt with. The general feeling was that the debates, whether in Convention or in Committee of the Whole, ought to be public; and it was resolved “that the press and public be admitted, unless otherwise ordered, during the sittings of the Convention, on the order of the President.”

PARKES' RESOLUTIONS.—Before entering on the task of drafting a constitution, the Convention proceeded to debate at length a series of resolutions proposed by Sir Henry Parkes, with the object of obtaining a preliminary interchange of ideas, and of laying down a few guiding principles. The discussion of these resolutions, first in a general debate, and then in Committee, occupied eleven sitting days, and fills more than half of the printed debates of the Convention. These resolutions enunciated a few essential federal principles, and outlined the basis of a federal legislature, judiciary, and executive; the text of them, as introduced, being as follows:—

“That in order to establish and secure an enduring foundation for the structure of a federal government, the principles embodied in the resolutions following be agreed to:—

- “1. That the powers and privileges and territorial rights of the several existing colonies shall remain intact, except in respect to such surrenders as may be agreed upon as necessary and incidental to the power and authority of the National Federal Government.
- “2. That the trade and intercourse between the federated colonies, whether by means of land carriage or coastal navigation, shall be absolutely free.
- “3. That the power and authority to impose customs duties shall be exclusively lodged in the Federal Government and Parliament, subject to such disposal of the revenues thence derived as shall be agreed upon.
- “4. That the military and naval defence of Australia shall be entrusted to federal forces, under one command.

“Subject to these and other necessary provisions, this Convention approves of the framing of a federal constitution, which shall establish:—

- “1. A parliament, to consist of a senate and a house of representatives, the former consisting of an equal number of members from each province, to be elected by a system which shall provide for the retirement of one-third of the members every years, so securing to the body itself a perpetual existence combined with definite responsibility to the electors, the latter to be elected by districts formed on a population basis, and to possess the sole power of originating and amending all bills appropriating revenue or imposing taxation.
- “2. A judiciary, consisting of a federal supreme court, which shall constitute a high court of appeal for Australia, under the direct authority of the Sovereign, whose decisions, as such, shall be final.
- “3. An executive, consisting of a governor-general and such persons as may from time to time be appointed as his advisers, such persons sitting in Parliament, and whose term of office shall depend upon their possessing the confidence of the house of representatives, expressed by the support of the majority.”

The first draft of these resolutions had been framed by Sir Henry Parkes before the Convention met, and submitted by him to an informal meeting of the New South Wales delegates. (See Parkes' Fifty Years in the Making of Australian History, pp. 603-6.) This original draft differed in several important respects from the resolutions as moved. The clause as to the reservation of the “powers and privileges and territorial rights” of the colonies was absent from the original draft; but there was a clause providing for a federal High Commission to devise “an equitable scheme for the distribution of the public lands, and the satisfying of existing territorial rights,” such scheme keeping in view both the necessary strength of the National Government and the just claims of the respective provinces. This High Commission was to be appointed by at least a two-thirds majority of the colonies, and was to report within two years; the final settlement to be made by a federal law, approved by a majority of the provincial Parliaments. In drafting this clause, Sir Henry Parkes had in view the vast unoccupied areas in North Queensland, the Northern Territory of South Australia, and Western Australia; but his colleagues urged that any mention of the public lands would be inadvisable, and he deferred to their opinion. The first draft moreover provided for the disposal of customs revenues not merely "as shall be agreed upon," but "as shall be approved by the Federal and Provincial Parliaments." The clause as to defence provided for the raising of bodies of Militia or Volunteers by the Federal Parliament. As to the Senate, the retirement of members was to be "one-third every seven years." The provision that the House of Representatives was to "possess the sole power of originating and amending all Bills appropriating revenue or imposing taxation" was absent; as were also the words requiring that the members of the federal executive should sit in Parliament. And lastly, the federal Supreme Court was to consist of "not fewer than ten judges." The resolutions as submitted were therefore the President's own draft, as amended after consultation with his colleagues. He proposed them, not as embodying his final convictions, but as a ground-work of debate, and as expressing an outline of the required Constitution as it existed in his own mind. They were based, beyond all doubt, on a comparative study of the Constitutions of the United States and Canada. The fundamental principles of union thus laid down were—intercolonial freetrade, a federal tariff, federal defence, and the reservation of provincial rights in provincial matters; whilst the essential features of the proposed national machinery were—a complete national government, with legislative, judicial, and executive departments; a legislature of two chambers, representing respectively the States and the nation; and a system of responsible government.

Sir Henry Parkes prefaced his exposition of these resolutions by an appeal to the Convention to enter upon the work "in a broad federal spirit." "We cannot hope for any just conclusion—we cannot hope reasonably for any amount of valid success—unless we lose sight, to a large extent, of the local interests which we represent at the same time as we represent the great cause. There can be no Federation if we should happen, any of us, to insist upon conditions which stand in the way of Federation. . . . It does seem to me in the highest degree necessary that we should approach the general question in the most federal spirit that we can call to our support."

In the general discussion which followed, most of the delegates took part. As to the greater part of the resolutions there was practical unanimity. The discussion turned mainly on the powers of the two Houses, and their relation to the executive. Sir Samuel Griffith began by arguing that the double principle of representation logically involved the proposition that every federal law should receive the assent of a majority of the people and a majority of the States. The Senate ought to have an absolute power of veto, and to refuse it the power of amending money bills was to refuse it the power of "veto in detail" as to those Bills. He admitted that the principle of two co-ordinate Houses was new in conjunction with responsible government, and thought that the Constitution should be elastic enough to allow the problem of the responsibility of Ministers to Parliament to work out its own development. The Senate's power to amend money bills was supported by the representatives of all the smaller colonies, but was vehemently opposed by the Victorian delegates (with the exception of the veteran Legislative Councillor, Mr. Nicholas Fitzgerald). The New South Wales representatives were divided on the subject. In Victoria—which, curiously enough, was the only colony whose Constitution expressly forbade the Upper House to amend money bills—there had been serious deadlocks on financial matters, and the financial predominance of the Lower House was a prominent article of political faith. Mr. Deakin, however, admitted that the degree of power which might be entrusted to the Senate depend largely on the mode of election adopted; and Mr. Cuthbert threw out the idea that the matter might be compromised by the South Australian method of allowing the Senate to "suggest" amendments. The problem of responsible government with a strong Senate was discussed, and Mr. Hackett propounded the dilemma that "either responsible government would kill federation, or federation would kill responsible government." Mr. Munro raised the difficulty that the Senate's power of absolute veto meant power for the minority to rule. Mr. Deakin objected to the veto being extended to all kinds of legislation, whether State-rights were involved or not; and Mr. Barton pointed out that State-interests as well as State-rights were involved. In fact, all the elements of the subsequent discussions on "State-rights" and "majority rule" were present at the outset—except that there was no suggestion as yet of constituting the Senate in any other way than by equal representation.

The fiscal question was also prominent in the debate. Some of the Victorians suggested a "guarantee" against ruthless interference with the vested interests created by their protective policy. They asked that it should be made clear that intercolonial freetrade was not to come about until the federal tariff was in force, and further suggested that for the first few years it should not be possible to reduce existing duties too suddenly. The latter suggestion, however, was somewhat satirically criticised by the representatives of other colonies, and was not pressed. The general feeling was that the fiscal policy of Australia must be absolutely entrusted to the Federal Parliament.

One or two other elements of discord obtruded themselves during the debate. Sir George Grey, following the precedent of the original Constitution of New Zealand, proposed to place no limits on the legislative scope of the Federal Parliament—thus reducing the State legislatures to subordinate bodies; he also advocated the election of the Governor-General by the people, and believed it to be "the duty of the Convention" to give the electors of each State full power to reform their own Constitutions—an end which should be achieved by the simple process of giving them elective Governors and elective Legislative Councils. This proposal to meddle with the State Constitutions received no support at all. Mr. Dibbs next threw into the Convention the "bombshell" of the federal capital—a bombshell which, however, failed altogether to explode.

THE RESOLUTIONS IN COMMITTEE—The Convention then, on 13th March, went into Committee of the Whole to consider the resolutions in detail. Some discussion took place on the advisability of amplifying the resolutions for the better guidance of those who might be appointed to draft a Bill. On Mr. Deakin's motion, the paragraph vesting exclusively in the Federal Parliament the power to impose customs duties was extended to duties of excise, but with the limitation—designed to prevent the unfair treatment of the products of any colony—that such duties should only be imposed "upon goods the subject of customs duties." On Mr. Gordon's motion, the paragraph was further extended to include the offering of bounties.

But the main debate, extending over two days, was on the power of the Senate with regard to money bills. This was the critical question which divided the Convention, and as to which the watchword of "compromise" was not at first listened to. Sir Henry Parkes' resolution proposed to give the House of Representatives "the sole power of originating and amending all Bills appropriating revenue or imposing taxation." The smaller States, however, claimed for the Senate "co-equal powers," with the sole exception of initiating money Bills; they asked for full powers of amendment and rejection—of "veto in detail" and "veto in bulk." An amendment by Sir John Downer, to strike out the words "and amending," was agreed to, by way of preliminary, not as deciding the question, but as leaving it open for discussion. The real battle then took place on two amendments: one by Sir John Downer, giving the Senate "the power of rejecting in whole or in part any of such last-mentioned Bills;" the other by Mr. Wrixon, providing (1) that the powers of the Houses should be equal except with regard to money Bills, which the Senate should be entitled to affirm or reject, but not to amend; and (2) that it should be unlawful to "tack" anything to the annual appropriation Bill. Sir John Downer's amendment represented practically the extreme claims of the small States; Mr. Wrixon's that of the large States, with the provision against "tacking" thrown in as a concession. The debate became warm; neither side seemed inclined to give way, and hints were thrown out that the delegates might as well "pack up their portmanteaux." At last, however, the "spirit of compromise" was successfully appealed to; and though no basis of compromise could as yet be found, it was agreed not to press the matter to a vote at that stage, but to withdraw both amendments and let the decision stand over.

The resolution dealing with the executive was amended by leaving out the words which provided that Ministers should sit in Parliament, and that their term of office should depend on the confidence of the House of Representatives. It was not deemed advisable to stereotype the conventional rules of responsible government in this way. Sir Samuel Griffith thought it ought to be distinctly provided, as in the Constitutions of the colonies, that Ministers "may" sit in Parliament; but it was decided to leave the whole question open till a later stage.

The judiciary resolution was amended by omitting the provision that the decisions of the Supreme Court should be final, and this question also was left open. On Mr. Barton's motion, a resolution was added to forbid the subdivision or amalgamation of States without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned. Sir George Grey moved a resolution to allow the people of each State "to adopt, by the vote of a majority of voters, their own forms of State Constitution." This was objected to, as being an interference with the States. It was agreed, however, that the States ought not to have to go to the Imperial Government for power to change their Constitutions, and it was resolved "that provision should be made in the Federal Constitution which will enable each State to make such amendments in its Constitution as may be necessary for the purposes of the Federation." The resolutions, as amended, were then reported and agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.—So far, the formal result of the Convention's work was merely a few resolutions, dealing with matters of general principle, and no decision had been reached upon any of the critical questions. The discussion, however, had pretty well tested the feelings of the Convention, and the time was now ripe to formulate the details of a complete scheme in the shape of a Bill. Accordingly, on 18th March, resolutions were passed for the appointment of three Committees; one, consisting of three members from each delegation, to consider constitutional machinery; a second, consisting of one member from each delegation, to consider finance, taxation, and trade regulation; and a third, consisting of one member from each delegation, to deal with the judiciary. The two latter Committees were to report to the Constitutional Committee, which was to prepare and submit to the Convention a Bill for the establishment of a Federal Constitution. The different delegations made their own nominations to these Committees, which were composed as follows:—

Constitutional Committee: Sir H. Parkes, Mr. Barton, Mr. Gillies, Mr. Deakin, Sir Samuel Griffith, Mr. Thynne, Mr. Playford, Sir John Downer, Mr. Clark, Mr. Douglas, Sir Geo. Grey, Captain Russell, Mr. John Forrest, Sir James Lee-Steere.

Finance Committee: Mr. McMillan, Mr. Munro, Sir Thomas McIlwraith, Sir John Bray, Mr. Burgess, Sir Harry Atkinson, Mr. Marmion.

Judiciary Committee: Mr. Dibbs, Mr. Wrixon, Mr. Rutledge, Mr. Kingston, Mr. Clark, Sir Harry Atkinson, Mr. Hackett.

These Committees set to work on 19th March, and in the course of the next twelve days was framed the first draft of a Bill to constitute the Commonwealth of Australia. The framing of that Bill marks an epoch in the history of the movement. In those few days Federation came down from the clouds to the earth; it changed from a dream to a tangible reality. The idea was once for all crystallized into a practical scheme, complete in all its details. As to many of the details, and even many of the principles, there was still to be keen and protracted dispute; but with their definition the era of vague generalities ended, and the era of close criticism began.

So important was the work of the Convention, and so great was its influence in the development of the Constitution, that it is necessary to review the material which the Convention had at their disposal. First of all, they had the Constitution Acts of the several colonies—all drawn from the common model of the British Constitution, but all differing from it and from one another in many important respects. Then they had their own experience, as practical politicians, of the working of those Constitutions, and a close familiarity with their merits and defects. As some guide to the form of union needed, they had the various reports and debates which made up the history of the federal movement in Australia—a history in whose more recent stages many of the delegates had been actors. As a warning of faults to avoid, they had the example of the weak and impotent Federal Council—just as the Philadelphia Convention of 1787 had the example of the earlier confederation. Lastly, as models of federal government, they had the constitutions of the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada—and, in a less degree, of the Swiss Republic—together with all the critical, historical, philosophical, and constitutional literature on the subject of federal systems and institutions. They were better equipped than the framers of the American constitution by the variety of federal examples available to them, and by a whole century's advance in political science. The Convention numbered many constitutional students who had deeply interested themselves in the subject—among whom may be specially mentioned Sir Samuel Griffith of Queensland, Sir Henry Parkes and Mr. Barton of New South Wales, Mr. Deakin and Mr. Wrixon of Victoria, Mr. R. C. Baker and Mr. Kingston of South Australia, and Mr. Inglis Clark of Tasmania. Mr. Baker had prepared a "Manual of Reference to Authorities" for the use of the Convention; whilst Mr. Clark had prepared an entire draft Constitution.

The deliberations of the Committee were private. The last stage in the process of drafting was completed on board the S.S. Lucinda, on the Hawkesbury River, from 27th to 29th March, by a sub-committee consisting of Sir Samuel Griffith, Mr. Kingston, Mr. Barton, and Mr. Inglis Clark. On 31st March Sir Samuel Griffith, who had been appointed Chairman of the Constitutional Committee, and who had the chief hand in the actual drafting of the Bill, brought up the Report of that Committee, together with a draft Bill to constitute the Commonwealth of Australia. The reports of the Finance and Judiciary Committees were also appended.

The real work of the Convention was now practically finished; for although the subsequent discussion in Committee occupies nearly half the printed volume of debates, not half a dozen substantial amendments were made. Indeed, with the single exception that the mode of distributing the surplus was readjusted, the Bill as it came from the draftsmen was, with a few verbal and minor alterations, adopted in its entirety. A good number of amendments were moved; but so well had the Constitutional Committee gauged the sense of the Convention that these were nearly all defeated. Only 21 divisions were taken in all; and of these only three resulted in favour of a modification.

The framework of the Bill was on the lines which have since become familiar by being adopted in all the subsequent stages of the movement. It was cast in the shape of a Bill for submission to the Imperial Parliament—the few clauses dealing with the establishment of the Federation being placed first by themselves, and the Federal Constitution itself following as a separate document. The Constitution provided for the machinery of a complete central government; with a federal legislature, executive, and judiciary. In the matter of nomenclature, the only novelty was the use of the word “Commonwealth,” which was at first adopted provisionally for want of a better, but which was so apt and descriptive, so simple and dignified, that it came to stay. It is not too much to say that this grand old word, rich in meaning and tradition, and intimately associated with the literature and history of the English people, did more to arrest the public attention and kindle the public imagination than any other word in the English language could have done. For a little while, indeed, it jarred upon some ears with a slight revolutionary echo, owing to association with Cromwell’s Protectorate; but its older and deeper meaning soon prevailed, and it stands to-day for the type and the ideal of Australian nationhood. For the component members of the union, the word “States” was preferred to either “provinces” or “colonies;” and for the two Houses of the Federal Parliament the words “Senate” and “House of Representatives”—sanctioned by the usages of more than one English-speaking community—were adopted.

THE MAIN COMPROMISES.—The serious “lions in the path” were of course the differences of population, and the differences of fiscal policy; and accordingly the chief issues in the Convention were (1) between large States and small States, and (2) between a high-tariff policy and a low-tariff policy.

As regards the former question, the necessity of equal representation of States in the Senate was conceded from the outset, and Sir Henry Parkes, in his preliminary resolutions, had voluntarily offered it. This concession was made, however, subject to the definite and unequivocal condition that the House of Representatives should have the predominating voice in finance and in the control of the executive. “I offered voluntarily, as far as I was individually concerned,” he had said (Convention Debates, 1891, p. 448), “an equal representation to Western Australia as either Victoria or New South Wales would have in the Senate. But I stipulated that that power which is held by the House of Commons should be held by the House of Representatives—that is in as effective a way as the words of a written resolution could prescribe.” But some of the colonies, not content with equal representation in the Senate, had claimed equal power for the Senate, and round these two standards the real battle of the Convention was fought. The draft Bill embodied what was subsequently referred to as the “compromise of 1891.” The Senate was given equal power with the House of Representatives, except that Appropriation Bills and Taxation Bills were to originate in the House of Representatives alone; and that the Senate was forbidden to amend Taxation Bills or Bills “appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the Government,” or to amend any Bill “in such a manner as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people." As some compensation for these restrictions, the Senate was given, with respect to Bills which it might not amend, a power to suggest amendments. That is to say, the Senate might at any stage return any such Bill to the House of Representatives "with a message requesting the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein." As a further compensation, and as a guarantee to the Senate of some measure of "veto in detail," Taxation Bills were to deal with taxation only, and with only one kind of taxation; and no extraordinary appropriations were to be tacked to the ordinary Appropriation Bill. As regards the responsibility of the executive, Sir Henry Parkes' original proposition requiring Ministers to sit in Parliament and to hold office subject to their "possessing the confidence of the House of Representatives, expressed by the support of the majority," was not adopted; but responsible government was indicated by the provisions that there should be a "Federal Executive Council" to advise the Governor-General, and that the chief heads of departments should hold office during the Governor-General's pleasure, should be capable of sitting in either House of Parliament, and should be members of the Federal Executive Council. The intention was (to quote Sir Samuel Griffith's words of a later date) "so to frame the Constitution that responsible government may—not that it must—find a place in it."

The compromise with regard to the tariff was of a different kind. It was obviously out of the question for the Convention to frame a tariff, or even to fix the principles on which the Federal Parliament should frame a tariff. Yet the Victorians were anxious for some "guarantee" that their manufacturing interests should not be injured by a sudden reversal of their protectionist policy; whilst the freetrade majority of New South Wales were equally afraid that their fiscal faith would not be shared by the Federal Parliament. Sir Henry Parkes had always taken the high federal ground that the fiscal question must be left unreservedly and unconditionally to the Australian people to decide for themselves. He placed Federation above any fiscal policy, and claimed that the other colonies should do the same. Vested interests—whether they were the interests of manufacturers or the interests of importers and consumers—must be entrusted on both sides to the good faith of the Parliament and people whom they were about to create. This settlement, which was the only one possible, was embodied in the draft Bill. The Federal Parliament was given full powers of raising money, not only by customs and excise, but by every other mode of taxation; and the only conditions imposed upon this power were that federal taxation must be uniform in all the colonies, and that, on the adoption of a uniform tariff, trade between the colonies should be free. Until the adoption of a federal tariff, the provincial tariffs were to remain, not only as against the outside world, but as between the States; and after that event the power to impose customs and excise was to be vested exclusively in the Federal Parliament, though the States were to retain concurrent powers of raising money by every other mode of taxation.

OTHER PROVISIONS.—For the rest, the Bill will be best described, not by a complete summary of its provisions, but by reference to its main points of difference from the Constitution as now enacted.

Federal Parliament.—The Senators were to be elected by the Parliaments of the several States. The number from each State was fixed at eight; and equal representation was conceded, not only to original States, but to all the existing colonies. In the House of Representatives, each State was to have one member for every 30,000 of its people; but this quota was alterable by Parliament. Each State was to have a minimum of four representatives. There was no ratio fixed between the number of members of the two Houses; the size of the Senate depending upon the number of States, whilst the size of the House of Representatives would depend upon the quota fixed by the Constitution or by Parliament. Each State was to determine its own electoral divisions, and was to elect its members upon its own provincial franchise. Plural voting was not prohibited, and the Federal Parliament was not empowered to frame a uniform franchise. There was no express provision for the settlement of deadlocks between the two Houses.

The legislative powers of the Federal Parliament were substantially the same as at present, with the following exceptions:—Astronomical and meteorological observations, insurance, invalid and old age pensions, conciliation and arbitration, and the acquisition of property for public purposes, were not included. In the “banking” sub-clause there was no exception of State banking. The river question was only represented by a power to legislate as to “river navigation with respect to the common purposes of two or more States, or of the Commonwealth.” There was no clause providing for the acquisition of State railways, or railway construction and extension; but the power to make laws for the control of railways “with respect to transport for the purposes of the Commonwealth” was not limited, as it now is, to “naval and military purposes.”

Federal Supreme Court.—The Federal Supreme Court was not established by the Constitution itself, but was left to be established by the Federal Parliament. The form of the judiciary clauses was somewhat different from what it is now; but the only important difference of substance was with regard to appeals. Not only was the Supreme Court given a general jurisdiction to hear appeals from the Supreme Courts of the States, but Parliament was empowered to abolish, in part or in whole, the existing right of appeal from the State Courts direct to the Privy Council. The judgment of the Supreme Court was made final in all cases; except that the Queen might, “in any case in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any State, or of any other part of the Queen’s dominions are concerned,” grant leave to appeal to the Privy Council.

Finance.—With regard to finance, the question which gave the Committees the most trouble was the basis of apportionment of surplus revenue among the States. It was recognized that the customs revenue must be collected by the Commonwealth; but as it was decided that the Commonwealth was not, at the outset, to be saddled with the public debts of the States, it was soon seen that only a fraction of the revenue would be needed for federal expenditure, whilst the States would require much of it to meet their own expenditure. "The great difficulty" (said Sir Samuel Griffith in introducing the Bill)—"and it is a difficulty peculiar to this Constitution, so far as I have any knowledge—is that the customs revenue of the colonies in all cases forms a very large share of the means of meeting the expenses of government; and as we should take over only a very small part of the expenditure, the Commonwealth would start with an enormous annual surplus of many millions, which it could not retain or expend, but must return to the different States. That is a difficulty almost as great as the difficulty of making a levy upon the different States as States. It is a great difficulty, but we have to face it, and the question is, what is to be done?" (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1891, p. 528.) Should revenue be credited to the several States in proportion to their populations, or in proportion to their contributions? Should expenditure be charged against the several States in proportion to their populations, or on the basis of services rendered? So far as revenue was concerned, the population basis of adjustment seemed the most federal, but not the most fair. Statistics showed that the consumption of dutiable articles varied greatly in the different colonies, and it was anticipated that even under a uniform tariff considerable differences might continue. The contribution basis seemed fairer, but less federal; and it was open to the objection that with intercolonial freedom of trade it would be difficult to ascertain accurately what share of dutiable articles was consumed in each State.

Here, at the outset, was the whole financial difficulty which was afterwards to cause so much trouble. The recommendation of the Finance Committee had been as follows:—"That after a uniform tariff has come into operation, the surplus revenue may fairly be distributed amongst the various colonies according to population; but as the duties contributed by the various colonies are so unequal, it would be unfair at the present time to distribute the surplus on this basis; it is, therefore, recommended that the revenue from customs and excise be devoted, first, to the payment of all expenditure authorized by the Federal Government, such expenditure to be charged to the several colonies according to population; the balance to be returned to the colonies in such a way that the amount paid by each colony for such federal expenditure, added to the amount returned, shall be, as nearly as can be ascertained, the total amount contributed by each colony on the dutiable articles consumed." (It seems that the resolution had originally run "that some time after," &c.; but the words "some time" were eventually omitted. See Conv. Deb., Syd., 1891, p. 814.)

In other words, the Committee recommended that the federal expenditure, both before and after the uniform tariff, should be charged against the colonies in proportion to population. The revenue, however, was to be credited differently for the two periods. As long as the provincial tariffs remained in force, each State was to get back the amount of its contribution, subject to a deduction of its population share of the federal expenditure. But as soon as the uniform tariff came into force, and the border custom-houses disappeared, the "contribution" basis was to be done away with, and population was to be the basis for distributing revenue as well as for charging expenditure.

The Constitutional Committee, however, in framing the Bill, departed altogether from these recommendations. They provided that the federal revenue, both before and after the uniform tariff, should be applied in the first instance to paying the federal expenditure, and the surplus should be returned to the several States "in proportion to the amount of revenue raised therein respectively," subject to certain provisions that taxes should be "taken to be collected" in the State where the dutiable articles were consumed; or, in the case of direct taxation, where the taxable property was situated. In other words, they cut the "population" basis out altogether, and made "contribution" the basis, not only for distributing the surplus, but also for charging expenditure—and after as well as before the uniform tariff.

Trade and Commerce.—As to trade and commerce, the only provisions explanatory of the federal power (in addition to the clause as to "river navigation" already mentioned) were two short clauses; one, copied from the United States Constitution (Art. I., sec. ix., 5), forbidding any preference to be given to the ports of one State over those of another; and the other empowering the Federal Parliament to annul State laws derogating from freedom of inter-state trade. The questions of preferential railway rates, and of the possible conflicting claims of river navigation and irrigation, were as yet only vaguely recognized as difficulties, and no attempt was made to define the basis of a settlement.

Federal Capital.—The federal capital was left to be determined by the Federal Parliament; and until such determination, the Parliament was to meet at such place as should be appointed by a majority of the Governors—or, if they were equally divided, by the Governor-General.

Amendment.—The mode prescribed for the amendment of the Constitution introduced the American principle of ratification by elected State Conventions—not, as now provided, by the electors directly. Any law for amendment was first to be passed by an absolute majority of both Federal Houses, and then submitted to Conventions chosen in each State on the Parliamentary franchise; and if approved by Conventions of a majority of the States, it was to become law, subject to the Queen's power of disallowance.

Summary.—The foregoing sketch shows that in the first draft of 1891 the whole foundation and framework of the present Constitution was contained. Its general characteristics, as compared with the Constitution as it now stands, may be summed up in a few words. In the first place—as is natural in a first draft—it followed more closely, in substance and in language, the literary models—American, Canadian, and Australian—which were available to the Convention. In the next place, it was in some few respects less essentially democratic in its basis—a circumstance which is also natural, in view both of the continuous development of democratic ideas, and of the more completely popular impulse of the later stages of the federal movement. And lastly, it was less definite and less elaborate in its treatment of some of the vexed problems—problems which had not yet been the subject of exhaustive discussion, and some of which had only been mooted in vague and general terms. The peculiarities of our railway development, the unique characteristics of our river system, the special difficulties arising out of our tariff policies and requirements, had not yet been adequately studied.

The constitutional problem of reconciling the representation of State interests with British principles of legislation and finance—of bringing into harmony the conflicting elements of State rights and interests on the one hand, and of national rights and interests on the other—in short, of securing responsible government, legislative finality, and the general predominance of the House of Representatives, without “killing Federalism,” was as yet incompletely solved. All these things were inevitable at the first attempt to grapple practically with the question. But in spite of imperfections, the first draft stands as a convincing monument of the wisdom, the statesmanlike ability, and the patriotism of its framers. In those few days they laid down the main lines from which the movement has never since wavered. On 2nd March, 1891, Australian Federation was a misty abstraction; on 31st March it had definite outlines and a practical policy.

COMMONWEALTH BILL IN COMMITTEE.—The Bill was brought up by the Constitutional Committee on 31st March, and a short “second reading” debate took place on Sir Samuel Griffith’s motion to refer it to Committee of the Whole. The Convention was anxious to get to close quarters with the Bill, and the only members who followed Sir Samuel Griffith in the general debate were Mr. Wrixon, Mr. Baker, and Mr. Inglis Clark. Mr. Wrixon’s speech was specially remarkable for its almost prophetic insight into the modifications that would be necessary before the Bill could be wholly acceptable; reading his criticisms, it is hard to believe that they bear so early a date as 1891.

The motion to go into Committee was passed, and from 1st to 8th April the Convention was occupied with the discussion of the clauses of the Bill. The debates of those days are interesting, as being the first discussion in public of the details of the proposed Constitution. The amendments carried were few, and in most cases unimportant; but a good deal of light is thrown on the views of the Convention by some of the proposals that were rejected—and also by the lack of debate on some questions which afterwards assumed prominence.

The word “Commonwealth,” though somewhat apologetically supported, was retained on division by a large majority; none of the alternative suggestions—such as “Federated States,” “Federation,” “United Australia”—finding many friends. An amendment moved by the veteran democrat, Sir George Grey, for the purpose of providing that the Governor-General should be elected by the Australian people, was sympathetically received, but summarily dealt with; and a tentative amendment by Mr. Baker, to define in a schedule some of the powers and functions of the Governor-General, was withdrawn after a short debate on the question of ministerial responsibility.

Election of Senators.—In place of the provision for the election of Senators by the State Parliaments, Mr. Kingston proposed to leave each State free to elect its own Senators in its own way. He argued that uniformity was not attained by the clause as it stood, because the various Upper Houses, which would share in the election, were not uniformly constituted. If uniformity were the all-important thing, he would have preferred to prescribe direct election by the people in large constituencies; but the chief consideration was to satisfy the several States. The proposal, however, was negatived by a large majority. The Convention felt that a want of homogeneity in the Senate would be undesirable; and as the alternative system of uniform election by the people did not as yet find enough favour to be worth proposing, the American plan was adhered to.

Federal Franchise.—The franchise for the House of Representatives was the subject of two unsuccessful amendments, for which the hour was not yet ripe. Dr. Cockburn moved an amendment to forbid property qualifications, and to give each elector a vote only for one electorate—in other words, to embody the principles of manhood suffrage and “one man one vote.” And Mr. Barton moved an amendment to allow the Parliament to prescribe a uniform federal franchise. “It does seem to me,” he said, “that if you are going to trust the Parliament of the Commonwealth at all, you must trust it to fix its own franchise.” Both these amendments, though they received some support, met with much opposition. The suggestion that either the Federal Constitution or the Federal Parliament should meddle with the franchise—though only for federal purposes—was criticized as an invasion of State rights; and though this argument was answered, it prevailed. Mr. Gillies appealed to the Convention to “abandon these fads,” for which there was no practical necessity, and which would throw difficulties in the way of Federation. Mr. Barton’s amendment was put first and negatived without division; and Dr. Cockburn’s was then defeated on division by 28 votes to 9.

Trade and Commerce.—The clause defining the powers of the Federal Parliament opened up several questions of which more was afterwards to be heard. On the “trade and commerce” sub-clause, Mr. Gordon—confessedly with an eye to South Australian interests in the Broken Hill trade—asked whether the power to regulate trade and commerce gave any authority to regulate railway rates on inter-colonial lines. Mr. Clark argued that the American interpretation showed that the clause implied considerable power of control; but Mr. Gordon asked that the powers intended should be definitely given, and announced his intention of framing a sub-clause for the purpose. Sir Samuel Griffith feared there was no middle course between giving the Commonwealth complete “control of railway tariffs,” and leaving the States to do as they liked; and said that the only federal control which the Constitutional Committee had seen fit to recommend was contained in the clause empowering the Federal Parliament to annul State laws “having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce” between the States. Mr. Donaldson suggested that the real solution both of the “differential rates” problem and of the “distribution of surplus” problem was to federate the debts and railways. The discussion was merely a preliminary one, and no amendment was proposed in the sub-clause; but shortly afterwards Mr. Gordon proposed a new sub-clause giving the Federal Parliament power to regulate railway traffic and traffic charges where required “for freedom of trade and commerce, and to prevent any undue preference to any particular locality within the Commonwealth, or to any description of traffic." These words were criticized as being much too wide, and as giving the Federal Parliament excessive powers of interfering with State railway management. It was argued that so long as the States retained the financial responsibility over the railways, they must retain full control except so far as their action might interfere with the federal principle. Mr. Deakin pointed out that rates which "derogated from freedom of trade" were already prohibited; and Mr. McMillan argued that differential rates which did not so derogate might be perfectly legitimate. There was a general agreement that some kinds of differential rates should be prohibited, but no satisfactory clause could be suggested; so Mr. Gordon's amendment was negatived. A similar fate befell a clause proposed by Mr. Clark to prevent "discriminating rates" which gave a preference to any locality, or any description of traffic; and the "trade and commerce" power was left unexplained, save for the "derogation" clause.

Rivers.—The river question also raised some debate. The Finance and Trade Committee—foreseeing that federal control might be needed for other purposes than navigation—had recommended a federal legislative power as to "Intercolonial rivers and the navigation thereof;" but the Constitutional Committee had cut this power down to "River navigation with respect to the common purposes of two or more States." Mr. McMillan argued that federal powers with regard to the use of the water for irrigation and conservation should be added; and accordingly Sir Samuel Griffith moved tentatively to insert the words "and conservation of water." This was objected to as affecting property and riparian rights; though on the other hand it was argued by Mr. Deakin that powers of conservation for the purpose of maintaining and improving navigability were conferred by the clause as it stood. Discussion showed that the question was too difficult to be dealt with off-hand, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Powers of Senate.—The chief debate, however, was on the vexed question of the powers of the Senate. When the clause embodying the Committee's compromise on this matter was reached, Mr. Baker at once raised the whole question by submitting an amendment for the purpose of giving the Senate absolutely co-equal powers with the House of Representatives. Dr. Cockburn supported him, on the broad ground that "the principle of Federation" required, not merely equal representation in the Senate, but the equal power of both Houses; and that centralization was incompatible with, and State-rights were essential to, a real democracy. This doctrine was upheld, more or less, by most of the representatives of the small States; whilst, apart altogether from the question of State-rights, the principle of a strong Upper House was favoured by the more Conservative representatives, not only of the small States, but of New South Wales as well. Both these aspects were vigorously combated by the solid phalanx of Victorian representatives, by Sir Henry Parkes and others for New South Wales, and by Mr. Playford for South Australia. Mr. Deakin denounced the combination of "reactionary radicals and iconoclastic conservatives" who would place an absolute veto in the path of the people. Mr. Munro warned the Convention that the clause as it stood was the utmost limit of compromise which Victoria would accept. Adherence to the compromise reached was urged by Sir Samuel Griffith for Queensland, by Mr. Bird for Tasmania, by Mr. Playford and Mr. Kingston for South Australia, by Mr. Hackett for Western Australia. From large States and small States alike came the appeal "keep to the compromise;" and the amendment was defeated on division by 22 votes to 16. Mr. McMillan then moved an amendment with the object of giving the Senate full power to amend, in the first instance, all Bills except Appropriation Bills; but forbidding it to amend Taxation Bills a second time. This also was rejected.

Mr. Wrixon, however, feared that even the power of suggestion might lead to deadlocks; and to guard against this he put forward an embryo "deadlock provision," to the effect that if a "suggestion" of the Senate were declined by the House of Representatives, the Senate might request a joint meeting of the two Houses, at which a majority should decide. It should be noticed that this proposition was fundamentally different from the joint sitting as now embodied in the Constitution. It was only available to deal with suggestions by the Senate—the precise subject which a joint sitting is now forbidden to consider. The suggestion failed to find favour with the friends of either House. It was criticized as dangerous and "mechanical," and was negatived with little debate.

Responsible Government.—With regard to the Executive Government, the only debate of importance arose on the question of the best words in which to suggest the responsibility of Ministers. The Bill as drafted provided that the chief departmental heads should be members of the Federal Executive Council; to which Mr. Wrixon proposed to add, "and responsible Ministers of the Crown." The word "responsible," however, was criticized as being of uncertain meaning; and on Sir Samuel Griffith's suggestion the phrase "the Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth" was adopted.

Finance.—The finance clauses gave rise, not only to an important debate, but to some important alterations. The "contribution" basis of apportioning expenditure and revenue came in for severe criticism, and the members of the Finance Committee wanted an explanation of the reasons why their recommendation had been departed from. So far as expenditure was concerned, no satisfactory explanation was forthcoming, except that Sir Samuel Griffith and some others seemed to think there would be some inconsistency in charging expenditure against the several States on a different basis from that on which revenue was credited. This idea, however, was demolished by Sir Thomas Mellwraith, on whose motion an amendment was carried providing that federal expenditure, from the outset, should be borne by the several States in proportion to population. The apportionment of revenue caused more difficulty. Sir John Bray objected to the "contribution" basis, as requiring an account to be kept of the ultimate destination of dutiable goods, and argued that as soon as a federal tariff was adopted, revenue ought to be credited on the basis of population. "We ought to assume" he said "that any uniform customs tariff that bears fairly on the inhabitants of Australia will result in the inhabitants of each colony paying the same per head pro rata as the inhabitants of Australia generally pay." Sir Thomas McIlwraith and Sir Samuel Griffith were prepared to admit that there might ultimately be an approximation to equality, but argued that for many years to come there would be inequality of contribution, and that meanwhile the population basis would be unfair. Mr. McMillan agreed that there would be some inequality of incidence, but was inclined nevertheless to favour the population basis as being the most federal. However, he suggested a compromise; to leave the contribution basis in force, after the adoption of a federal tariff, until the Federal Parliament should decide to alter it. This suggestion found favour and was adopted. The Convention recognized that the Federal Parliament, with experience of the working of a federal tariff, would have a solid foundation to build upon, which was lacking to the Convention. Some figures had indeed been prepared by the statisticians as an estimate of what each colony would contribute under different tariffs—the Victorian tariff being taken as the basis of one estimate, and an "imaginary tariff" of fixed duties on narcotics and stimulants, with an all round ad valorem duty of 13 per cent. on other imports, as the basis of another. These figures had been before the Finance Committee, but were not printed with its report; and they were the cause of some skirmishing in the Convention, being alluded to by their friends as the "suppressed tables" and by their critics as "imaginary tariffs." In fact the battle of statistical forecasts, which was afterwards to be the fiercest fight of all, had its small beginnings in this debate.

But though the problem of the distribution of the federal surplus had been thus dealt with, the Convention was awake to the difficulties and dangers which might arise from the fact that the revenues controlled by the federal government would be immensely greater than the liabilities imposed upon it. Some need was felt of a "guarantee" that this surplus revenue would not be wastefully expended, but would be applied to the necessary purposes of the State Governments. Any such guarantee must be based on one of two principles—either an obligation on the Commonwealth to return some part of its revenue to the States, or an obligation to take over some of the liabilities of the States. The former plan was not mooted at all in 1891; but the latter one came up in the shape of a proposal by Sir John Bray to make the Commonwealth liable for the existing public debts of the States—each State being in turn liable for the amount (if any) by which its debt exceeded a fixed sum per head of its population. There was a disposition on the part of the Convention, however, to think that this was going too far. Some of the delegates thought that the debts ought not to be handed over without the "assets" which they represented; and though Mr. Bird pointed out that the federal revenue powers were a sufficient asset, the argument that the debts ought not to be separated from the reproductive works in which they were sunk carried great weight. But over and above this, the proposal was unpalatable to New South Wales for a reason which was only hinted at, but which probably was the deciding factor. To saddle the Commonwealth with the interest on the public debts would practically have meant imposing on the Federal Parliament the duty of raising a large amount through the Customs, and would have placed the freetrade party at a disadvantage in federal politics. It was seen that the amendment touched on dangerous ground, and it was accordingly negatived without division.

State Governors.—The clauses relating to the Governors of States gave some trouble, and showed a marked difference of opinion. The clause providing that communications between the State Governors and the Queen should be made through the Governor-General was on the one hand approved as a necessary consequence of the unity of Australia as regards the outside world; it was objected to on the other hand as a wanton interference with matters of purely State concern. On division, the clause was carried by a small majority. The clause providing that "in each State of the Commonwealth there shall be a Governor" was criticized as an unnecessary and inadvisable dictation to the States. Sir Samuel Griffith had no definite apology for the clause, except the somewhat unsatisfactory suggestion that it indicated that the States were sovereign; however, it was retained. Finally, the clause giving the Parliament of each State power to determine the mode of appointment of its Governor, and his tenure of office, was objected to as another unnecessary interference with the State Constitutions, and supported on the other hand as being merely the gift of a discretionary power. On division, the clause was carried by a majority of one.

Amendment.—In the clause dealing with the amendment of the Constitution, several members pointed out that the provision for ratification by "Conventions of a majority of the States" gave a second veto to the States, but none to the people as a whole. Sir Samuel Griffith admitted the force of the argument, and proposed to add a requirement that the people of the affirming States must contain a majority of the people of the Commonwealth. Mr. Playford pointed out that this was a clumsy contrivance, and that the whole difficulty arose from the false principle of taking the voice of the people indirectly through Conventions instead of directly at the polls. He advocated the Swiss plan of a referendum, requiring the assent of a majority of the people, and separate majorities in more than half the States. This view was supported by Dr. Cockburn and Mr. Deakin; but an amendment to that effect moved by Dr. Cockburn was defeated by a large majority, and Sir Samuel Griffith's suggestion was adopted.

The Committee stage ended with Mr. Dibbs' "bomb-shell"—an amendment providing that the site of the federal capital, instead of being left for the Federal Parliament to determine, should be fixed at Sydney. This was promptly rejected by 26 votes to 4—Mr. Dibbs alone, of the New South Wales delegation, voting for it; and the Bill was reported with amendments.

ADOPTION OF THE BILL.—A short debate then followed on a motion by Sir Samuel Griffith that the Bill as reported from the Committee be adopted by the Convention. The debate showed that, on the whole, the Convention were satisfied with their work. Sir Henry Parkes thought it "a wise, temperate, and successful compromise," and ventured upon the prophecy that all the colonies would accept it. At the same time, he warned his hearers of the opposition to be expected from opponents of Federation outside the Convention. "We may be sure," he said, "that the Bill will meet with perhaps virulent opposition. We know with what violence of feeling, with what violence of expression, every great work at every period of history has been assailed by those who were opposed to it, and still more by those who assailed it for no reason at all, and under no guidance that could be intelligible." He reminded them that already they had been accused of "giving away the liberties of New South Wales," of "giving the lands," of "giving up the control of the inland rivers;" and similar accusations would probably be made against the representatives of the other colonies. But in spite of the "anathemas hurled at us by certain people out of doors," and based either upon ignorance or upon wilful misrepresentation, he expressed his firm belief that the Bill would be ratified. And even assuming the contrary—assuming that the day of Federation had not yet come—"it cannot," he said, "be far off; and whenever the time comes, this admirably-drawn Bill, so clear, so instinct with a spirit of well-ordered liberty, so instinct with a true appreciation of stable and sober laws, so pervaded by the very spirit of toleration and mutual consideration—come whenever that time may, this Bill must be in the foundation of the edifice of federal liberty. It can never be forgotten, it can never be depreciated, it can never be made less than it is to-day; and supposing another Constitution should be framed by other men, to a very large extent the provisions of this Bill must be embodied in that Constitution, so that this Convention has breathed into this Bill the breath of an immortal life." Other delegates spoke more critically, but no less hopefully. Mr. Baker and Dr. Cockburn, from the small State point of view, regarded the Bill less cheerfully. Sir John Downer feared that the powers of the Senate were defined in words which were designedly ambiguous, and would lead to discord. Sir George Grey lamented that plural voting was not abolished. But doubts and fears were over-borne by the general chorus of satisfaction. Nearly every member was prepared, on the whole, to accept the Bill as it stood, as a good Constitution and a fair compromise; and it was adopted by the Convention without division.

THE MODE OF SUBMISSION.—The draft Constitution having been passed, the next thing to consider was what steps should be taken to secure its acceptance by the several colonies. Sir George Grey had already, immediately the Committee stage was over, moved a resolution that it should be "submitted to and adopted by a majority of a plebiscite of the people of Australia." This had been objected to as inconsistent with the idea of a voluntary acceptance by each individual colony, and Sir George had accepted an amendment providing for a plebiscite in each separate colony; but the motion as amended was rejected. As soon as the Convention had adopted the Constitution, Sir Samuel Griffith moved "That this Convention recommends that provision be made by the Parliaments of the several colonies for submitting for the approval of the people of the colonies respectively the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia as passed by this Convention." He argued—and the Convention as a whole agreed with him—that it was not for them to dictate to the colonies the manner in which they should accept the Constitution; all they could do was to refer that question to the several Parliaments. The question arose, however, whether the Constitution ought to be submitted to some ratifying body to accept or reject as a whole, or whether opportunity ought to be allowed for further reconsideration of its provisions. Most of the members were very averse to any re-opening of the decisions arrived at by the Convention. The work of the Convention had involved compromise and concession, and they feared that to allow each colony to pick it to pieces in its own interests, and undo all that had been done, would lead to endless confusion and delay. A few voices, however, were raised to urge them to "hasten slowly." Sir John Bray suggested consideration in detail by the Parliaments, and a second Convention, if necessary, to harmonize differences. To prevent the colonies from thinking that the Bill was being "crammed down their throats" he moved to substitute "consideration" for "approval." Mr. Wrixon supported the amendment, arguing that "this subject comes down on the people from above," and that a few years' delay was nothing compared with the importance of thorough consideration. The amendment, however, only secured seven supporters, and Sir Samuel Griffith's resolution was carried. It was followed by a further resolution recommending that as soon as the Constitution were adopted by three colonies, the Home Government should be requested to take steps to establish it in respect of those colonies. After some complimentary resolutions, Sir Henry Parkes, on 9th April, 1891, declared the Convention dissolved.

(8) THE FATE OF THE COMMONWEALTH BILL OF 1891.

RECEPTION OF THE BILL.—The framing of the Commonwealth Bill marked a notable advance in the movement. In place of vague abstractions, federationists had now a definite rallying ground, anti-federationists a definite line of attack. Advocacy and criticism became at once more direct, more circumstantial, more practical. The text of the Bill itself obtained a wide circulation, and was studied and preached upon by politicians of every class and type, by the metropolitan and provincial press, by debating societies, and political associations. An annotated edition, in pamphlet form, by Mr. G. B. Barton, was issued from the Government Printing Office of New South Wales; and the idea of Federation began to assume a definite shape in the minds of the people as a whole. Federation had long been in the air; it now came down to the earth. It had long been dreamed of, and sung of, as a destiny one day to be realized; it now could be examined and analyzed as a practical political scheme.

There can be no doubt that many members of the Convention had hoped that the work of construction was complete, and that the Bill as it stood might be adopted without delay as the Federal Constitution of Australia. But they were doomed to disappointment. It soon became clear that neither the Parliaments nor the people would accept the work of the Convention as final. The Parliaments, naturally enough, resented the idea that a constitutional change of such vast importance should be effected without their having any voice in the details of the scheme. And in the minds of many of the people there was a vague feeling of distrust of the Constitution, as the work of a body somewhat conservative in composition, only indirectly representative of the people, and entrusted with no very definite or detailed mandate even by the Parliaments which created it. The consequence was that while the Bill received unstinted praise in some quarters, it was subjected to unsparing criticism in others.

One circumstance in particular swelled the chorus of discontent, especially in New South Wales—the colony which was thenceforth to be the main battle-field of the movement. The “new democracy” was just then trying its wings. In 1891 the Labour Party made its first appearance in the Parliament of New South Wales, with great zeal for reform, with constitutional theories of its own, but with scanty political experience. To this party and its constituents the draft Constitution seemed to bristle with imaginary dangers. It conferred “enormous powers” on the Governor-General; it was steeped in “Imperialism;” it meant the crushing of the workers by a “military despotism.” These unreal terrors had much to do with the want of enthusiasm for Federation displayed at that stage by the Labour Party and its adherents.

Of course, however, there were other and less flimsy grounds of opposition. The Constitution was a compromise, with the faults as well as the merits of a compromise; the federal principles it contained were new to Australia, and their application to new circumstances gave room for much difference of opinion. In the large colonies, the composition and powers of the Senate were especially criticized. Equal representation, the power to suggest amendments in money bills, the absence of any provision for solving deadlocks, were in turn condemned and defended. The inadequacy of the financial provisions—the possibility that, under the trade and commerce power, trade might be unfairly diverted from one colony to another—the risk that the federal tariff might be too protective, or not protective enough—these and many other questions of constitutional principle and provincial interest were raised and debated.

DELAY IN NEW SOUTH WALES.—New South Wales was expected to take the lead in dealing with the Bill; and when Parliament opened on 19th May, the Governor’s speech announced that no time would be lost in submitting a resolution for that purpose. On the same day Sir Henry Parkes gave notice of the following resolutions:—

“That this House reaffirms its opinion in favour of the Federation of the Australian colonies, and taking into consideration all the circumstances of the constitution of the National Convention which met in Sydney in March last, as a duly authorized body appointed by all the Parliaments of Australia, and having due regard for the difficulties and the necessity for compromise in reconciling conflicting interests and coming to a common ground of agreement, it hereby approves of the scheme for an adequate Federal Constitution embodied in the draft Bill of the Convention. But it reserves to itself the right to propose amendments, to be fully set forth by the proposer in each case in a schedule, and to be fully considered, if deemed advisable, by another Convention similarly constituted, and in like manner representing all the colonies.

"2. That this House is further of opinion that the question, as dealt with by this Parliament, should be submitted to the people in their electoral capacity for final approval."

The somewhat elaborate and argumentative form of these resolutions, and the haste to give notice of them before the debate on the Address in Reply, were strategic devices to answer in advance the expected attack. The attack came from Mr. G. H. Reid, who moved an amendment on the address, to the effect that the House recognized the distinguished ability and zealous labours of the Convention, and was desirous of federal union "on principles just to the several colonies," but affirmed that the Bill was not just "in some important respects, two of which we desire to indicate, namely:—(1) The powers over revenue, taxation, and expenditure conferred on the proposed Senate; (2) the rejection by the Convention, and the omission from the Bill, of responsible government as a necessary part of the Constitution." The amendment also complained that the federal power of legislative interference with the general commercial management of the railway and river systems, without any provision for assuming obligations in respect of them, was not founded upon just principles. In the course of his speech, Mr. Reid laid great stress on the danger to which the freetrade policy of New South Wales would be exposed by Federation. He compared New South Wales to a teetotaler who contemplated keeping house with five drunkards. "I will not put my principle of freetrade," he said, "in the power of the Victorian protectionists." He resented any attempt to "cram this Bill down the throats of Parliament," but at the same time expressed himself ready to accept the right kind of Bill. The amendment was negatived on division by a substantial majority.

Sir Henry Parkes, however, was not destined to move the resolutions of which he had given notice. The House was within eight months of expiry by effluxion of time, and the Ministry were anxious, for obvious political reasons, not to neglect "urgent local legislation" for the sake of what their opponents termed the "fad" of Federation. Then came a motion of censure, resulting in an equal division; and on 6th June the Assembly was dissolved.

The new Parliament met in July, with the new element—the Labour Party—some 30 strong in a House of 141. The new party cared little for Federation, and less for the Convention Bill; they were elected to secure "urgent provincial legislation" in the interests of their fellow-workers. They supported the Government; and the Government on its part consented to place Federation third on the programme—where it remained until the defeat and resignation of the Ministry in October. Some weeks previously to this event, a debate had occurred which throws some light on the attitude of the New South Wales Assembly at that time towards Federation. Mr. Henry Copeland, on 1st September, moved a resolution in favour of a protective tariff. Mr. Barton moved an amendment to the effect that inasmuch as the anticipated federal union would bring about a common fiscal policy for all Australia, and as meanwhile the co-operation of all parties was necessary in securing urgent legislation, "the financial requirements of the colony, rather than the rigid doctrines of any system of political economy, should regulate the mode of raising any further revenue through the Customs." During the debate, the labour party reiterated their demand for "useful legislation," and did not commit themselves to any particular federal views; though they would support Federation on their own lines. Mr. Reid expressed himself confident that Federation would not come soon, "because the position taken by several of the smaller colonies, on certain points, is so firm, that the inevitable amendments that will be effected in this House, and which have already to some extent been effected in Victoria, will put off any agreement on the subject for a long time to come." Though there was actually a majority of protectionists in the House, the direct protectionist vote could not be carried. Sincere Federalists on both sides of the House were prepared to forego the fiscal fight for the sake of Federation; the greater part of the labour party were prepared to do the same for the sake of social legislation; so that the two new issues of Federation and Labour combined, for the time being, to keep the fiscal issue in check. In the end, Mr. Barton's amendment to the resolution was carried, and the resolution as amended was then defeated.

VICTORIA.—Meanwhile the Parliaments of Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania had attempted to make some progress with the discussion of the Commonwealth Bill. On 30th June, Mr. Munro, in the Victorian Assembly, moved a resolution "That this House approves generally of" the Bill; it being understood that there would be an opportunity afterwards for consideration in detail. The general debate extended over eight sitting days, and showed the House on the whole to be distinctly favourable, though there was a determined section of critics led by Sir Bryan O'Loughlen, who were for insisting on the principle of "one man one vote" as a condition precedent, and complained bitterly of the excessive powers of the Senate. The manufacturing interests had long been eager for Federation, for the sake of wider markets, and were prepared to take their chance with the competition of the other colonies; but the farming and agricultural interests, though not anti-federal, were always fighting for more protection against intercolonial produce, and especially for an increase of the stock-tax. The resolution having been carried, the discussion in Committee began on 21st July, and lasted until 27th August, extending over nine sitting days. Many amendments were proposed—mostly by Sir Bryan O'Loughlen—but few were carried. The most notable amendment made was the striking out of the Senate's power to suggest amendments in money bills; a proceeding which was partly a protest against the claims of the Victorian Upper House. The right of the Lower House to sole financial control had long been a prominent article of liberal faith in Victoria; for curiously enough that colony—the only one in which the Constitution expressly forbids the Legislative Council to amend Appropriation or Tax Bills—has seen the most serious "deadlocks" that have occurred in Australia. Another instructive feature of the debate was the strong opposition shown, by the representatives of Victorian farming interests, to the admission of New Zealand within the magic circle of the Commonwealth. An amendment to substitute "Australian" for "Australasian," and another to omit "New Zealand" from the number of States entitled to adopt the Constitution, were narrowly defeated; but later on an amendment was carried to except New Zealand from the colonies which might be subsequently admitted as "New States."

In the Legislative Council of Victoria, the general resolution was moved by Mr. Cuthbert on 8th July, and carried after a three nights' debate. The Council then waited for the Assembly, and between 29th September and 21st October, with only four sittings, it dealt with the Bill and with the Assembly's amendments. It restored the power of suggestion, which the Assembly had struck out; and it forwarded to the Assembly a message which was never considered.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—The South Australian Assembly began the consideration of the Bill simultaneously with the Victorian Assembly. Mr. Playford, on 30th June, moved a resolution approving generally of the Bill, and of a second Convention, if necessary. While New South Wales remained passive, there was no hurry, and the debate proceeded slowly. The six nights which it occupied were spread out over nearly three months; and a fragmentary consideration in Committee, begun on 29th September, was not quite finished when the Assembly prorogued on 19th December. The two chief amendments made were for the election of Senators by the people, and for the submission of constitutional amendments to a referendum in each colony, instead of to a Convention.

In the Legislative Council the debate was even more leisurely. The resolution was moved by Mr. W. Copley on 7th July, debated on nine evenings, and carried on 8th September. The following week its consideration in Committee got as far as the omission of the word "Commonwealth"—for which, however, no substitute could be agreed on. Then the Council decided to wait for the Assembly—with the result that nothing more was done that session. Next year, however, the discussion was resumed, in a somewhat perfunctory way, and in December, 1892, the Bill was reported with amendments.

TASMANIA.—Tasmania, too, made some effort to deal with the question, but on rather different lines. There it was proposed to ask the Houses to consider the Bill first, and then to remit it to the consideration of a provincial Convention elected by the voters of Tasmania. Accordingly in July a "Commonwealth of Australia Bill" was introduced by the Attorney-General (Mr. A. Inglis Clark) providing for 50 representatives being elected, upon the House of Assembly rolls, to consider the Bill. The draft Constitution was also considered by the House in Committee, and the amendments made were attached to Mr. Clark's Bill, which was passed and sent to the Council. It there reached its second reading, but after several adjournments it was ultimately shelved, on the ground that Tasmania's part in the matter was to follow, not to lead.

NEW SOUTH WALES.—The Parliaments of three colonies had thus found time to deal partially, if somewhat perfunctorily, with the matter; but neither Queensland, Western Australia, nor New Zealand had taken any steps at all. The two latter colonies took little interest in the matter; and indeed in New Zealand an abstract motion by Sir George Grey on the subject of Federation, but having no direct reference to the Convention Bill, was unceremoniously counted out. In Queensland, however, the Chief Secretary, Sir Samuel Griffith, announced his readiness, and that of his colony, to follow the lead of New South Wales. All Australia, in fact, was waiting for New South Wales; and we must now direct our attention once more to the course of events in that colony.

The retirement from office, in October, 1891, of Sir Henry Parkes, the recognized leader of the movement, left but a slender prospect of immediate action being taken by the New South Wales Parliament. Mr. Reid, and a large section of the freetraders, put freetrade before Federation; the labour party put social questions before Federation. Mr. G. R. Dibbs, the new Premier, was no friend of the Commonwealth Bill; nor were most of his colleagues. Mr. Barton, however, who was already recognized as Sir Henry Parkes' federal lieutenant—though in provincial party politics they were on opposite sides—accepted the Attorney-Generalship in the new Ministry, on the understanding that he was to have a free hand in dealing with Federation. Mr. R. E. O'Connor, also an earnest federalist, took the portfolio of Minister of Justice, with a seat in the Upper House. Mr. Barton, at the general election and also at his re-election as Minister, laid down his federal programme clearly, on the following lines:—(1) The draft Constitution to be fully debated; (2) Parliament to specify its amendments; (3) the Bill and desired amendments to be laid before a second Convention; (4) the Bill as amended by the second Convention to be submitted to each Parliament; and (5) to be finally submitted to the people, each man to have only one vote.

But Mr. Barton had a difficult task. He was surrounded by unsympathetic colleagues in an unsympathetic House. The Parliament was interested in "urgent local legislation"—notably the tariff and the Electoral Bill—and was not keenly interested in Federation. Though the general feeling of the community was supposed to be federal, no active political pressure was as yet being brought to bear on members by their constituencies. On 21st December Mr. Andrew Kelly, a labour member, moved a resolution in the Assembly "That no system for the federation of the colonies will be acceptable to this House until the electoral system provides for the principle of one man one vote at the election for members of the House of Representatives." After half an hour's debate, in a thin House, this was carried.

Early in 1892 Sir Henry Parkes wrote a letter to Mr. Dibbs, informing him that he would propose an entirely new course for dealing with Federation, "founded upon the proceedings of the thirteen original States of the American union." He seems to have lost faith in the possibility of carrying Federation through by Parliamentary action alone; and accordingly, in March, 1892, he moved the adjournment of the House to discuss "the movement in favour of Federation, and the most expedient course to be pursued in bringing it to a successful conclusion." He reviewed the movement, complained bitterly of the tactics of opponents, dealt with the causes of delay, and affirmed that Parliament was a very unfit body to deal with the question, because it was elected for other purposes. Finally he unfolded his new plan:—

“Now, if my contention be at all sustainable, that Parliament is not elected to deal with this question, but that on the contrary it ought to be elected to deal with quite different questions, we are driven to enquire what steps should be taken; and though we may be excused from our inexperience in not adopting this step at an earlier stage, still it seems to me to be the only step that can be taken, if we are in earnest in desiring to bring this great question of the union of the colonies to a successful issue—that is, for the people themselves, the electors who sent us into this Assembly, the electors themselves throughout the colonies, to elect another Convention to revise the draft Constitution of the late Convention, and to frame a new Bill, if in their wisdom they think proper to do so.”

Mr. Barton, however, favoured adhering to the lines already laid down of Parliamentary discussion and a second Parliamentary Convention. Shortly afterwards, on 23rd November—notwithstanding protests from those whose chief desire was “urgent legislation”—he introduced the federal resolutions, re-affirming the principle of Federation, approving the main principles of the Commonwealth Bill, and expressing the opinion that the Bill should be dealt with in Committee, and the amendments of the several Parliaments remitted to a second Convention, similarly appointed and reporting to the Parliaments, and that the question of final adoption should be submitted to the electors.

The debate which followed was somewhat languid. Mr. J. H. Want moved an amendment, limiting the resolutions to an affirmation of the principle of Federation, and the desirability of discussing the Bill in Committee. Mr. Reid announced that he now took a more sanguine view of the prospects of Federation; and that the general movement, in Australia and elsewhere, in favour of freetrade, encouraged “a more rational and better idea that my principles will not be sacrificed.” His objections to the Commonwealth Bill, however, remained as strong as ever. The debate was interrupted by a motion of censure, but was resumed on 11th January, 1893. Mr. Kelly again moved his amendment that no Federation would be acceptable that did not provide for “one man one vote;” but the absurdity of dictating conditions was pointed out, and the amendment was negatived. An attempt was made to shelve the question, on the two grounds of “urgent legislation” and the wickedness of the Bill; but this also failed, and the resolutions were carried. Circumstances again conspired to delay the consideration in Committee, but this was promised for the following session.

In the Legislative Council, after several postponements, Mr. R. E. O’Conor on 17th May moved the same resolutions. His speech was noteworthy for a suggestion in regard to “deadlocks”—that if a Bill granting supplies were thrown out by the Senate in one session, and the disagreement continued in the next session, the two Houses should sit together, and some specified majority of the joint sitting should decide the matter finally. The resolutions were carried, but, the end of the session being near, the consideration of the Bill in Committee had to stand over.

In September Parliament was again convened, and on 12th October Mr. Barton moved that the House go into Committee to consider the Bill. Mr. Arthur Rae, a labour member, moved an amendment to the effect that Federation would "do nothing to meet those social and industrial problems so urgently pressing for solution," and that the draft Constitution was "of too rigid a character to suit the progressive spirit of Australian democracy, and should not be proceeded with without a special mandate from the people of New South Wales." Sir Henry Parkes moved the adjournment of the debate, and it was never again reached. In the Council the first few clauses were actually discussed in Committee during November and December, but in a very desultory way; and little progress had been made when a prorogation intervened. A few days later both Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor resigned their portfolios, owing to a resolution passed in the Assembly criticizing their action in accepting briefs against the Railway Commissioners; and all hope of Parliamentary action was for the time at an end. In short, the Parliamentary process of dealing with the Commonwealth Bill had broken down hopelessly.

(9) THE POPULAR MOVEMENT.

GROWTH OF FEDERAL SENTIMENT.—Sir John Robertson's boast that "Federation is as dead as Julius Cæsar," was coming to be a favourite saying of anti-federalists; but as a matter of fact the federal spirit was only just beginning to awaken. The Commonwealth Bill, though neglected by the Parliaments, had helped to educate the people. Since 1891, public interest in the question of Federation had been steadily gaining ground; from 1892 onwards it began to advance rapidly, as a result of the collapse of the "land boom," the financial panic, and the resulting commercial depression. The crisis showed plainly that the prosperity of each colony was bound up in that of the others; that disaster to one meant loss to all; and that strength lay in co-operation. These considerations helped to break down the spirit of isolation and mutual jealousy which prosperity had fostered, and to emphasize the dangers of disunion.

Moreover, bad times helped the cause of Federation in another way. The general stagnation of trade set every one enquiring for himself into the causes which clogged the wheels; and the folly of inter-provincial barriers became increasingly apparent. Federation began to appeal to the pocket as well as to the heart; and the people began to wake up to the fact that the "fad of Federation," with which politicians and Parliaments had been dallying so long, meant the salvation of Australia.

AUSTRALIAN NATIVES' ASSOCIATION.—It had long become apparent that the Parliaments would accomplish little without a stimulus from their constituents; and the conviction grew that federalists must create a public organization, with the twofold object of demonstrating to the Parliaments the strength of the federal sentiment, and of further solidifying and educating that sentiment. For the chief share in the initiation of that movement, credit must be given to the Australian Natives' Association—an organization which, though less extensive in the other colonies, had in Victoria attained an extraordinary development, and represented the bulk of the political activity and enthusiasm of the younger generation. This Association, which was not only a power in politics, but also a political training school of the greatest value, had always been unswerving in its zeal for Federation; and it was natural that the impulse for organization should spring from it. Under the leadership of such able successive Presidents as Mr. A. J. Peacock (1885-1886), Mr. T. J. Connelly (1887), Mr. J. L. Purves, Q.C. (1888-1889), Mr. D. J. Wheal (1890), Mr. G. H. Wise (1891), this Association had helped to develop the federal sentiment widely throughout the colony, and was persistent in its agitation for definite action. At the end of January, 1890, a few days before the sitting of the Federal Conference convened by Sir Henry Parkes, a federal demonstration under the auspices of the Association was held in Melbourne. It was composed of delegates from its branches in all the colonies. This gathering, which is regarded by the Association with just pride, was presided over by Sir John Bray, of South Australia. Great enthusiasm and an intelligent interest in the cause of Australian union were displayed, and the following resolutions formulating the basis of a Federal Constitution were passed:—

1. That the time has now arrived for the Federation of the Australian colonies.
2. That a Federal Legislature should be established, to consist of a Governor-General and two Houses of Parliament.
3. That the members of one House should be elected by the Legislatures, and those of the other House by the people of the several colonies.
4. That in one House each colony should be represented by an equal number of members.
5. That the Federal Legislature should be empowered to deal with national matters, including:—(1) General defences; (2) Federal Court of Appeal; (3) relations of Australia with the islands of the Pacific; (4) naturalization; (5) uniform customs duties, after a date to be agreed upon by the Legislatures of the several colonies; (6) railways; (7) post and telegraph; (8) the public debt; (9) federal revenue; (10) the division of any colony; (11) marriage and divorce laws; (12) insolvency; (13) quarantine regulations; (14) coinage; (15) patents, copyrights, and trade marks; (16) all legislation affecting provincial affairs should be left to the Parliament of each colony.

FEDERATION LEAGUES.—In March, 1893, at the annual conference of the Australian Natives' Association, held at Kyneton, the dissatisfaction with Parliamentary dallying found vent, and it was recognized that active popular organization was needed to impress the provincial Parliaments with the necessity for action. As the outcome of the Kyneton Conference, a deputation waited upon Mr. Barton to urge him to form a central Federation League in Sydney.

Mr. Barton himself had already been moving in the same direction. Though he had been unable to do much in Parliament, he had endeavoured by a series of public meetings in different parts of the colony to keep the Federal lamp alight. In December, 1892, he had visited Corowa and Albury on this mission, and had assured the folk on both sides of the Border that a Federal League, on strictly non-party lines, would greatly strengthen the hands of federalists in Sydney and Melbourne. The advice was acted upon; in January, 1893, Corowa and Albury each formed an "Australian Federation League;" and by the end of May there were 15 branches of the League in the valley of the Murray. But the need was still felt of a central organization to keep all the colonies in touch; and accordingly in June Mr. Barton convened a preliminary meeting of federalists, at which it was resolved to form an Australasian Federation League in Sydney; and at a public meeting in the Town Hall on 3rd July, the League was formed. Its auspices were not at first very favourable. Sir Henry Parkes stood aloof. He claimed that the idea of forming Federal Leagues had originated with himself, and was afterwards appropriated by others who ignored his right to leadership (speech at Liverpool, N.S.W., reported Sydney Morning Herald, 30th July, 1893). A meeting of the freetrade party, called by Mr. G. H. Reid, seemed suspicious of the new League, and resolved that in the then state of party politics no alliances could be formed even on the question of Federation, but that individual members of the party should be left free to use their own discretion. Opposition also turned up in another quarter; the members of the "Democratic Social Federation" made a determined but unsuccessful effort to capture the Town Hall meeting, and to pass resolutions in favour of an Australian Republic.

However, the League was duly formed, with a Constitution which pledged it "to advance the cause of Australian Federation by an organization of citizens owning no class distinction or party influence, and using its best energies to assist Parliamentary action, from whatever source proceeding, calculated to further the common aim of Australian patriotism." It did not commit itself to any particular scheme of Federation, but advocated "the Federal Union of Australasia on such lines as may be constitutionally approved by all the colonies concerned after further deliberation and report by assembled representatives of each." The League never had a sensational history, but thenceforward to the end of the fight it shows a record of steady organizing and educating work. It formed a nucleus for an active body of earnest federalists in Sydney, and a connecting link between the country leagues, which began to spring up in numbers, especially in the border districts. This result was largely due to the indefatigable work of Mr. Edward Dowling, who from first to last was principal honorary secretary to the League. The example spread. At the end of 1893 and the beginning of 1894, leagues were formed in Melbourne, Bendigo, Ballarat, Echuca and other Victorian towns. In August, 1895, a league was formed at Adelaide; in July, 1898, one was inaugurated in Brisbane, and in July, 1899, one was formed in Auckland.

COROWA CONFERENCE, 1893.—In the new movement the Border Leagues at once began to take an active part. The policy of hostile tariffs and commercial isolation doubtless affected the great cities in an equal degree; but to the dwellers near the border the disadvantages were more direct and more obvious. The Border Leagues, therefore, were among the most active missionaries in the movement; and on their invitation a Conference was held at Corowa, on 31st July and 1st August, 1893, to which representatives from trading and commercial bodies, Federation Leagues, branches of the Australian Natives' Association, and kindred associations on both sides of the Murray, were invited. The Sydney League sent two delegates, all the Border Leagues were represented, and representatives from various branches of the Australian Natives' Association—especially on the Victorian side—mustered in force. The usual resolutions expressing the urgent need for Federation were proposed and warmly supported, and united organization were resolved upon; but as the proceedings drew to a close it was felt that something more was required. Of enthusiastic speaking there was no end; the demand was now made for some definite and practical basis of action. To meet this, Dr. John Quick, a representative of the Bendigo branch of the A.N.A., proposed a resolution which marked a new epoch and initiated a new mode of dealing with the question:—"That in the opinion of this Conference the Legislature of each Australasian colony should pass an Act providing for the election of representatives to attend a statutory Convention or Congress to consider and adopt a Bill to establish a Federal Constitution for Australia, and upon the adoption of such Bill or measure it be submitted by some process of referendum to the verdict of each colony." This resolution was carried unanimously, and was the achievement which makes the Corowa Conference historically important.

Dr. Quick did not leave the resolution to its fate, but, upon his return to Bendigo, elaborated it into a definite scheme. He framed an "Australian Federal Congress Bill," which he submitted to the Bendigo League, and which was discussed and adopted by that body and was published on 1st January, 1894. This Bill in its main features became the basis of the Enabling Acts which were afterwards passed in all the colonies, and by means of which the cause of Australian union was ultimately brought to a successful issue. It purported to "provide for the representation of Victoria at an Australasian Congress legally created to frame a Constitution for the Federation of the Australasian colonies, and further to provide for the reference of such Constitution when framed to the vote of the people," and was designed as the model for a series of Acts to be passed, in substantially uniform shape, in all the colonies. The procedure which such a series of Acts would have laid down is shortly this:—

- (1.) That each colony should elect, on its Parliamentary franchise, ten representatives to a Federal Congress.
- (2.) That the Congress should frame a Federal Constitution.
- (3.) That, on a day to be arranged between the Governments, the Federal Constitution should be referred to the electors of each colony for acceptance or rejection.
- (4.) That if the Constitution were accepted by majorities in two or more colonies, it should be forwarded to the Imperial Government to be passed into law.

The novel and all-important element in this proposal was the idea of mapping out the whole process in advance by Acts of Parliament—of making statutory provision for the last step before the first step was taken. Hitherto, each successive step in the framing of a Constitution had been left dependent on the concurrence of all the Parliaments or all the Governments for the time being; with the result that every hitch, every discouragement, had led to delay, and all the zeal and labour expended on the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 seemed in danger of being lost, and the prospect of bringing the question to a final issue was as remote as ever. But here was a scheme which, when once launched, would ensure the framing of a Constitution and its submission to the people. Every step in the process would thus be invested, in the minds of the people, with a seriousness and importance otherwise unattainable. Those who had jested at the Convention of 1891 as a body of men engaged in the amiable and amusing task of drawing up a Constitution for the waste-paper basket would have to admit that there was something serious about a Constitution which, when framed, the Government would be obliged by law to submit to the electors for their acceptance or rejection.

Another feature of the scheme, equally important, but not absolutely new, was the principle of the direct popular initiative in the election of the Congress or Convention. The two things now wanted were popular interest in the framing of a Constitution, and popular confidence in the Constitution when framed; and the best guarantee of both these things was that the people should be asked to choose for themselves the men to whom the task was to be entrusted. The adherents of the Parliamentary system had thought that the people would be less likely than the Parliaments to select men who by ability and training were most suited for the work of Constitution-making; but they had forgotten that more important even than the personnel of the Convention was the public confidence in the Convention. The result showed that the chosen representatives of the people were for the most part those who would have been the chosen representatives of the Parliaments; but from the fact of their election by the people they had a power, and they enjoyed a confidence, which election by the Parliaments could never have given them.

But though Dr. Quick's scheme meant a new start, it did not mean that the work already done was to be wasted. It was intended to supersede, not the Commonwealth Bill, but the process of dealing with that Bill; not the work of the Sydney Convention, but the abortive attempts to complete that work. The assembling of a second convention—the expediency of having it elected by the people—the necessity of a final referendum—had already been suggested in connection with the Bill of 1891. What had not hitherto been suggested was that all these steps should first be pre-ordained by Enabling Acts in all the colonies.

The new proposals at once attracted attention. They were favourably noticed in the press, they were discussed and reported upon by Federation Leagues and kindred bodies; they were expounded by the framer himself at meetings at various places. In January, 1894, he came to Sydney, and explained his scheme to a meeting of the Central League, which referred it to a Select Committee for consideration and report. This Committee presented its report at a meeting of the League held on 15th March, when the report was unanimously adopted. The report heartily endorsed the idea of mapping out the programme by Enabling Bills in all the colonies, but suggested a modification in the process of framing the Constitution—namely, that each colony should first elect, on its Parliamentary suffrage, a provincial Convention to formulate its own ideas of a scheme of Federation, and that these schemes should then be submitted to a Federal Convention, elected by the Parliaments, which should frame a Federal Constitution in which the views of the several colonies should as far as practicable be harmonized. It was feared that the attempt to strike off a Federal Constitution at one sitting, without consulting the separate colonies except for the final vote on the completed Constitution, might fail to secure adequate adjustment of conflicting interests, and thus lead to the rejection of the Constitution at the polls.

DIBBS' UNIFICATION SCHEME.—At this stage an interlude occurred in the shape of an alternative scheme of union, drawn up by Sir George Dibbs, the Premier of New South Wales. He had always been a severe critic of the Commonwealth Bill; and on 22nd May, 1894, in a speech to his constituents at Tamworth, he propounded a scheme of complete unification. This scheme was immediately condemned by Sir Henry Parkes and Mr. Barton, and by the federalist press, as being impracticable; but Sir George Dibbs shortly afterwards formulated it in a letter dated 12th June to Sir James Patterson, Premier of Victoria, in which he announced that the consideration he had given to the federal question since the Convention of 1891, but "more especially since the fiasco of the banking crisis found us so injuriously divided," had led him to the conclusion "that it would be easier first to completely unify the interests of the two great colonies of Victoria and New South Wales, and then to attract neighbouring colonies within the sphere of our extended influence." He set out his objections to the Commonwealth Bill; it leant too much to American ideas, too little to Canadian; it involved the expense of State and Federal establishments; its financial provisions were unfair and unworkable; equal representation in the Senate was absurd. On the other hand, it secured no federal control over public debts, railways, or land revenues, and would tend to perpetuate existing rivalries. "How far more beneficial in every way; how far more likely to extend our revenues and minimise our expenditures; how far more impressive to the outside world and to our creditors in England, would be a complete pooling of our debts, our railways, our national establishments generally. We are none of us so badly off that we cannot be permitted to meet each other on equal terms. In such a partnership New South Wales would not be disposed to say to her neighbours, 'Your debts are more burdensome, your railways and lands less productive than ours.' We would give to the United Government that prestige and supreme control which is almost entirely denied under the Commonwealth scheme, wherein the Federal Legislature would be numerically and structurally wholly overshadowed by the provincial Governments; and without haggling over the items, we would be prepared to hand over our Custom-houses, post offices, and other necessary establishments for the common good, provided others did the same." That there must be local governments in the provinces he admitted; but he would confine these local governments, "as in Canada," within subordinate limits, and to strictly local purposes. He practically admitted that the other colonies could not be induced to join such a union at the outset; but he submitted the following draft outline of a scheme for the consideration of the people of the two colonies of New South Wales and Victoria:—

"Unification of New South Wales and Victoria as a preliminary to complete Australian Union.

"Union for all national purposes to be complete as under:—

- (1.) One Viceroy, or Governor.
- (2.) One Parliament of two Chambers.
- (3.) One Customs tariff.
- (4.) One scale of excise duties.
- (5.) One joint debt.
- (6.) One railway management.
- (7.) One land revenue and one land law. Until the laws are consolidated, existing regulations to hold good.
- (8.) One Defence Administration.
- (9.) One postal and telegraph administration.
- (10.) Provincial Government, with wide local powers.
- (11.) Surplus revenue of the Supreme Government to be apportioned to the Provinces—partly on a population basis, partly on an occupied mileage area basis.
- (12.) Certain departments of the Public Service removed from political influence may have their headquarters in Melbourne, others in Sydney.
- (13.) One High Commissioner's establishment in London, representing the whole.
- (14.) One Supreme Court.
- (15.) Title, 'The United Colonies.' Afterwards, when South Australia and Queensland come in, the title to be 'The Dominion of Australia.'

This letter evoked merely a non-committal reply from Sir James Patterson, but it was printed and circulated, and found a certain number of adherents. Unification—assuming it to be practicable—does undeniably present certain advantages over Federation, and has always, in the minds of many people, seemed a preferable form of Government. Sir George Dibbs, of course, was not the first apostle of unification—an idea which really meant little more than undoing the work of separation and re-establishing the earlier complete unity. Sir John Robertson—a typical New South Wales anti-federalist—had always expressed his willingness to welcome Victoria back as a "repentant child;" and there is reason to believe that even Sir Henry Parkes, at the very outset of his career, had some leaning to a complete amalgamation. He had soon convinced himself, however, that a federal union was the only form of union to which the assent of the Australian colonies could possibly be secured. The history of the colonies as self-governing communities had given rise to local sentiments and local patriotisms; their several free institutions were the results of long and arduous political struggles; and any attempt to abolish the constitutions of the colonies entirely, to overthrow their existing Parliaments and their existing local independence, would be an impossible task. Nor, if possible, is it clear that it would be desirable; for unification has its disadvantages as well as its advantages. The immense areas of the different colonies, and their climatic and industrial conditions, make the preservation of their individuality highly important; whilst they also afford a strong argument against entrusting unlimited powers to a central government which, in the nature of things, cannot have complete knowledge of, nor complete sympathy with, all the different local requirements of the different colonies.

Much that Sir George Dibbs said about the omissions of the Commonwealth Bill and the desirableness of federating the railways and the debts, had a great deal of force. Still, this was criticism which did not involve the federal principle of the Bill, but merely the extent of federal control. The shortcomings which he mentioned were curable without any departure from the federal principle, and have indeed for the most part been cured by the subsequent elaboration of the Bill.

One serious blemish of the Dibbs scheme was that it deliberately contemplated dividing Australia into two sections—the large States and the small States—and denying to the latter any voice in the form of the union. New South Wales and Victoria were to frame the Constitution, and the other colonies were to accept the terms dictated, or stay outside. The impossibility of getting them willingly to consent to practical annexation was apparent; but whether—if the initial difficulty of amalgamating the two large colonies had been surmounted—the others could ever have been forced in, is highly doubtful. The irritation which such an attempt would have caused would have been, to say the least of it, an unfavourable auspice for union.

The unification idea has undoubtedly had some influence on the structure of the Constitution as it stands to-day; but not enough to satisfy the extreme unificationists, whose weight, curiously enough, has chiefly been thrown into the anti-federal scale. Sir George Dibbs' scheme has been more or less prominent, throughout the whole history of the movement, as a counterblast to the panegyrists of the Federal Constitution. It has afforded an opportunity to assert that the federalists are only half and half unionists—are in fact the "real provincialists"—and that the real unionists are those who preach an impracticable unification. But it has never been an active mission on its own account and for its own sake.

THE REID MINISTRY.—On 2nd August, 1894, after a general election, the Dibbs Government resigned, and next day the Reid Administration came into office. Mr. Reid immediately placed Federation on his programme, and in his manifesto to the electors of King Division declared that his Government would "lose no time in restoring the subject of Australian Federation to its rightful position of commanding importance and urgency." He soon announced that he was in favour of a new Convention elected by the people of all the colonies, and he communicated with the other Premiers with a view to a preliminary conference. Federation, however, did not occupy the first place in the list. Matters of local legislation, and particularly the question with which the Ministerial party were most closely associated—the repeal of the Dibbs duties and the substitution of a purely freetrade tariff, with land and income taxes—took precedence. On 12th November the Premier was waited upon by a deputation from the Federation League, which placed before him Dr. Quick's scheme and the League's report upon it. He received them favourably, and declared himself deeply impressed with the merits of the two schemes; but said that as the procedure to be adopted was to be discussed with his brother Premiers, and must be the result of joint deliberations, he could not at that stage commit himself to a definite course.

Next day Sir Henry Parkes moved in the Assembly the following resolution:—"That in view of the rapid growth of Australia in the elements of national life, and the number of questions arising out of that growth which can only be dealt with adequately by a national Legislature, it is in the highest sense desirable that Parliament, without loss of time, should resume the consideration of the Federation of these colonies under one national Government." He emphasized the fact that this motion had no relation to any party, or to any personal feeling—though he hinted that there was somebody of whom he strongly disapproved. In a dignified and statesmanlike speech he urged the importance of prompt action, but oracularly refrained from any definite proposal. He deprecated, however, throwing aside the Convention of 1891, and starting afresh with any less representative body; and he insisted that every step must be made in concurrence with all the other colonies—words which excluded the Dibbs scheme, but which left his attitude with regard to the Enabling Bill process in doubt. Mr. Reid, in reply, reiterated the views he had expressed to the deputation. The debate disclosed little opposition, but not very much enthusiasm; speakers from the labour party especially maintaining that other matters were more urgent. The resolution was carried, after several hours' debate, by 55 votes to 10—the noes mostly consisting of labour members.

THE PREMIERS' CONFERENCE.—The Conference of Premiers met at Hobart, on 29th January, 1895, the Premiers present being Mr. Reid (New South Wales), Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Turner (Victoria), Mr. (afterwards Sir) Hugh M. Nelson (Queensland), Mr. C. C. Kingston (South Australia), Sir Edward Braddon (Tasmania), and Sir John Forrest (Western Australia). The following resolutions, submitted by Mr. Reid, were carried:—

- (1.) That this Conference regards Federation as the great and pressing question of Australasian politics.
- (2.) That a Convention, consisting of ten representatives from each colony, directly chosen by the electors, be charged with the duty of framing a Federal Constitution.
- (3.) That the Constitution so framed be submitted to the electors for acceptance or rejection by a direct vote.

- (4.) That such Constitution, if accepted by the electors of three or more colonies, be transmitted to the Queen by an Address from the Parliaments of those colonies praying for the necessary legislative enactment.
- (5.) That a Bill be submitted to the Parliament of each colony for the purpose of giving effect to the foregoing resolutions.
- (6.) That Messrs. Turner and Kingston be requested to prepare a draft Bill for the consideration of this Conference.

Except for Mr. Nelson and Sir John Forrest, these resolutions were carried unanimously. Mr. Nelson agreed to everything except the proposal that the Constitution should be submitted for the approval of the electors of each colony; he thought that the approval of the colonies "should be obtained in such manner as each colony may prescribe in the Act authorizing such Convention." Sir John Forrest appended the following statement:—"While agreeing that Federation is the great and pressing question of Australasian politics, I am opposed to the procedure proposed to be adopted, and I am of opinion (1) that the draft Commonwealth Bill of 1891 should be first considered by the Parliaments of the respective colonies; (2) that any amendments made by the several Parliaments should be referred to a second Convention to be appointed by the several Parliaments after a general election, and that the Bill, as approved by this second Convention, be final, and be submitted for the necessary Imperial legislation."

Mr. Kingston would have preferred to begin with an Imperial Federal Enabling Act which would enable the colonies, without further Imperial legislation, to adopt any Constitution framed as above, subject only to the Royal assent. He did not, however, think that this view ought to prevent South Australia's co-operation in the scheme proposed.

On 6th February the draft Bill prepared by Mr. Turner and Mr. Kingston was "considered, amended, and agreed to as the draft of a type of Bill suitable for giving effect to the resolutions of the Conference." Mr. Reid intimated that "so soon as practicable after the re-assembling of the New South Wales Parliament his Government would introduce a measure providing for the chief objects of the Bill as defined in the draft." Messrs. Turner, Kingston, Nelson, and Sir Edward Braddon intimated that as soon as New South Wales had passed the Bill they would follow suit—Mr. Nelson, however, reserving the right to dispense with the direct reference to the electors. Sir John Forrest was not present, and was not committed in any way.

The draft Bill framed by the Conference provided in detail for the procedure outlined by the resolutions; and it embodied one very important amplification of them. It provided that the Convention, after framing a draft Constitution, should adjourn for a period of not less than 30 and not more than 60 days; and that it should then re-assemble, reconsider the Constitution with any amendments that might be proposed, and finally adopt it with any amendments that might be agreed to. This provision obviated the objections which the Sydney league had made to Dr. Quick's scheme. It gave time for reflection and reconsideration; it gave an opportunity for the several colonies, through their legislatures or otherwise, to formulate their criticisms and objections; and it thus ensured a more thorough threshing out of all questions of conflicting interest. The Premiers' plan thus followed in the main the outlines of Dr. Quick's proposal.

The merits of this scheme were obvious and notable. It avoided all the great defects of the process of 1891. It secured popular interest, by providing that the members of the Convention should be elected by the people themselves, and that the Constitution should be submitted to the people themselves for acceptance. It conciliated the Parliaments by giving them a voice in initiating the process, a voice in criticizing the Constitution before its completion, and a voice in requesting the enactment of the Constitution after acceptance. In other words, whilst necessarily assigning to a single body, representative of all the colonies, the task of framing the Constitution in the first instance and finally revising it, it ensured that both the peoples and the Parliaments of the several colonies should be consulted at every stage—in initiation, in deliberation, and in adoption. And lastly, by making statutory provision in advance for every step of the process, it ensured that the matter once begun should be brought to an issue. No fuller security could have been given that the Constitution would be based upon the will of the people and of the people's representatives.

THE ENABLING ACTS.—There was not even yet an end of all delays. The fiscal legislation of the Reid Government involved a dispute between the Houses, a dissolution, and a general election. In December, 1895, however, the new policy was carried into effect, and Acts imposing taxes on the unimproved value of land and upon incomes were passed, as well as a Customs Duties Act, which repealed the Dibbs duties of 1891, and substituted an extremely freetrade tariff. This fiscal system had afterwards an important bearing on the criticisms directed against the financial provisions of the Federal Constitution.

Meanwhile in October an Enabling Bill had been introduced, following for the most part the lines of the Premiers' draft Bill. The only alteration of importance was that the interval between the two sittings of the Convention was increased to "not less than 60 and not more than 120 days," with the object of allowing ample time for Parliamentary discussion of the Constitution. On the motion to introduce the Bill, Mr. Henry Copeland moved an amendment to the effect that the proper basis for advancing the federal movement was the consideration of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 by means of the procedure laid down by the Convention. This proposal however received little support, and was defeated on division by 59 votes to 7. On the second reading, Mr. McMillan opposed the principle of a Convention elected by the people, arguing that the selection of a suitable combination of trained men would be better performed by Parliament; and he moved an amendment to refer the question to a Select Committee. This also was defeated, and the second reading was carried on division by 62 votes to 5.

In Committee, an amendment was moved by Mr. A. B. Piddington to provide for the selection of the representatives by a college of federal electors ; but this found no favour, and was negatived. Mr. W. M. Hughes (a labour member) moved an amendment to provide that the several colonies, instead of being represented equally in the Convention, should be represented in proportion to population : but with a maximum of ten and a minimum of five representatives. This caused considerable debate ; it being argued on the one side that the Convention could not represent the people of Australia fairly unless it represented them proportionately, and pointed out on the other that the Convention did not purport to represent the people of Australia, but only the peoples of the colonies gathered together to confer on equal terms. Ultimately the amendment was negatived on division by 45 votes to 26, the minority consisting for the most part of labour members. On the question of the acceptance of the Constitution by a majority of the voters, it was argued that there ought to be some provision to prevent the Bill being accepted if the number of votes polled was not large enough to be representative. An amendment requiring a total poll of one-third of the electors was defeated by 36 votes to 17 ; another requiring a total poll of one-fourth of the electors was defeated by 34 votes to 14 ; but subsequently Mr. Reid agreed to an amendment requiring 50,000 affirmative votes.

On 11th December, the Bill was debated in the Legislative Council. Considerable opposition was manifested, but no division was taken on the Bill, which was passed with unimportant amendments, and received the royal assent on 23rd December.

There can be no doubt that the Enabling Bill would have encountered more serious opposition in both Houses had the opponents of Federation realized the importance of the step that was being taken. They misjudged the vitality of the movement, and did not anticipate the stimulating effect of placing it on a popular basis. They expected that the new Convention, if it ever met, would be as futile as the last had apparently been ; and they trusted, in the last resort, to be able to secure the rejection of any Constitution which did not satisfy what they believed would be the demands of New South Wales. They thought that Federation could be trifled with again as it had been in the past ; and did not foresee the irresistible momentum which the federal cause would gather, or the completeness with which it was about to sweep away minor issues, and leap to the front as the first great practical question of Australian politics.

New South Wales having redeemed her pledge and led the way, other colonies were not slow to follow. South Australia, under Mr. Kingston's leadership, took action as soon as it was clear that New South Wales was in earnest, and dealt with the Enabling Bill so promptly that it became law on 20th December—three days in advance of the mother colony. The only substantial variation in the South Australian Bill was that no minimum vote was required for the acceptance of the Constitution. The Tasmanian Bill, introduced by Sir Edward Braddon, came next, and was passed on 10th January, 1896. It required for acceptance of the Constitution a minimum affirmative vote of 6000—representing about the same proportion of voters as the New South Wales minimum. In Victoria, an Enabling Act had been introduced by Sir George Turner in December, and had passed the Assembly almost without opposition, the division on the second reading being 71 to 4. In the Council an amendment was made which the Assembly regarded as infringing its money powers, and which resulted in a temporary deadlock. In February, however, a second Bill was introduced, which became law on 7th March, 1896. It required a minimum affirmative vote of 50,000.

Queensland and Western Australia were now being waited for. But Sir Hugh Nelson, the Queensland Premier, had meanwhile discovered difficulties in the way of passing a Bill in the form agreed upon. Queensland was tripartite in interest, the North and the Centre being arrayed against the South in their demand to be erected into separate colonies. This question of separation became interwoven with the question of Federation. The North and the Centre looked forward to Federation, not only for its own sake, but also as a step towards subdivision; whilst Brisbane and the South feared that their trade would suffer from open competition with New South Wales and its metropolis. Each of the three divisions preferred to have separate representation in the Convention rather than to trust to the chances of a single electorate. Moreover, the Government and a large section of the Parliament favoured Parliamentary rather than direct election. Sir Hugh Nelson accordingly provided in his Bill that the Queensland representatives should be elected by the members of the Legislative Assembly, grouped according to the three great districts. The Premiers of the four colonies which had substantially adopted the model Bill joined in a remonstrance against this departure from the Hobart understanding; but without avail. Sir Hugh Nelson proceeded with the Bill, but somewhat half-heartedly, without committing himself to the whole of the process, and reserving to the Parliament the right to send the Constitution to the people or not, as it pleased. He made no profession of being an ardent federalist, but argued that it could do no harm to have a voice in framing the Constitution, which they would afterwards be free to accept or reject. On the motion for the second reading, Mr. G. S. Curtis moved an amendment affirming that no Enabling Bill would be acceptable which did not provide for the election of representatives by direct popular vote. This was negatived by 36 votes to 26, and the Bill passed the Assembly in July, 1896. But in the Council it was not unnaturally claimed that if the election was to be Parliamentary, both Houses should take part in it; and accordingly the Bill was returned to the Assembly amended to that effect. The Assembly, however, denied the representative character of a nominee House. The difference between the Houses proved irreconcilable; and in November—though Mr. Reid journeyed to Brisbane to assist a settlement—the Bill was laid aside.

Meanwhile Western Australia had decided to fall partially into line with the movement, and had on 27th October, 1896, passed an Enabling Act, which, however, differed in important respects from the others. In the first place, the federal representatives of that colony were to be chosen, not by the people, but by both Houses of Parliament sitting together. And in the next place, the Constitution as framed by the Convention was only to be submitted to the people "if approved by Parliament." The Parliament of Western Australia, therefore, only gave a conditional adherence to the Enabling process, reserving to itself the right to draw back before the final stage.

THE BATHURST CONVENTION.—A symptom of awakening public interest, and at the same time a means of stimulating that interest, was afforded in November, 1896, by a "People's Federal Convention" held at Bathurst—an unofficial assemblage to which delegates were invited from leagues and organizations of all kinds throughout Australia. The Convention numbered nearly 200 representatives, mostly from New South Wales, but including several from other colonies. Its aim was both educative and deliberative; and its chief work took the form of a detailed discussion of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. Federation was just then, for the first time, a question in which the people could take a practical and responsible interest, because on the statute book of four colonies were Acts requiring the people first to elect representatives to frame a Constitution, and then to say "Yes" or "No" to the adoption of that Constitution. The Bathurst Convention was opportune; its proceedings were reported at length by the press, and followed with interest throughout Australia. The debates not only showed a general appreciation of the federal spirit, but contributed some really valuable suggestions—particularly in respect of the difficult question of finance. But perhaps the Convention did best service in helping to dissipate the atmosphere of suspicion which, in the minds of a section of the people, had always hung round the Commonwealth Bill. Vague impressions were abroad that the Bill was a compound of "Toryism," "Imperialism," "Militarism," and other unpopular qualities; but the Bathurst Convention, though reflecting every shade of political and social belief, failed to find these defects. The fact that the Commonwealth Bill was by general consent taken as the basis of discussion, and that it came so well out of the ordeal, helped to establish its position as a draft Constitution which must be the basis of all future deliberations.

THE CONVENTION ELECTIONS.—It was decided to wait no longer for Queensland; and 4th March, 1897, was fixed as the date for the election of federal representatives of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania. In each colony the election was preceded by a campaign; though, owing to the large size of the constituencies—each colony being one electorate for the purpose—no thorough canvass was possible, and printed addresses largely took the place of speeches.

In New South Wales the 10 seats were contested by 49 candidates. First there were a number of public men of various political faiths and constitutional views, but who may all be classed as federalists. Cardinal Moran, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Sydney, was among the candidates. Then there were the "Labour Ten," a bunch chosen by the Political Labour League of New South Wales. They insisted on a Federal Legislature of one chamber, elected on a population basis; a federal franchise giving "one man one vote;" payment of members of the Federal Parliament; elective Ministers; the Initiative and the Referendum. On these terms they were prepared to give the Federal Parliament large powers; but they announced that "on any other conditions we are opposed to Federation." There was also a bunch of five gentlemen nominated by the "Patriotic League of New South Wales," whose patriotism was avowedly provincial, and who styled themselves "Prudent Federalists." They wished each colony to retain its provincial tariff, and objected to the Federal Government having any taxing powers, except by way of a levy on the States. The list was filled up by a few comparatively unknown candidates, of little representative importance.

The election was in no sense a party fight; and although some organizations put forward "tickets," the candidates were mostly voted for on their public reputations. The result was a triumph for the federalists, the ten representatives being elected in the following order:—Mr. Edmund Barton, Q.C.; Hon. G. H. Reid, M.L.A. (Premier); Hon. J. H. Carruthers, M.L.A. (Minister for Lands); Mr. W. McMillan, M.L.A. (ex-Treasurer); Mr. W. J. Lyne, M.L.A. (Leader of Opposition); Hon. J. N. Brunker, M.L.A. (Chief Secretary); Hon. R. E. O'Connor, Q.C., M.L.C.; Hon. Sir J. P. Abbott, K.C.M.G. (Speaker); Mr. J. T. Walker; Mr. B. R. Wise (ex-Attorney-General).

Each voter had to vote for 10 candidates; and the number of those who recorded their votes was 139,850, out of a total of some 260,000 electors—a poll not quite up to the usual standard of a general election, but very satisfactory considering the unusual conditions of the contest. Mr. Barton headed the poll with a magnificent vote of nearly 100,000, and the lowest elected candidate secured some 53,000 votes. The Labour Party, with their impossible programme, were very low in the list; though their leader, Mr. J. S. T. McGowen, polled some 40,000 votes, and would doubtless have been higher but for the bold attempt of his "bunch" to capture the Convention. The "Prudent Federalists" were nowhere. But though all the selected candidates were federalists, it cannot be said that the election disclosed any definite "mandate" as to constitutional principles.

In Victoria 29 candidates were nominated. The voting, on the whole, was more on party lines than in New South Wales—the "tickets" of the Argus and the Age, the two daily morning newspapers of Melbourne, being voted extensively; yet the polling was not nearly so heavy—votes being recorded by only 99,108 electors out of some 238,000 on the rolls. The ten representatives were elected in the following order:—Hon. Sir George Turner, K.C.M.G., M.L.A. (Premier); Dr. John Quick (ex-M.L.A.); Hon. Alfred Deakin, M.L.A. (ex-Minister); Hon. A. J. Peacock, M.L.A. (Chief Secretary); Hon. I. A. Isaacs, M.L.A. (Attorney-General); Mr. W. A. Trenwith, M.L.A.; Hon. Sir Graham Berry, K.C.M.G. (Speaker); Hon. Simon Fraser, M.L.C.; Hon. Sir William A. Zeal, K.C.M.G. (President Legislative Council); Mr. H. B. Higgins, M.L.A.

In South Australia there were 33 candidates. The elected representatives were:—Hon. C. C. Kingston, Q.C., M.L.A. (Premier); Hon. F. W. Holder, M.L.A. (Treasurer); Hon. J. A. Cockburn, M.L.A. (Minister for Education); Hon. Sir R. C. Baker, K.C.M.G. (President Legislative Council); Hon. J. H. Gordon, M.L.C.; Mr. J. H. Symon, Q.C. (ex-Attorney-General); Hon. Sir John W. Downer, Q.C., K.C.M.G., M.L.A. (ex-Premier); Mr. P. McM. Glynn; Hon. J. H. Howe, M.L.A. (ex-Minister); Mr. V. L. Solomon, M.L.A.

In Tasmania there were 32 candidates; and owing to the comparatively small area of the colony a larger proportion of the electors than elsewhere could be reached by public meetings—a circumstance which contributed much to the federal education of the people. The elected representatives were:—Hon. Sir Philip O. Fysh, K.C.M.G., M.H.A. (Treasurer); Hon. Sir Edward N. C. Braddon, K.C.M.G., M.H.A. (Premier); Hon. Henry Dobson, M.H.A. (ex-Premier); Hon. John Henry, M.H.A. (ex-Treasurer); Hon. N. E. Lewis, M.H.A. (ex-Attorney-General); Hon. Nicholas J. Brown, M.H.A. (Speaker); Hon. C. H. Grant, M.L.C.; Hon. Adye Douglas (President Legislative Council); Hon. William Moore, M.L.C. (Chief Secretary); Mr. M. J. Clarke, M.H.A.

The first meeting of the Convention was fixed for 22nd March; and on 12th March, almost at the last moment, the West Australian Parliament amended its Enabling Act, so as to allow the more speedy selection of the representatives of that colony. Next day the polling took place, the members of both Houses electing the following representatives:—Hon. Sir John Forrest, K.C.M.G., M.L.A. (Premier); Hon. Sir James G. Lee-Steere (Speaker); Mr. George Leake, M.L.A. (Leader of Opposition); Hon. F. H. Piesse, M.L.A. (Commissioner of Railways); Hon. J. W. Hackett, M.L.C.; Mr. W. T. Loton, M.L.A.; Mr. W. H. James, M.L.A.; Mr. A. Y. Hassell, M.L.A.; Mr. R. F. Sholl, M.L.A.; Hon. J. H. Taylor, M.L.C.

(10) ADELAIDE SESSION OF THE CONVENTION, 1897.

The first meeting of the Convention took place at Adelaide on 22nd March, 1897; though the West Australian representatives did not arrive till four days later. Before the Convention opened, each delegation met to consult, and then all the members held a private caucus for the preliminary discussion of methods of procedure. The representatives met at noon in the House of Assembly Chamber, when the Clerk of the Parliaments (Mr. E. G. Blackmore) read the proclamation convening the Convention, and the representatives present signed the roll. Mr. Kingston, as Premier of the colony in which the Convention was held, was appointed President, and Mr. E. G. Blackmore Clerk of the Convention.

The first thing to decide was whether the Convention should openly take the Bill of 1891 for its basis, and work upon that, or should proceed to originate a new Constitution. It leaked out that the caucus had decided to begin by discussing general resolutions, and then appoint a Committee to draft a Bill; but the matter was discussed again in Convention. Each plan had its advantages, and opinion was divided. It was obvious that any new draft would borrow largely from the old, and some of the members thought it merely affectation, as well as waste of time, to throw aside a Bill which admittedly would make an excellent foundation. But the argument prevailed that the Convention, having been chosen by the people to "frame" a Constitution, would best carry out its mandate, and best earn the confidence of its constituents, by beginning at the beginning, and not formally building its work on the foundations, however excellent, laid down by others.

FEDERAL RESOLUTIONS.—The Convention was as yet "a Parliament without an Executive." Sir George Turner suggested that Mr. Barton should be entrusted with the task of drawing up preliminary resolutions; and at a further suggestion by Mr. Symon, Mr. Barton undertook the duties of "Leader of the Convention." His first step was to move a series of resolutions enunciating a few leading principles and the general outlines of a Constitution, almost exactly in the form of Parkes' resolutions of 1891. One new feature, however, was a preliminary affirmation, understood to have been suggested by Mr. Wise, that the purpose of the union was "to enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australia." The debate on these resolutions occupied seven sitting days, and had the important practical result of bringing the members of the Convention into touch with one another, and of making known their different views. Mr. Barton, in an admirable speech, appealed to the Convention to approach the question with an open mind and in a spirit of compromise; and explained that the object of the resolutions was to have a preliminary debate wide enough in its scope to bring out every view and opinion on the main issues, and yet to avoid, at this stage, any final judgment upon non-essentials. He touched upon the different features of the resolutions, in a non-contentious way; but thought it more important for the new members, whose opinions were not on record, to have an opportunity of being heard. Sir Richard Baker followed with a weighty presentation of the argument for giving the Senate equal power with the House of Representatives. Responsible Government was, he said, inconsistent with true Federation; it would either kill Federation or Federation would kill it. No Government could carry on if it needed majorities in both Chambers; and if it were only responsible to one—if one Chamber were to predominate—the whole principle of Federation would be gone. Responsible Government had never been tried in a Federation—for Canada was none—and was inconsistent with the essential conditions of Federation. He therefore favoured the Swiss form of Executive.

Sir George Turner set the example of giving his views in greater detail. He indicated his attitude on most of the debatable questions, and from then onward the debate spread over the whole ground covered by the resolutions. A few points of difference began to loom up and assume importance from the first. Foremost among these was the power to amend money Bills, as to which it soon became apparent that the representatives of the larger and the smaller colonies were both disinclined to compromise. The representatives of the small colonies stood out for a strong Senate, and were disposed to let Responsible Government take its chance. The representatives of the large colonies either denied Sir Richard Baker's premiss that two Houses with equal powers were necessary for an ideal Federation, or argued that the ideal must be sacrificed to practical necessities.

The need of some provision for deadlocks was forcibly urged by the Victorians. Both a joint sitting and a dissolution of the Senate were suggested, but the preference seemed to be for some form of referendum—the Victorian Premier and his Attorney-General, Mr. Isaacs, especially favouring a dual referendum to the people and the States. By other members, every deadlock provision was objected to as destroying the Senate's power to protect State interests. The financial question was debated at some length—especially by Mr. Holder, Mr. McMillan, Sir Phillip Fysh, and Mr. Walker—but rather by way of stating the difficulties than of solving them. The debate closed on 31st March, when Mr. Barton replied, and the resolutions were carried.

Although the resolutions were practically those which had been debated in 1891, this discussion was by no means a waste of time. It showed that the point of view had moved onward considerably in these six years; and whilst on certain matters—such as the money Bill question—which had been thoroughly threshed out in the former Convention, there was little new light to be had, yet on matters which had previously been touched slightly or not at all, the debates showed a preparedness to come to closer quarters. It was now possible to proceed to frame a new Bill on lines which the opinion of the new Convention seemed to suggest.

SELECT COMMITTEES.—The next step was to frame a first draft of the new Bill; and for this purpose Mr. Barton moved resolutions for apportioning all the members of the Convention among three Committees. Committee No. 1, for the consideration of constitutional machinery and the distribution of functions and powers, was to consist of four members from each delegation; Committee No. 2, for the consideration of provisions relating to finance, taxation, railways, and trade regulations, of three members from each delegation; and Committee No. 3, for the consideration of provisions relating to the establishment of a federal judiciary, of two members from each delegation; whilst the several Premiers were to be ex officio members of each Committee. The Finance and Judiciary Committees were to report to the Constitutional Committee, which was then to prepare and submit to the Convention a draft Constitution Bill. The various delegations then selected their members for the different Committees, which were formed as follows:—

CONSTITUTIONAL COMMITTEE.—New South Wales: Sir Joseph Abbott, Mr. Barton, Mr. Carruthers, Mr. O'Connor. Victoria: Mr. Deakin, Mr. Isaacs, Dr. Quick, Mr. Trenwith. South Australia: Sir Richard Baker, Dr. Cockburn, Sir John Downer, Mr. Gordon. Tasmania: Mr. Brown, Mr. Douglas, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Moore. Western Australia: Mr. Hackett, Mr. Hassell, Sir James Lee-Steere, Mr. Sholl.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.—New South Wales: Mr. Brunker, Mr. Lyne, Mr. McMillan. Victoria: Sir Graham Berry, Mr. Fraser, Sir William Zeal. South Australia: Mr. Holder, Mr. Howe, Mr. Solomon. Tasmania: Sir Phillip Fysh, Mr. Grant, Mr. Henry. Western Australia: Mr. Loton, Mr. Piesse, Mr. Taylor.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.—New South Wales: Mr. Walker, Mr. Wise. Victoria: Mr. Higgins, Mr. Peacock. South Australia: Mr.

Glynn, Mr. Symon. Tasmania: Mr. Clarke, Mr. Dobson. Western Australia: Mr. James, Mr. Leake.

The Judiciary Committee finished its work on 6th April; in the other two Committees the debates were somewhat prolonged, and they did not finish till 8th April. Then a Drafting Committee, appointed by the Constitutional Committee, and consisting of Mr. Barton, Sir John Downer, and Mr. O'Connor, prepared a Bill, which was submitted to the Convention on 12th April.

THE FIRST ADELAIDE DRAFT.—Mr. Barton, who was chairman of both Constitutional and Drafting Committees, brought the Bill up, and on the motion to consider it in Committee he explained its provisions categorically, with special reference to the points in which it differed from the Bill of 1891.—Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 432-59.

The framework and form of the Bill followed closely the Bill of 1891, which the draftsmen had "endeavoured to treat as reverently as possible." To facilitate reference, however, the numeration of clauses, instead of beginning afresh with every chapter, was made consecutive through the whole Constitution. The chief differences from the Bill of 1891 were as follows:—

A change in nomenclature had been made by substituting the more expressive and more accurate term "States Assembly" for "Senate." As to the constitution of the States Assembly, the important change—previously recommended by the Bathurst Convention—had been made, of substituting, for election by the Parliaments, direct election by the people of each State as one electorate. The States Assembly was to be composed of six members from each State.

The Parliament.—For the House of Representatives, in place of the quota of one representative for every 30,000 people, alterable by Parliament, there was a provision for calculating the quota in such a way as to make the number of members as nearly as practicable twice the number of the members of the States Assembly. The minimum of representatives to which any State should be entitled was raised from four to five. The duration of the House of Representatives was extended from three to four years; and the salary of members of both Houses was reduced from £500 to £400. The federal franchise in each State was, "until the Parliament otherwise provides," to be that of the State, but without plural voting. The power thus given to the Parliament to supersede the State franchises (at federal elections) by a federal franchise was a recognition, which the Bill of 1891 had not contained, that the national franchise was a matter of federal concern. This principle was emphasized by the prohibition of plural voting.

The legislative powers of the Parliament were somewhat extended. New powers were given to make laws with respect to astronomical and meteorological observations, fisheries in intercolonial rivers, insurance, parental rights and the custody and guardianship of infants. The sub-clause giving legislative power as to the status in the Commonwealth of foreign and other corporations was extended to cover the general subject of foreign and trading corporations. In place of the sub-clause as to river navigation with respect to common purposes was a new provision giving the Parliament a far wider legislative power as to "the control and regulation of navigable streams and their tributaries within the Commonwealth, and the use of the waters thereof." On the other hand, the control of railways with respect to "transport for the purposes of the Commonwealth" was, to prevent misconception as to the extent of the power intended to be given, defined to apply to "military purposes" only.

Money Bills.—One of the most important changes of all was in the powers of the Senate to amend Money Bills. In the Constitutional Committee, the representatives of the two most populous colonies had been outvoted, and the "compromise of 1891" had been set aside. The settlement reached in 1891 had been that the House of Representatives should have the sole power to originate bills appropriating revenue or imposing taxation, and that the Senate should have no power to amend Bills imposing taxation or appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services, but might instead suggest amendments in such Bills. The exclusive originating power of the House of Representatives was now cut down to Bills "having for their main object" the appropriation of revenue or the imposition of taxation; and the provision that the Senate should not amend Bills imposing taxation was struck out altogether.

Responsible Government.—A further safeguard was introduced to ensure the responsibility of Ministers to Parliament. In addition to the provision that Ministers of the Commonwealth should be capable of sitting in Parliament, it was expressly provided—following a provision of the Constitution of South Australia—that no Minister should hold office for more than three months without a seat in Parliament.

Judiciary.—The judiciary clauses, though rearranged, were not seriously altered. The term "The High Court of Australia" was substituted for "The Supreme Court of Australia;" and the High Court, instead of being left to the Parliament to establish, was established by the Constitution itself. A new power was given to "invest with federal jurisdiction" courts other than those established by the Commonwealth. Under the Bill of 1891, the Parliament might provide that appeals which had previously been allowed from the State Courts to the Privy Council should for the future be brought to the Supreme Court of Australia; the new Bill went further, and embodied this transfer of appellate jurisdiction in the Constitution itself.

Finance.—The financial clauses were considerably altered. In the first place, a new provision was inserted requiring uniform customs duties to be imposed within two years after the establishment of the Commonwealth. As regards the basis of distributing the surplus revenue of the Commonwealth, three periods must be distinguished:—(1) Before the imposition of uniform duties; (2) for five years after the imposition of uniform duties; (3) after that period. For these three periods the basis of distribution was to be as follows:—

(1) Before the imposition of uniform duties (that is, so long as the provincial tariffs should remain in force) each State was to be credited with the revenues collected in it from customs and excise duties, and from "the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers" transferred to the Commonwealth. Each State was to be debited with the expenditure of the Commonwealth in respect of these duties, services, and powers, and also with a population share of the expenditure of the Commonwealth in the exercise of its original powers. The balance due to each State was to be paid monthly.

(2) During the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties, expenditure was to be charged in the same way, and revenue was still to be credited to each State on the basis of its contributions. But with a federal tariff and intercolonial freetrade, the State in which customs duty was paid would not necessarily be the State in which the dutiable article was consumed; and it was therefore provided that, notwithstanding the abolition of intercolonial tariffs, an account should be kept of imported dutiable articles passing from one State to another, and the duty chargeable thereon should be credited to the consuming State, and not to the State in which the duty was collected.

(3) After that period, all expenditure was to be charged, and all surplus revenue distributed monthly, in proportion to population.

The differences between this system and the system of 1891 were shortly these: under the Bill of 1891 all expenditure was to be charged in proportion to population, there being no distinction between expenditure in connection with transferred services and expenditure in connection with original powers. Moreover, under the Bill of 1891 the second period, instead of being fixed for five years, was to last only "until the Parliament otherwise prescribes;" and though it was no doubt contemplated that Parliament would ultimately prescribe the population basis, it was not imperatively required to do so.

Other novel provisions of great importance were inserted, in the direction of guarantees that the Commonwealth should be economical in expenditure, and should return to the States a substantial share of the surplus revenue. A clause was inserted that for four years after the establishment of the Commonwealth (i.e., practically during the prospective life of the first Parliament) the total yearly expenditure of the Commonwealth in the exercise of its original powers and its transferred powers respectively should not exceed certain specified sums—which at this stage were left blank, but which were afterwards filled in by the figures £300,000 for original powers, and £1,250,000 for transferred powers. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 1053-6. The sum of £1,250,000 was intended to represent, not gross expenditure, but the excess of expenditure over revenue, other than taxation revenue, derived from the transferred services.) This provision had been suggested in the Finance Committee by Mr. Reid in order to indirectly satisfy the demands of the colonies which required a guarantee that their provincial finances would not be unduly disturbed, and at the same time to avoid imposing on the Commonwealth the necessity—which would have been very obnoxious to freetraders—of raising heavy taxation through the Customs. The clause was supplemented by a further "guarantee" that during the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties the aggregate amount to be paid to the States for any year should not be less than the aggregate amount returned to them during the year last preceding the imposition of such duties. This was a compromise which, with the help of the clause limiting federal expenditure, Mr. Reid and his New South Wales colleagues on the Finance Committee had succeeded in obtaining. Some of the other colonies had required the guarantee to be for each State individually, instead of for all in the aggregate, which would have thrown a far heavier obligation on the Commonwealth; but in view of the strong objections from New South Wales the lesser guarantee had been accepted.

Equality of Trade.—In the clauses dealing with equality of trade, the prohibition of preferences was practically the same as before; but in place of empowering the Parliament to annul State laws derogating from freedom of inter-State trade, the new Bill contained an express provision that any law of the Commonwealth or a State which had the effect of derogating from such freedom should be null and void. Parliament was also empowered to establish an Inter-State Commission to maintain and execute, upon railways and inter-State rivers, the provisions of the Constitution relating to trade and commerce. The members of the Commission were to be appointed in the same way and on the same tenure as the Justices of the High Court, and the Commission was to have such necessary powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament should give it: but with the important limitation that it was to have no powers in reference to any railway rates or regulations unless they were “preferential in effect and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighbouring State.” This was the first definite form of words proposed for the difficult purpose of forbidding unfair competition by the railways of the several States, whilst reserving to each State the control and general management of its own railway system.

State Debts.—The clause empowering the Federal Parliament, with the consent of the States, to take over the whole or part of the debts of the States, was practically the same as in the Bill of 1891; though it seems that some members of the Finance Committee interpreted their instructions to the Drafting Committee as giving the power to take over the debts without such consent.—Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 453.

State Governors.—In the chapter relating to “The States,” the clause requiring that all communications by the Governors of the States to the Queen should be made through the Governor-General was omitted; as was also the clause empowering the State Parliaments to determine the mode of appointment of the Governors. Both these clauses were thought to be an unnecessary interference with the State Constitutions.

Amendment.—Lastly, an important change was made in the mode proposed for amending the Constitution. Every amending law was first to be passed, as before, by an absolute majority of each House of the Parliament; but it was then to be submitted, not to State Conventions, but to the electors of the several States, and was not to be presented for the Royal assent unless approved by the electors of a majority of States, and unless the people of the approving States were also a majority of the people of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Barton having expounded the draft Bill, and explained that it represented not necessarily his own or his co-draftmen’s views, but resolutions of the several Committees, no time was lost in general debate, but the motion to go into Committee was carried, and Sir Richard Baker, who had already been appointed Chairman of Committees, took the chair amidst cheers.

THE BILL IN COMMITTEE.—Proceedings in Committee opened with a motion by Sir John Forrest to postpone all clauses up to clause 52 in order that the Money Bill clauses might be taken first. The West Australian delegates, on account of a general election in that colony, would have to leave on 14th April. The burning question of the power of the Senate to deal with Money Bills was practically a battle between New South Wales and Victoria on the one hand, and the three less populous colonies on the other. As the Convention was constituted, the latter were in a majority; in the Constitutional Committee they had gained the day, and they could do so again in Convention. But with the West Australian delegates absent, the tables would probably be turned; hence their desire to settle the question at once. The propriety of taking this course had already been discussed some days before, when it had become clear that a large majority of the Convention would support Sir John Forrest's motion, and it was now carried with but little protest.

Money Bill Clauses.—Then, on 13th April, commenced the last great debate on the Money Bill clauses—a debate which, though it occupied but two days, was certainly the most momentous in the Convention's whole history. It established the recognition by the Convention of the fact that it was a negotiating, and not a legislative, body; that the decision of a majority of representatives within that Chamber went for nothing unless it were a decision which was acceptable to the people of all the colonies. Had that fact and its consequences not been recognized, the present prospects of Federation must have been wrecked, and at the outset there seemed some danger that this might happen. Sir John Forrest, for the small States, announced cheerfully and often that "we have a majority;" and it seemed for a time that the equal representation of the colonies in the Convention—a necessary principle in an assemblage of contracting States—would exercise an undue influence on the form of the Constitution. The recognition of the fact that they must defer to the wishes of majorities outside marked the turning point of the Convention, and the entry of the really federal spirit of compromise—a spirit which thenceforward grew, slowly but steadily, through all the sittings of the Convention, and spread from the Convention to the people.

The real debate began with an amendment by Mr. Reid to insert a prohibition against the Senate amending "laws imposing taxation," and thus revert to the "compromise of 1891." He was prepared to give the Senate—"not as an antiquated power, never to be used, but as a real living power"—the right of rejection; but the power of moulding finance must be with the House of Representatives. Sir George Turner followed, and said emphatically that he had gone a long way in conceding equal representation in the Senate, and that to give the Senate the power of amending taxation Bills was a proposition which he dare not submit to the people of Victoria, and which, if he did submit it, they would never accept. Sir John Downer, on the other side, argued that he was only asking for terms which existed in every legitimate Federation in the world. Mr. Kingston was the first to stand out from his South Australian colleagues, and adhere to the "compromise of 1891," which had been deliberately arrived at after deep consideration, and any departure from which would imperil the cause of Federation. Mr. McMillan, on the other hand, differed from his New South Wales colleagues, on the ground that a revising Chamber, without the amending power, is ineffectual. With these exceptions the ranks of the opposing colonies seemed unbroken, till Mr. Glynn announced that as a representative, and not a delegate, he deemed it his duty to give way. Mr. Carruthers carried the war into the enemy's camp, proposed to deny the Senate even the power of suggesting amendments, and withdrew his assent to equal representation in the Senate. Later on Mr. Henry, the last speaker of the day, announced his secession from the fast dwindling majority, and thought that he could support Mr. Reid's amendment without imperilling State rights. Nevertheless, had the vote been taken that evening, the amendment would assuredly have been defeated. But Mr. Barton, thanks to a providential catarrh, induced the Committee to report progress, and a night's reflection turned the tide. When the Convention met next morning the battle was practically won, and Mr. Barton clinched the victory by a forcible appeal to the representatives of the small States not to take a step which the people of the two great colonies would regard as an ultimatum, and which would inevitably imperil the chances of union. Mr. Kingston supported him, and scored a palpable hit by pointing out that the Parliament of South Australia, when dealing in Committee with the Bill of 1891, had raised no objection to the "compromise," and that there had never been any indication that the people disapproved of it. Two Tasmanians, Mr. Brown and Mr. Lewis, in the interests of Federation, declared for the amendment; and Mr. McMillan, for the same reason, determined to vote with his colleagues. On division, Mr. Reid's amendment was carried by 25 votes to 23.

The Federal Parliament.—The name "States Assembly" had already been rejected in favour of the more familiar "Senate;" and now Mr. Higgins proposed an amendment providing that each State should be entitled to a number of Senators to be determined by a sliding scale, intermediate between equal and proportional representation. His argument was that "State rights" were protected by the limitation of federal powers in the Constitution, and that in the defined sphere of national legislation State lines ought to be obliterated. To this it was replied that the true justification of equal representation was, not that it was a theoretically ideal principle, but that it was a matter of terms and conditions between equal contracting parties. The amendment was defeated by 32 votes to 5. Soon afterwards Mr. Solomon proposed a similar sliding scale for the House of Representatives, but this was promptly negatived.

The question of the federal franchise raised some discussion. Mr. Holder first proposed an amendment to give every adult man and woman a vote; but this was criticized as being a rash experiment, and an attempt at dictation which would probably be resented in some of the colonies. It was negatived by 23 to 12. He then, by way of compromise, proposed that "no elector now possessing the right to vote shall be deprived of that right"—the object being to ensure that the Federal Parliament, if it should exercise its powers of fixing a federal franchise, should not disfranchise the women of South Australia. This was strongly opposed, not only as being too wide, but also as preventing the Federal Parliament from framing a uniform franchise except by including women's suffrage. Mr. Holder eventually withdrew this in favour of a provision—drafted, though not approved, by Mr. Barton—which was carried on division by 18 votes to 15, and which now forms sec. 41 of the Constitution. In effect, it guarantees to every State elector a federal vote; so that the Federal Parliament, though it can give the right to vote at federal elections, cannot withhold that right from any elector of a State.

In the legislative powers of the Federal Parliament several changes were made. "Telephonic and other like services" were added to telegraphs; but an amendment by Mr. Holder, to limit the postal and telegraphic power to services "without the boundaries of the Commonwealth"—reserving to the States the control of internal and inter-State services—was defeated by 30 votes to 5. The power as to river fisheries was omitted. An effort by Mr. Higgins to insert a new sub-clause dealing with "conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes extending beyond the limits of the State concerned" was negatived by 22 votes to 12.

The River Question.—The chief debate on Legislative powers was in connection with the sub-clause, inserted by the Constitutional Committee, "The control and regulation of navigable streams and their tributaries within the Commonwealth and the use of the waters thereof." Mr. Gordon, who was responsible for the sub-clause, proposed to cast it into a somewhat less sweeping form by restricting it to the Rivers Murray, Darling and Murrumbidgee, and their tributaries.

The debate which followed, and which was only preliminary to a keener and more prolonged debate at the Melbourne sitting, needs for its explanation a short statement of the peculiarities of this great river system, and of the interests of the several colonies in it. The one great river system of Australia extends through four colonies—Queensland, New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia. Its watershed embraces almost the whole of New South Wales, except the narrow strip east of the dividing range; whilst some of the sources of the Darling are in Queensland, and some of the sources of the Murray are in Victoria. The lower part of the united stream runs for some hundreds of miles through South Australia to the sea. Thus the chief catchment area is in New South Wales, and the outfall in South Australia. The peculiarities of these rivers, and the causes which affect their flow, are as yet very imperfectly understood. The Darling is intermittent; sometimes a broad navigable stream, stretching into immense backwaters and billabongs; sometimes a mere chain of waterholes. It is fed by the irregular tropical rainfalls of Queensland, and by the lighter and still more uncertain rains of New South Wales. The Murray has a more reliable source in the snows of the Great Divide, and is generally navigable as far as Echuca. In a country of vast distances, scanty rainfall, and unlimited thirst, these rivers are of immense importance both as highways of commerce and as channels for the water necessary for the development and settlement of the land; whilst the problem of their best utilization for either purpose involves vast schemes and undertakings.

Of the colonies represented in the Adelaide debate, Tasmania was a disinterested onlooker, Victoria was concerned to a certain extent, and the real issue was between South Australia as claimant and New South Wales as defendant. South Australia's interest was mainly in the maintenance and improvement of a navigable highway of the utmost importance to her trade with New South Wales and Victoria; whilst New South Wales was impressed with the supreme importance of the waters of the rivers for the development of her territory. Extensive irrigation works in Victoria, and great conservation schemes in New South Wales, had alarmed South Australia; there had been much correspondence between the Governments and a Royal Commission in Adelaide, but South Australia's claim to definite riparian rights had not received much recognition.

Mr. Gordon's contention was that riparian rights between neighbouring States were based on natural justice, and recognized by international law; and that the great river system of Australia, with all its tributaries, could only be dealt with justly by federal control. There were riparian rights between States as well as between individuals, and they ought to be defined by the Federal Parliament. Mr. Carruthers, the New South Wales Minister for Lands, pointed out that the Australian rivers were unique, and English riparian laws utterly inapplicable. New South Wales was responsible for the settlement of territory, and could never be persuaded to give up control of the water. Mr. Gordon protested that he only asked for "a tribunal;" but Mr. Deakin pointed out that there were no settled principles which a tribunal could apply, and urged "the unwisdom of endeavouring to include in the Federal Constitution the settlement of a problem such as this—the acquirement, in point of fact, under this Constitution of a legal right where at present no legal right exists or is enforceable." The New South Wales delegates were prepared to grant federal control, for purposes of navigation, of rivers forming a boundary between States—practically, that is, of the Murray; but they protested against the Federal Government being able to impound waters wholly within a colony—against New South Wales being made, in Mr. Reid's phrase, "a catchment area for South Australia." Sir John Downer and Mr. Symon were prepared to accept this, and Sir John Downer moved an amendment to make the sub-clause apply only to "rivers running through or on the boundaries of two or more States, so far as is necessary to preserve the navigability thereof." Mr. Reid, however, objected to the phrase "preserve the navigability," as being dangerous and ambiguous. To regulate navigation was one thing, to "preserve navigability" another; and in the case of rivers now intermittently navigable might mean anything. Sir John Downer's amendment was negatived by 24 votes to 10, and the sub-clause was then negatived by 25 votes to 10.

Mr. Gordon then proposed a new sub-clause, "The control of the navigation of the river Murray, and the use of the waters thereof."

An amendment by Mr. O'Connor, to omit the words relating to the use of the waters, was negatived, and an amendment by Mr. Caruthers to add "from where it forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea," was carried. In this form the sub-clause was agreed to. The decision of the Adelaide Convention was therefore to give no express federal control of rivers generally, but only of the Murray from where it first forms an inter-State boundary.

Railways.—Doubts had already been expressed whether the sub-clause empowering the Federal Parliament to deal with matters referred to it by the States would extend to the taking over of the railways; and accordingly on re-consideration sub-clauses were added by Mr. McMillan to allow the Commonwealth, with the consent of a State, to take over the railways of the State on terms arranged between them, and also to undertake railway construction and extension with the consent of the States concerned. But an amendment by Mr. Walker, to include the railways among the departments taken over at the outset, was negatived by 18 to 12.

The Finance Clauses.—In the financial clauses some important amendments were made, though the debates were short. This part of the Bill was reached on 19th April; and on the clause dealing with the distribution of the surplus, Mr. McMillan explained the difficulties which the Finance Committee had had to meet. These difficulties arose out of the widely different fiscal policies of the colonies. Three of them were, in different degrees, distinctly protective; Western Australia, being at present chiefly engaged in the mining industry, was in the abnormal position of raising nearly all her revenue through the customs; whilst New South Wales was absolutely freetrade. Until the imposition of the uniform tariff, the distribution of the surplus would be chiefly a matter of book-keeping, and would present no special difficulties. The question was how to introduce the uniform tariff without dislocating the finances of the States. If the debts were taken over, or if an equivalent minimum return of surplus to the States were guaranteed, New South Wales would be placed in a difficult position, because this would practically mean dictating the fiscal policy of the future. In any case, there must be a federal tariff which would considerably increase customs duties for the people of New South Wales; and for the first few years, till trade had time to adjust itself, New South Wales would pay a disproportionate amount through the customs, and would lose heavily by a per capita system of distribution. Therefore the Finance Committee had been driven to adopt for five years "this detestable system of book-keeping"—which, though perfectly fair, would be "a great nuisance." He believed that the only way was to leave the problem of distribution to the Federal Parliament as "the great negotiator."

Mr. Holder followed, and developed the question from the point of view of the small States. The small States did not know how, without the customs revenue, they could make both ends meet; and his point was—"while we would like from the point of view of the Federal Treasurer to leave him free, we cannot from the point of view of the States." They could not leave the Commonwealth free to adopt a purely freetrade tariff which would destroy the customs revenue and ruin the States. With a Senate strong enough to insist on the interests of the small States, he would have trusted the Federal Parliament; as it was, he preferred to tie the hands of the Federal Treasurer rather than risk the solvency of the States. He believed that ultimately the per capita system would be fair, and he would like meanwhile to see some plan which would obviate the objectionable book-keeping. As to the "guarantee" question, he objected strongly to the clause limiting expenditure, and made a suggestion—which contained the germ of what was afterwards known as the "Braddon clause"—that the Commonwealth should return to the States a fixed percentage, say 70 per cent., of the customs revenue collected.

Sir George Turner then took up the discussion, and objected to Mr. McMillan's suggestion as simply shelving the difficulty and giving out to all Australia that it was insoluble. To secure support for the Bill, they must propound something definite. There must be a fixed minimum amount to be returned. He would like to see, in place of the guarantee of an aggregate amount, a guarantee to each State of an amount equal to what it received before the uniform tariff. They might fix a percentage to be returned, in order to guard against federal extravagance, and fix a minimum return, in order to guard against an insufficiency of federal taxation. As to the basis of distribution, he too did not like the book-keeping, and would welcome some arrangement to dispense with it.

Mr. Reid came last, and argued that a per capita basis would, for some years, mean a heavy loss to New South Wales, whilst industry and commerce were adjusting themselves to the new conditions. At the same time, he was anxious to abolish the book-keeping system as soon as possible, and would agree to a sliding scale, ending in the per capita system after five years. He objected to fixing any minimum return, or to loading the Commonwealth with the debts. New South Wales was prepared, with the odds against her, to trust the fiscal question to the Federal Parliament; she was not prepared to give the Commonwealth burdens which would compel a high tariff. Mr. Holder, Sir George Turner, and Mr. Reid having expressed a willingness to confer in order to devise a scheme for dispensing with the book-keeping system, Mr. Barton secured the postponement of the financial clauses in order that the Treasurers might consult together on the subject.

On 21st April, the debate was resumed. First of all Sir Philip Fysh moved an amendment providing that in place of the "guarantee" to the States of an aggregate minimum, there should be a guarantee to each individual State of the amount it received before the uniform tariff. Mr. Reid opposed this stoutly as involving a gigantic system of taxation for the purpose of meeting the possible requirements of one small State. Sir George Turner, who had previously favoured this plan, admitted the force of the New South Wales arguments, and the amendment was negatived on the voices.

Then Mr. Reid brought up the proposal of the Treasurers for shortening the book-keeping period. This was based on a sliding scale, by which the apportionment of revenue, beginning on the bookkeeping or contribution basis, would slide in five years to a per capita basis. Accounts were to be kept on the borders for one year only after the imposition of a uniform tariff. That year was to be taken as a test of the inequalities of contribution; and on the assumption that those inequalities would steadily decrease, and would disappear in five years, it was provided that the apportionment of revenue should scale down in five years from the basis shown by the test year to a per capita basis.

This plan, which had been chiefly worked out by Mr. Holder, was strongly recommended to the Convention, and was adopted with very little discussion. The result was that the preliminary basis, for the period prior to the uniform tariff, remained unaltered; the final basis, after five years from the uniform tariff, also remained unaltered (see p. 169, supra); but for the intermediate period, instead of five years' book-keeping on the borders, there was to be only one year's book-keeping, followed by four years' scaling down from the contribution basis, which ruled before the uniform tariff, to the per capita basis which was to rule ultimately.

The only other important financial discussion was in connection with taking over the public debts of the States. The clause as submitted to the Convention provided that the Parliament might, with the consent of any State, take over the whole or any part of the public debt of the State. Sir George Turner, with most of the Victorians, thought it ought to be compulsory to take over all the debts; but in view of Mr. Reid's strong objection to this course, as dictating a high tariff, he did not press this proposition. He still urged, however, that the Parliament ought to take over all or none, and ought not to have the power of favouring some States in preference to others. The arguments against compulsory federalization of debts were two:— (1) That it would amount to a permanent endowment of the States, and would thus dictate a high tariff policy; (2) that it would make a present of the federal credit to the bond-holders, and prevent the Federal Treasurer being able to bargain for a profitable conversion before maturity. On Sir George Turner's motion, the words requiring the consent of the States, and also the words empowering the Parliament to take over "any part" of the debt of a State, were struck out. In order, however, to give a wider discretion to the Parliament and at the same time prevent unequal treatment of the States, it was provided that a "ratable proportion" of the several debts, on a population basis, might be taken over. The application of the clause was also restricted to debts "existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth." The clause as passed, therefore, did not compel the taking over of the debts, but empowered the Federal Parliament, at its own discretion, to take over the debts of all the States as existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or a ratable proportion thereof.

Railway Rates.—A somewhat indefinite debate took place on the subject of preferential rates. On the clause prohibiting derogation from freedom of inter-State trade, Mr. Gordon moved an amendment trying to define with some minuteness an unfair preference. The test by which he proposed to determine the fairness of a preferential rate was to enquire whether or not the trade attracted by that particular rate was or was not profitable; but the proposal was overwhelmed with criticism and was ultimately withdrawn. In the clause dealing with the powers of the Inter-State Commission, the Victorians objected to the prohibition of preferential rates made "for the purpose of drawing traffic from the railway of a neighbouring State," on the ground that it was one-sided, and tied the hands of Victoria in competing for the Riverina trade, whilst it left New South Wales free. The problem was a most difficult one, involving important commercial and political interests. Under the provincial system, each colony had reinforced its barrier of custom-houses by a war of railway rates and railway policies. This was especially the case between New South Wales and Victoria. Each colony had built its railway lines and arranged its rates with a view to concentrating as much trade as possible in its own capital. New South Wales, having an immensely larger area than Victoria, had tried to gather into Sydney all the trade of that area, and had built octopus railways into the south-western or "Riverina" district—taking care not to extend them quite to the Victorian border, lest some of the trade might flow the wrong way. A large area of New South Wales, however, is geographically nearer to Melbourne than to Sydney; and Victoria ran numerous lines to the border in order to tap the trade of these outlying districts of New South Wales. Then began a system of frankly competitive rates; Victoria offering special reductions—in some cases amounting to 66 per cent.—to goods coming from across the border, while New South Wales endeavoured to retain the trade by prohibitive rates for produce travelling towards Melbourne, and by extremely tapering long-distance rates for produce travelling to Sydney. This "cut-throat" competition between the two railway systems was moreover complicated by the competition of both with river steamers trading to South Australia. As regards the "long-haul" rates in New South Wales, there was also the difficulty that tapering rates for long distances are required by the soundest principles of railway management; and it seemed impossible to ascertain the precise point at which it could be said that a differential rate became preferential and unfederal in character, or the precise degree of tapering which was necessary for the development of territory, and in the interests of the producer and the carrier alike. The only obvious test—that of the direct profitableness or unprofitableness of the rate to the carrier—was inapplicable because the carrier, being the Government, had public and political interests which might justify it in running the railways at a loss for the public benefit.

This war of railway rates had resulted in considerable bitterness between the colonies, and considerable loss to the railways and the public; and everyone was agreed that the Constitution ought, if possible, to contain some power of regulating the competition. Sir George Turner and his colleagues, however, feared that the particular provision in the Bill would prevent Victoria from competing to draw trade from beyond her boundary, whilst it would allow New South Wales to compete to retain trade within her boundary. In other words, they feared that it recognized the right of each colony to charge preferential rates with a view to drawing the trade from its own outlying territory to its own ports; that instead of being mutual, it was anti-federal, inasmuch as it restricted each colony to its own produce; and that it thus favoured the long distance railways of New South Wales at the expense of the short distance railways of Victoria. The answer on behalf of New South Wales was that the clause was mutual so far as inter-State traffic was concerned, and that the Constitution ought not to interfere with the purely internal trade of a State. The arguments may be summed up thus: The Victorians—and with them the South Australians—claimed that “trade should flow in its natural channels.” The New South Wales representatives did not dispute this as an abstract proposition, but objected to extending the federal control to any trade that was not “inter-State trade,” and claimed the right of each State to control its internal trade, subject only to the condition that freedom of trade should not be derogated from. There was no attempt to justify the policy of Victoria in carrying New South Wales goods at cheaper rates than her own, nor the policy of New South Wales in charging prohibitive rates on goods destined for Victoria. The real question as to which opinion was divided was whether a limit ought to be put to the right of New South Wales to taper her long-distance rates. Victoria objected to giving up her admittedly anti-federal weapon unless New South Wales were disarmed also; New South Wales argued that her tapering long-distance rates, though they might indeed be used as an anti-federal weapon, were an essential means to the settlement of her land and the development of her resources. No definite solution of the difficulty was arrived at; but on Sir George Turner’s motion the objectionable limitation was struck out, and the powers of the Inter-State Commission were left unhampered by any definite instructions.

Amendment of the Constitution.—In the clause providing for the amendment of the Constitution, an important change was made. In place of the provision requiring (1) that the electors of a majority of the States should approve the proposed law, and (2) that the people of the States so approving should be a majority of the Commonwealth, it was provided that the law should be approved by (1) the electors of a majority of the States, and (2) a majority of all the electors voting. A difficulty, however, arose with regard to the women’s suffrage in South Australia, which, if the votes in the different States were added together, would give double influence to that State (assuming that there were as many women voters as men). To meet this, it was provided that the votes of States in which adult suffrage prevailed should be halved before being added to the others.

Deadlocks.—The question of the insertion of a clause for the solution of deadlocks was not ignored. During the sitting, suggestions to this end had been circulated by several members; one by Mr. O’Connor, providing for a joint sitting of the two Houses; one by Mr. Carruthers to a similar effect; one by the Premier and Attorney-General of Victoria providing for a dual referendum; one by Mr. Wise, providing for a consecutive dissolution, first of the House of Representatives, and then of the Senate; and one by Mr. Higgins giving the Governor-General a general power to dissolve both Houses. When the stage was reached for the insertion of new clauses, Mr.

Wise moved his proposal providing that if the House of Representatives should pass a Bill to which the Senate would not agree, and if the Governor-General should on that account dissolve the House of Representatives, and if after the dissolution the House of Representatives should again pass the Bill and the Senate again disagree, the Governor-General might dissolve the Senate. He pointed out that his two objects were (1) to preserve the independence of the Senate in all matters affecting State interests, and (2) to secure the dominance of the popular vote on all party questions which did not place the interests of one group of States against those of another. Mr. Barton argued that deadlocks had in fact nearly always arisen from attempts to "tack" matters of general legislation on to a money Bill, or to lump different kinds of taxation together in one Bill; and that the Constitution, by prohibiting this, had already made adequate provision against deadlocks. Mr. O'Connor had also come round to this opinion, and preferred to leave the Bill as it stood. Mr. Trenwith disagreed with this view, and argued that though the deadlocks due to "tacking" were the most acute and striking, there were frequent "deadlocks" consisting in the refusal of one House to pass matters of progressive legislation. The fact is that in this debate the word deadlock assumed a new and extended meaning, which, in subsequent discussion of the question, it has since retained. A "deadlock" originally meant a disagreement as to a Money Bill or some vital measure, the failure of which would paralyze the machinery of Government; but it now came to be used—for want of a better word—to describe any disagreement between the Houses on any matter of legislation. It was as yet by no means generally recognized that for "deadlocks," in this wider sense, any cure was necessary or desirable; and fears were expressed lest a clause intended to cure deadlocks should in fact have the effect of creating them.

Mr. Higgins objected to Mr. Wise's proposal because it enabled the Senate, without risk to itself, to force the House of Representatives to a "penal dissolution;" and he moved an amendment to enable both Houses to be dissolved together in the first instance. This amendment was strongly opposed, especially by the representatives of the small States, who thought that it would allow undue pressure to be brought to bear on the Senate by the Government of the day. Mr. Higgins' amendment was defeated by 24 votes to 7, and the original proposition was then defeated by 19 to 11.

Mr. Isaacs then moved a series of clauses which had already been circulated by Sir George Turner and himself. They applied equally to both Houses, and provided that in the event of a disagreement about any Bill, the House in which the Bill originated might resolve "that the proposed law is of an urgent nature," and might transmit it with any amendments agreed to by both Houses to the other House for further consideration. If within a certain time it were not passed by the latter House, the originating House might resolve that it be referred to the direct determination of the people. The vote was to be taken in each State separately, and if the Bill was affirmed by "a majority of States containing also a majority of the population of the Commonwealth," it was to be presented for the Royal assent as though it had passed both Houses. Mr. Isaacs claimed that this scheme gave ample opportunities for reconciling differences, and did not endanger either the independence of the Houses or the responsibility of the Ministry. The real debate had taken place on Mr. Wise's clause, and the new proposal was at once negatived by 18 votes to 13.

All the mechanical devices subsequently discussed—the joint sitting, the consecutive or simultaneous dissolution of both Houses, and the referendum—were thus placed before the Convention at its Adelaide sitting. The refusal to adopt any of them at that stage was not meant as a final decision, but rather as an indication that the Convention was not yet satisfied that any provision was necessary, and at all events was not prepared to commit itself to any of the numerous alternative schemes. The whole question therefore remained open for future consideration.

ADJOURNMENT.—The Bill was reported to the Convention on 22nd April, and next day the report was adopted. In the ordinary course of events, the Convention would then have adjourned, for not more than 120 days, in the terms of the Enabling Acts; but here a difficulty had arisen. The Premiers were all about to visit England for the Queen's Diamond Jubilee celebrations, and it was practically impossible to hold the adjourned sitting before September. The device was therefore adopted of moving that the Convention adjourn till 5th May, and that "at its rising on that day it do further adjourn till Thursday, 2nd September, at 12 o'clock noon." Accordingly on 5th May—all the visiting delegates having long since departed—the Acting-President took the chair, and, having solemnly but ineffectually ordered the bells to be rung for a quorum, declared that the Convention stood adjourned till noon on 2nd September, at Parliament House, Sydney.

(11) CONSIDERATION BY THE LEGISLATURES.

The next step under the Enabling Acts was the consideration of the Draft Constitution by the Legislatures of the several colonies, during the statutory adjournment of the Convention.

NEW SOUTH WALES.—The discussion was begun by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales on 5th May, 1898, Mr. Carruthers, in the Premier's absence, being in charge of the measure. The proceedings began with a protracted general debate, of a somewhat monotonous character, which revealed many critics of the Bill, but few friends. The points most forcibly attacked were the equal representation of States in the Senate, the powers of the Senate with regard to Money Bills, and the financial clauses generally. The financial clauses had already been adversely criticised in a series of articles by Mr. R. L. Nash, financial editor of the Sydney Daily Telegraph. The gist of his argument was that Federation under the Bill meant added burdens and no savings; that to meet the new expenditure and the remission of intercolonial duties there would have to be a great increase of duties on oversea imports; that in Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania there was practically no reserve power of taxation ; and consequently that New South Wales would have to pay the whole cost of Federation, adopt a fiscal policy of which she disapproved, and submit to additional taxation to the amount of £1,500,000—of which possibly £1,000,000 would be returned to her, to be spent extravagantly. His conclusion was that the only solution would be to provide for savings at least equal to the added expenditure, and that this could only be effected by the federation of the debts and railways. These forecasts had been based to some extent on a set of calculations placed before the Convention by the Government Statistician of New South Wales, which took as their basis the imports of the several colonies under their existing and widely-differing tariffs, and deduced the amounts of revenue that would be contributed by each colony, assuming the imports remained the same, by applying to them first a uniform tariff on the lines of the Victorian tariff, then a uniform tariff on the lines of the South Australian tariff, and so on. The basic assumption, that the amount of imports would not be affected by the change in the import duties, had already been attacked in the Convention, and was demolished by Mr. Edward Pulsford in a series of articles in the Sydney Morning Herald, which were afterwards laid on the table of the Convention at the session. The supporters of the Bill denied that the estimated contributions of the colonies, thus arrived at, were even approximately correct. They also denied the assumptions that there would be no savings under the Bill, and that the other colonies were already taxed to the uttermost ; and maintained that when the necessary corrections were made the groundwork of these gloomy predictions was cut away. The arguments of the critics, however, carried great weight, and formed the backbone of the Parliamentary opposition to the Bill. The general debate dragged on until 24th June, and on 7th July the detailed discussion began.

The chief amendments suggested by the Assembly followed the lines already indicated. An amendment to abolish the Senate altogether received little support ; but the principle of equal representation was negatived, at an early hour in the morning, by a decisive vote of 59 to 4. In its place was inserted a provision for proportional representation, with a minimum representation, for any State, of three members. The exclusive originating power of the House of Representatives was extended to all Appropriation Bills, irrespective of their "main object," and the power of the Senate to suggest amendments in Money Bills was struck out. The limitation of federal expenditure, and the guarantee of the return of a minimum aggregate surplus, shared the same fate ; and the elaborate provisions for the distribution of the surplus were replaced by a clause leaving the whole question to the Federal Parliament. The clauses providing for an Inter-State Commission, and for taking over the debts, were struck out. A sweeping "deadlock" clause was inserted, providing that either House, in the event of a disagreement, might submit the disputed measure to a "mass referendum," at which a majority of all the electors voting should decide. Amendments of the Constitution, after having been passed by the Parliament, were to be submitted to a similar referendum, without regard to State majorities.

In the Legislative Council, where Mr. Barton had charge of the Bill, the opposition was even more pronounced. By way of a general protest against State powers in the Constitution, and an affirmation of a more complete unification, after the Canadian model, the word "Commonwealth" was replaced by Dominion, and the word "federal" was ruthlessly excised throughout. The Assembly's amendment as to Senate representation was adopted; but the Council, with an eye to the dignity of Upper Houses in general, left intact the power of the Senate to suggest amendments in money Bills. The destructive attitude of the House, however, was plainly shown in connection with the financial parts of the Bill. The taxing powers of the Federal Parliament, through the customs or otherwise, were excised; in Chapter IV. nearly the whole of the financial provisions were omitted, leaving the Bill a blank. At this, Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor disclaimed all responsibility for the proceedings, and left the Chamber; but the Council protested the integrity of its intentions, and went on with its work of disapproval. It insisted that Sydney should be the federal capital; but on the subject of deadlocks—true to the traditions of an Upper House—it made no suggestion.

VICTORIA.—Criticism in the other colonies was much more moderate. In Victoria, both Houses accepted equal representation in the Senate, but suggested single-member electorates in preference to having each State as one constituency. The money bill clauses, even more emphatically than in New South Wales, brought out the particular bias of each Chamber. The Assembly threw out, not only the Senate's power of suggesting amendments, but also the prohibitions against tacking; whilst the Council went so far as to claim for the Senate the full power of amendment. The Assembly struck out the plan for the distribution of the surplus, and objected to giving the Federal Parliament exclusive control of bounties; but otherwise it accepted the financial clauses. The Council contented itself with a general resolution "That, in the opinion of the Legislative Council of Victoria, the finance and trade proposals of the Commonwealth Bill require further enquiry and consideration." The Victorian complaint, however, was precisely the opposite to that of New South Wales; the "guarantee" for the return of revenue was thought insufficient, and there was a strong feeling in favour of an immediate per capita distribution of revenue. The Legislative Council—like that of New South Wales—left the matter of deadlocks alone; but the Assembly suggested three distinct schemes:—(a) That if the Senate disagreed with a Bill sent up by the other House, and if "on that account" the House of Representatives were dissolved, and if the Bill were again sent up and disagreed with, the Governor-General might dissolve the Senate; (b) that if the Senate disagreed with any Bill sent up to it, the Governor-General might dissolve both Houses; (c) a modification of the Turner-Isaacs Adelaide proposition for a dual referendum, the two majorities required being (1) a majority of the electoral districts for the House of Representatives, and (2) a majority of all the electors voting. With regard to the amendment of the Constitution, the Assembly suggested that, in case of disagreement, either House without the concurrence of the other might submit an amendment to the electors; and also suggested that the final paragraph, forbidding certain amendments without the consent of the States concerned, should be omitted.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—In South Australia the Assembly carried an amendment for the election of federal representatives on the basis of "one adult one vote." The Assembly asked for the federal control of rivers to be extended to the "tributaries" of the Murray, whilst the Council asked for its extension to the "Darling, Murray, and Murrumbidgee," specifically. Both Houses decided in favour of giving power to the Senate to amend Money Bills, instead of the mere power of suggestion. The Assembly also passed an amendment providing for the election of Federal Ministers by the two Houses of Parliament for a term of three years, subject to dismissal by the vote of a joint sitting. The Council proposed to make the High Court consist of one Supreme Court Judge from each State; and it also adopted Mr. Gordon's attempted definition of a preferential rate. Lastly, the Assembly adopted a deadlock clause, providing that if, after continued disagreement upon any question, either House resolved that the question was one of urgency, the Governor-General might grant or refuse either a dissolution (apparently of both Houses) or a dual referendum.

TASMANIA.—In Tasmania the amendments made were somewhat less important. With regard to the origination of Appropriation Bills, the House of Assembly made the suggestion, which was subsequently adopted by the Convention, to leave out the somewhat vague words as to the "main object" of the Bill, and to substitute a proviso that either House might originate appropriations of fines or penalties, or fees for licenses or services. This secured the desired result of giving the Senate power with regard to petty incidental appropriations, without opening debatable questions as the "main object" of the Bill. Both Houses were in favour of giving the Senate power to amend Money Bills. Both Houses also agreed to an elaborate scheme for the immediate taking over of the debts of the States, making the Commonwealth chargeable with the whole interest bill, and giving it an indemnity against each State for interest paid in respect of any excess of its indebtedness, on a per capita basis, over that of the State whose indebtedness was least. The Tasmanian Parliament did not wish for the insertion of any deadlock scheme; but the Assembly provisionally suggested a scheme "for use in the event of the Convention deciding to make a provision to evade deadlocks, but not otherwise." It provided that in the event of a disagreement, followed by a dissolution of the House of Representatives, the law in dispute, if again carried by a four-sevenths majority of the House of Representatives, and then by a three-sevenths majority of the Senate, might be deemed to have passed both Houses.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.—The West Australian Parliament did not meet until 17th August. Its consideration of the Bill was short, and its amendments were few. Both Houses claimed for the Senate the power to amend taxation bills. In respect of the return of surplus revenue, both Houses asked for a guarantee, not in the aggregate merely, but to each individual State, and struck out the sliding scale of distribution; whilst, for the ultimate basis of distribution, the Assembly rejected the per capita system in favour of a return in proportion to contributions. The Assembly also proposed to charge the Commonwealth with a proportion of the debts, on the basis, not of population, but of adult male population. Western Australia at present numbers an abnormally large proportion of adult males—a fact which goes far to account for her abnormally high revenue from Customs; and it was argued that a factor which had so potent an influence on the incidence of taxation should not be ignored on the other side of the ledger.

SURVEY OF THE SUGGESTIONS.—A comparison of the general trend of the amendments thus suggested in the five colonies is most interesting. The main lines of cleavage on constitutional points were two. There was in the first place a general opposition between the constitutional views of the more populous colonies on the one hand, and the less populous colonies on the other hand; the former inclining towards the absolute supremacy of the majority, independent of State boundaries, and the latter towards some degree of control by a majority of States. There was also, in each colony, a conservative and a liberal view—the former, for the most part, represented by the Legislative Council, and the latter by the Legislative Assembly. The Conservative, or Upper House, sympathy was with a strong Senate; and hence—partly by accident, and partly by a natural association of ideas—the Conservative view and the “particularist” or State right view tended to approximate, though their aims by no means coincided; whilst in the same way the liberal view and the nationalist view tended also to approximate. The result was a certain blurring of the lines of State cleavage. Just as in the Convention it seldom happened that any delegation voted solid, so in the Parliaments it seldom happened that the two Chambers quite agreed on their most important suggestions.

But besides constitutional differences, such as those with regard to money bills and deadlocks, there were also differences of interest or policy, such as those with regard to the river question, the railway question, or the tariff question. On these matters the issues were far more clearly cut between the colonies immediately interested.

On the whole, as to constitutional questions and commercial questions alike, the draft constitution held a pretty fair balance between the conflicting views. The compromises made by the Convention were re-opened in the Parliaments in opposite directions. Thus with regard to Money Bills, the Legislative Assemblies of New South Wales and Victoria wanted to give the Senate less power; the Legislative Councils of those colonies were content with the clauses as they stood; whilst the Legislatures of the other colonies wanted to give the Senate more power. These different amendments represented the divergent views which the Convention had endeavoured, with remarkable success, to reconcile.

In two points, however, there seemed to be considerable dissatisfaction with the Bill; in respect to the financial clauses, and in respect to the absence of a “deadlock” provision. The Adelaide “sliding scale” of distribution had considerable merit as an attempt to bridge the gulf between the system of distribution according to contributions, which was admittedly necessary to begin with, and the system of distribution per capita, which was ultimately desirable. But it did not please New South Wales—to meet whose objections to immediate per capita distribution it had been expressly devised—nor was it approved in any other colony except South Australia—whose Treasurer, Mr. Holder, was the real author of the clause. As to deadlocks, the Legislative Assemblies of three colonies—New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia—agreed that some provision was necessary, though they differed in their ideas of what it should be. The Assemblies of Western Australia and Tasmania did not want any such provision; nor did any of the Legislative Councils.

(12) THE SYDNEY SESSION OF THE CONVENTION, 1897.

On 2nd September the Convention met in Sydney to reconsider the draft Constitution, together with the amendments suggested by the Legislatures. Some hopes had been held out that Queensland would be represented at this sitting, but they were disappointed. In June an Enabling Bill had been introduced in the Legislative Assembly of that colony, providing that representatives elected by the Parliament should attend the Sydney Convention, on condition that the draft Constitution should be reconsidered clause by clause. Mr. Thomas Glassey, leader of the labour party, had thereupon moved a resolution similar to that previously moved by Mr. Curtis, that no Bill would be acceptable which did not provide for the direct election of the representatives; and a vote having been taken which amounted to a defeat of the Government proposal, the Bill was withdrawn on 14th July. On 29th July Mr. John Leahy moved a resolution affirming the desirability of Federation, and of Queensland being represented at the Convention, but this was ultimately discharged from the paper. At last, on 9th September, while the Convention was sitting, Mr. J. V. Chataway moved a resolution, which was duly carried, asking the Convention not to conclude its work till Queensland had an opportunity of being represented. Accordingly the colonies represented at the Sydney sitting were the same as before. There was a change in the West Australian delegation, the Hons. H. Briggs, M.L.C., F. C. Crowder, M.L.C., A. H. Henning, M.L.C., and H. W. Venn, M.L.C., taking the places of Messrs. Piesse, Loton, Sholl, and Taylor, who had resigned on 26th August.

The business of the Convention involved not only the general reconsideration of the whole Bill in the light of recent discussion, but also the consideration of some 286 amendments, in all, suggested by the ten Houses of Parliament. The chairman (Sir R. C. Baker) wisely decided that all these amendments should be put from the chair, and voted upon, as though they had been moved by a representative; so that no Parliament could say that its suggestions were slighted. It soon proved, however, that the work before the Convention was too much to be disposed of in the time at its disposal. A general election in Victoria was impending, which would call the Victorian representatives away; and it became clear that another adjournment would be necessary. In order, however, to settle some of the most important questions, it was decided once more to depart from the consecutive order of dealing with the clauses. Most of the debate at Sydney was monopolized by four great questions: the financial problem, the basis of representation in the Senate, the power of the Senate with regard to Money Bills, and the insertion of a provision for deadlocks.

THE FINANCIAL DEBATE.—With regard to the financial clauses, the first step was to appoint a Finance Committee, consisting of the five Treasurers and one other representative from each delegation, to report upon Chapter IV. of the Constitution. Then followed a general debate, in which the whole financial question was discussed at large. The tenor of the debate was critical rather than constructive; and though no conclusion was arrived at, the difficulties as they presented themselves to the several colonies were reviewed at length. The great central difficulty was to formulate—while the nature of the federal tariff, and its operation, were still unknown quantities—some scheme of distributing the federal surplus which would not only be fair in itself, but would guarantee all the States against any dislocation of their finances. This difficulty arose out of the widely-differing character of the existing tariffs of the colonies, and the differing degrees of their dependence on customs and excise revenue. At one end of the scale stood New South Wales, with a purely freetrade tariff and a large land revenue. The finances of that colony, under almost any system, would be secure; what she feared was, not a deficiency of revenue for provincial purposes, but an unduly large increase of taxation through the customs. At the other end of the scale stood Western Australia, with a large unsettled mining population, and relying almost entirely on customs duties, a great proportion of which were collected on intercolonial produce. It was recognized that her abnormal position required special treatment, and that no system of general application could meet her needs. Between these extremes were the other three colonies—all relying largely on customs and excise, and all unwilling to resort, in any great degree, to direct taxation. The customs and excise revenues surrendered to the Commonwealth would be some four times as much as were needed for federal expenditure; and each colony wanted some guarantee that it would get back, not only its fair share of what it contributed, but an amount sufficient to balance its provincial accounts. The two problems were to guarantee that there would be a large surplus to distribute, and to find a basis of distribution which would meet the needs of all the colonies.

The basis of distribution provided by the Adelaide sliding scale had not found favour. As Mr. Holder said, it was “a child of misfortune—misfortune in that it was laid before the Convention and accepted [in Adelaide] on the faith of those who recommended it; never discussed, never explained—thrown into a cold world, without anybody to be father to it.” Mr. Reid admitted its good points, but recognized that it had not inspired public confidence; and, in common with most of his delegation, fell back on the necessity of leaving the whole question to the Federal Parliament. The “unknown quantity” of the federal tariff, it was contended, made it impossible for the Convention to solve the question; a basis of experience was necessary. The other colonies were willing to "trust the Federal Parliament" to a certain extent; but they wanted some guarantee of their State finances. Methods were suggested for evading the difficulty by saddling the Commonwealth with some of the obligations of the States—for instance, in respect of the debts, or the railways, or both—but all these plans, as Mr. McMillan pointed out, only "covered up" the surplus, and did not get rid of the problem of apportionment. The uncertainty surrounding the whole question was increased by the calculations of the statisticians, which were sometimes treated as reliable forecasts, and sometimes—with more truth—as deductions from unreal and improbable assumptions. The debate threw all the difficulties into high relief, and it was then left to the Finance Committee to find a solution.

SENATE REPRESENTATION.—The Senate debate took place upon the New South Wales suggestion to substitute proportional for equal representation. The opponents of equal representation proved to be only five in number. It must be noted, however, that most of its supporters justified it, not so much on the abstract principle of State equality, but as a concession to the smaller States, necessary to secure their assent to the Constitution, and expedient to secure the fair treatment of local interests. This view of equal representation in the Senate, as based not on abstract logic but on practical compromise, was emphasized by an amendment which made it clear that the guarantee of equal representation was given only to "original States," and was not extended to States which might afterwards enter the union, or be created within it by subdivision or otherwise. It is also noteworthy that many of the delegates who accepted equal representation did so in the expectation, and on the understanding, that some provision would be inserted for securing the due subordination of State interests to national interests. The debate in fact pointed forward to the adoption of a deadlock clause which would place some restriction on the absolute veto of the Senate. The Convention explicitly affirmed the principle that the structure of the Federal Parliament ought to ensure due consideration to State interests; but it explicitly denied the doctrine that all federal legislation must necessarily receive the assent of a majority of the States.

MONEY BILL CLAUSES.—In the Money Bill clauses only one substantial amendment was made. The vague and somewhat sweeping power of the Senate to originate appropriation Bills whose "main object" was not the appropriation of revenue was taken away, and in its place was inserted the Tasmanian suggestion, drafted by Mr. Inglis Clark, giving the Senate power to originate Bills involving incidentally the appropriation of fines or fees. This provision was based upon a standing order of the House of Commons, which had already been adopted by the Legislative Assemblies of South Australia and Tasmania. The amendment of the Legislative Council of Western Australia, to give the Senate power to amend taxation Bills, was debated at some length, but was defeated by 28 votes to 19.

DEADLOCKS.—The longest and most important debate of the Sydney sitting was that upon deadlocks, which lasted from 15th to 21st September. On this question several distinct suggestions had been made by the Legislatures; and the clause first proposed from the Chair was that suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, providing for a referendum of the kind spoken of at the Convention as a "mass" or "national" referendum—a referendum, that is to say, at which a simple majority of all the electors voting should decide. The discussion began by a general debate on the whole question. (Conv. Deb., Syd., pp. 541-79.) Some of the members had thought from the outset that some provision would be necessary to prevent serious conflicts between the Houses. Others, who thought conflicts would be infrequent, nevertheless agreed that some provision in the nature of a "safety-valve" would be desirable; and some who had previously opposed any such provision were now, upon more mature consideration, converts to this view. The devices which were chiefly discussed at the outset were the dissolution of both Houses, either consecutively or simultaneously, and the referendum, either national or dual. Of these, all except the national referendum preserved the veto power of a majority of States, and therefore failed to provide effectually against the conflict which was feared from the double basis of representation. They safeguarded State interests, but did not ensure finality. They would only be effectual in cases where the Senate's constituents either differed from their representatives, or were overborne by the moral weight of the national majority. This, of course, from the point of view of the small colonies, was a strong recommendation; but from the point of view of the large colonies it meant that these schemes failed in their chief function; that, whenever State interests and national interests clashed, the deadlock, so far from being cured, would be intensified by being transferred from the Parliaments to the people. On the other hand the national referendum, though absolutely final, ignored the individual States altogether, and was objected to by the small States as practically destroying the power of the Senate to protect their interests.

Some compromise was needed which would partially, but not fully, recognize State individualities; and to effect this, Mr. Kingston and Mr. Reid suggested that the subjects of legislation which affected State interests might be defined, and the dual referendum applied to them, whilst the national referendum should be applied in all other cases. It was soon seen, however, that no definition of this kind could possibly be framed, as almost every conceivable subject of legislation could be dealt with in a way which might seriously prejudice State interests. Some other principle of compromise had to be looked for.

The Tasmanian suggestion—which, in case of continued deadlock, enabled a four-sevenths majority of the House of Representatives to override a four-sevenths majority of the Senate—was not much discussed; but the somewhat similar device of a joint sitting of both Houses, which had previously been suggested in a tentative way by Mr. O'Connor, Mr. Reid and others, was now revived as a possible solution of the difficulty. It was not favourably received by Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs, who had an affection for the referendum—even the dual referendum, if no other were attainable. In fact—as is the way with compromises—it aroused no enthusiastic support anywhere ; but both sides looked upon it as a possible last resort if they could get no better terms. The dissolution and the referendum continued to occupy the most prominent place in the debate ; which turned a good deal on the restrictions and safeguards which ought to be placed on both these devices to prevent their abuse. The objections raised to the consecutive dissolution, first of the House of Representatives and then of the Senate, were : first, that it would enable the Senate, without immediate risk to itself, to penalize the other House ; next, that it would mean that the two sides of the question would be put to the people at different times. The objection raised to the simultaneous dissolution of both Houses in the first instance was that it would enable the Ministry constantly and systematically to bring threats and pressure to bear on the Senate. And the objection raised to any dissolution of the Senate at all was that it would destroy the continuity which was effected by the principle of rotation—an objection largely met by the reply that deadlocks would undoubtedly be rare, and that resort to the deadlock clause would be “the medicine, not the daily food,” of the Constitution. The argument against the referendum was that it would weaken Ministerial and Parliamentary responsibility ; and accordingly many of those who objected strongly to its use as a first step were inclined to view it with less disfavour if it were preceded by the responsible step of a dissolution. The general discussion ended with a test vote on the first word of the proposed clause, which resulted in a decision, by 30 votes to 15, in favour of a deadlock clause of some kind. Then came the question of the choice of methods.

The first amendment, moved by Mr. Symon, was to the effect that if the Senate should disagree with any Bill passed by the House of Representatives, and if “on that account” the House of Representatives were dissolved, and if the deadlock still continued, the Governor-General might dissolve both Houses. It was at once complained that this not only required the House of Representatives to be penalized first, but also involved its being dissolved twice to the Senate’s once, and Mr. Symon accordingly consented to deprive the first dissolution of the House of Representatives of its penal character by omitting the words “on that account,” and to allow the Senate alone to be dissolved in the second instance. This proposition for a consecutive dissolution was strongly opposed by the representatives of New South Wales and Victoria, but was carried, after discussion, by 27 votes to 22—the division practically representing the three small colonies against the two large ones. To most of the representatives of the latter the vote was very unpalatable ; but it had to be accepted for the time being.

Mr. Lyne then moved to add to Mr. Symon’s amendment a provision that if, after the consecutive dissolution, the deadlock still continued, the measure in question should be referred to a national referendum. But Sir George Turner, though he had been prepared to allow the referendum to follow a simultaneous dissolution, would not postpone it till after the consecutive dissolution ; and he accordingly moved an amendment on Mr. Lyne’s proposition, so as to provide that instead of a dissolution, there might be a referendum (either dual or national) in the first instance. Mr. Wise, in turn, objected to a referendum without a previous dissolution, and accordingly moved to amend Sir George Turner's amendment by inserting a simultaneous dissolution before the referendum. The proceedings were getting rather tangled, and to simplify matters the discussion was postponed, with leave to the Committee to reconsider and rescind the unsatisfactory vote already taken, and to begin afresh.

The Committee, however, did not take advantage of this leave, but proceeded to discuss the series of amendments thus proposed. A whole day's debate followed before any decision was come to. A vote then taken, without division, on the first word of Mr. Lyne's amendment, decided that whatever new machinery was added should be made alternative to, and not consequent upon, Mr. Symon's consecutive dissolution. The result was that Mr. Symon's provision led up to nothing further, but stood by itself as one mode of securing agreement; whilst the Convention, not satisfied with that mode, proceeded to work out an alternative one.

Mr. Lyne's amendment was now out of the way, and the questions before the Convention were Sir George Turner's proposition for a referendum, and Mr. Wise's amendment for preceding this with a simultaneous dissolution. Mr. Wise's amendment was carried by 25 votes to 22—a decision that, if there were to be a referendum at all, it should only be after a double dissolution. It soon became evident, moreover, that though the friends of some kind of referendum were in a majority, they were hopelessly split when the choice had to be made between the national and the dual referendum. As a result, the national referendum was defeated by 36 votes to 18—the smaller colonies voting almost solid with the majority—and the dual referendum was next defeated by 27 votes to 18.

Mr. Carruthers then came to the rescue with a proposition that Mr. Wise's double dissolution should be followed up by a joint sitting of both Houses, at which a three-fifths majority should be able to carry the measure. Though no one waxed enthusiastic over the joint sitting for its own sake, it was supported as being on the whole the best compromise that the Convention would agree to. It was, however, strongly opposed by Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs on the one hand, and some of the friends of a strong Senate on the other. Mr. Kingston moved an amendment to substitute, in place of the joint sitting, a national referendum "in the case of national questions," and a dual referendum "when State interests are involved;" but the impossibility of defining State interests was apparent, and the amendment was negatived by 30 to 11. The "three-fifths" majority at the joint sitting caused some debate. Mr. Howe, of South Australia, wanted to increase it to "two-thirds;" Mr. Higgins, of Victoria, wanted to diminish it to a bare majority. A proposition to omit the words "three-fifths" was defeated by 28 votes to 13—Mr. Reid and others, who preferred a bare majority, not caring to risk the loss of everything by insisting. Mr. Carruthers' amendment was then carried by 29 votes to 12.

The result of these votes was that Sir George Turner's original proposition for a referendum was overlaid by the Wise-Carruthers amendment, providing for a simultaneous dissolution of both Houses, followed, if necessary, by a joint sitting. The question that this composite proposition stand part of the clause was carried in the affirmative by 23 votes to 13. A further amendment by Mr. Carruthers, to allow a bare majority at the joint sitting, if defeated, to appeal to a national referendum, was rejected; and the clause was then agreed to. The Sydney session thus resulted in two deadlock schemes: Mr. Symon's consecutive dissolution, standing by itself and leading to nothing further; and the Wise-Carruthers scheme of a double dissolution followed by a joint sitting. The latter scheme represented the real decision of the Convention, and it was tacitly understood that Mr. Symon's consecutive dissolution was superseded, and would be subsequently rescinded.

The necessity for the departure of the Victorian delegates brought the proceedings of the Sydney session to a close before more than half of the clauses of the Constitution had been considered; and on 24th September the Convention adjourned, to meet for its final session at Melbourne on 20th January, 1898.

QUEENSLAND AND NEW SOUTH WALES.—It was hoped that this adjournment might enable Queensland, even at the eleventh hour, to take part in the proceedings of the Convention; but the hope was again disappointed. A third Enabling Bill was indeed introduced in that colony in November, for the direct election—at last—of Queensland representatives by the whole colony as one constituency. This Bill was again wrecked by the provincial differences of the three great divisions of the colony. Mr. Curtis moved the withdrawal of the Bill with a view to having the colony divided into three constituencies. He succeeded in his object so far as the withdrawal of the Bill was concerned; but no further Bill was introduced. Federalists were still too divided by provincial differences to make headway against opposition.

In New South Wales, the interval between the Sydney and Melbourne sessions was marked by a determined effort by the opponents of the Convention scheme to prevent its ultimate adoption by the people. The Parliament of New South Wales contained many members who, if not exactly anti-federal, were at least strongly opposed to Federation on the lines which commended themselves not only to the Convention, but to most of the zealous advocates of Federation. They had allowed the Enabling Bill to pass without much protest, little dreaming of the strength of public sentiment by which the movement so started would be supported and carried to a conclusion; and they now rallied for a last Parliamentary stand. In June, a Bill had been introduced in the Assembly by Mr. R. H. Levien, a private member, to amend the Enabling Act by requiring an affirmative vote, at the federal referendum, of an absolute majority of all the electors on the roll. As the roll at that time numbered about 278,000 electors, this meant an affirmative vote of some 139,000—an impossible number to expect. The Bill reached its second reading on 12th October, when it was found that though few members were willing to go so far as to require an absolute majority, many would vote for a substantial increase in the minimum of 50,000 imposed by the Enabling Act. Any amendment of the Enabling Act at this stage was denounced by the most prominent federalists in the House as a breach of faith with the other colonies; but the second reading was carried by 47 votes to 27, and in Committee an amendment was carried requiring a minimum affirmative vote of 80,000. In that form the Bill was passed and sent to the Council, where it was introduced by Sir Julian Salomons. It met with determined opposition from Mr. Barton, Mr. O'Connor, and other prominent federalists, who however found themselves in a minority. The second reading was carried by 21 to 17, and in the course of an all-night sitting, notwithstanding gallant resistance, it was forced through Committee with the help of a plentiful—and in that Chamber, unprecedented—use of the closure. It became law on 12th December.

(13) THE MELBOURNE SESSION OF THE CONVENTION, 1898.

The Melbourne session, extending from 20th January to 17th March, 1898, was the longest and most important of all; and the necessity of coming to a final decision on all points invested its deliberations with special weight. The whole Bill received thorough reconsideration by the Convention, and thorough revision by the Drafting Committee. The passage through Committee of the Whole, interrupted in Sydney, was completed—ending with the finance and trade clauses, on which the Finance Committee had meanwhile reported. This process occupied the Convention until 3rd March, after which the Bill was four times recommitted for the consideration of certain clauses, and for the insertion of drafting amendments, before it was finally adopted by the Convention. The debates which stand out from the others as being of pre-eminent importance were those relating to rivers, finance, and railway rates.

RIVERS.—The river question raised the first long debate, which occupied nearly a fortnight of the time of the Convention. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 31-150, 376-642, 1947-90.) It began upon the suggestion of the Legislative Council of South Australia, to extend to the "Darling, Murrumbidgee, and Lachlan" the sub-clause empowering the Federal Parliament to regulate "the navigation of the river Murray and the use of the waters thereof." The South Australian claim, at first, involved federal control not only of navigation, but of irrigation and water conservation as well. It was argued that the great rivers belonged, not to one colony, but to all; that they were essentially national in character, and that the use of their waters, for all purposes, could only be effectually dealt with by the federal authority. As regards navigation, South Australia undoubtedly had the best of the argument, and no serious attempt was made in Melbourne to confine federal control of navigation to boundary rivers. It was also admitted that the navigation power ought not to be confined to the rivers which were "navigable" in the sense laid down by English decisions, as being subject to the ebb and flow of the tide, but ought to extend, as defined by cases in the United States, to rivers which were in fact, permanently or intermittently, navigable for purposes of trade and commerce. But it was pointed out that irrigation and conservation were not subjects handed over to the Commonwealth, and therefore that the "use of the waters" for these purposes was a matter in which the States, which were responsible for the settlement and cultivation of their lands, were primarily interested. This the South Australian representatives were soon obliged to concede, though they maintained that there were, or ought to be, riparian rights between States as between individuals, and that these rights ought to be defined by federal law. The debate proceeded mainly, however, on the recognized assumption that navigation—at least inter-State navigation—was a federal power, incident to the control of trade and commerce, whilst irrigation and conservation were State powers incident to the control and management of the land. The difficulty remained, that the two powers might possibly conflict. Irrigation and conservation works in the States, if uncontrolled by the Commonwealth, might destroy the navigability of the rivers; whilst navigation regulations of the Commonwealth, and more especially works for maintaining or improving the navigability of the rivers, might seriously interfere with irrigation and conservation. South Australia adjured New South Wales to "trust the Federal Parliament;" New South Wales replied that she was prepared to trust the Federal Parliament in federal matters, but that provincial rights ought to be beyond the reach of the Federal Parliament. It was argued very strongly that both sides were fighting a shadow, and that the danger of conflict was imaginary; that the two powers, so far from being antagonistic, would probably mutually benefit each other. Neither party, however, could be wholly satisfied as to this; and the question was how far either power, in case of conflict, ought to be paramount. Amendments innumerable were suggested, with a view to giving the Federal Parliament power to deal with the "maintenance of the navigability," or "the maintenance and improvement of the navigability" of the rivers; whilst the New South Wales representatives contended that the clause ought to be restricted to the "control of navigation." "Navigability," they objected, was such an uncertain and intermittent condition in the Darling that it was impossible to define what its "maintenance" meant; and it would be equally impossible to decide whether a particular irrigation work interfered with "navigability" or not. Moreover, power to maintain—and still more to improve—navigability, must, in order to be effective, deal with tributaries, and control the use of the water. Irrigation and conservation, they contended, were needed for production, and were infinitely more important than navigation, which was only needed for carriage. Accordingly, they objected to any provision which made navigation paramount, and cultivation subservient. To meet these objections, various limitations were suggested by way of preventing interference with a "reasonable use" of the waters for irrigation, or of requiring "a just regard to the necessities of water conservation and irrigation." None of these suggestions, however, satisfied the New South Wales representatives, who complained that they were being asked, in the name of Federation, to give up their undoubted rights with regard to provincial matters. No solution seemed ready, and Mr. Barton secured the postponement of the clause in order that the delegations most directly concerned might thresh the matter out in friendly conference.

The friendly conference, however, was unsuccessful, and the debate re-commenced. In the interval Mr. Carruthers, the New South Wales Minister for Lands, had procured and hung in the vestibule a large map showing the watershed of the Murray system; and this helped the representatives of Tasmania and Western Australia, who were in the position of disinterested umpires, to see that the objections of New South Wales were not unfounded. The Convention began to hark back to the position that, after all, the "trade and commerce" power, together with the power to regulate "navigation and shipping," gave all the control of navigation that was necessary, and that the best solution would be to follow the American example and attempt no detailed definition. A number of amendments, on the lines previously foreshadowed, were proposed and negatived, and eventually the whole sub-clause was struck out. Attempts were made to substitute various other provisions in its place; but these were all rejected in turn, and the "navigation" power was left undefined and unfettered, without any reference to rivers.

New South Wales, however, was not yet satisfied. The federal control of rivers was now limited to navigation; but the navigation power, being a federal power, would be absolutely paramount, in case of conflict, over the rights of the States to use the water for any other purpose. Mr. Reid and Mr. Carruthers wanted to secure the rights of irrigation and conservation, which they regarded as of paramount importance, against any possible interference by the Federal Parliament. Accordingly, after the second re-committal of the Bill, Mr. Carruthers moved to add to the "navigation and shipping" sub-clause a proviso that the use of the rivers for navigation should be subordinate to the conservation of waters within any State to meet the requirements of its people. He argued that without some such safeguard no one could safely invest money in conservation works without the express sanction of the Federal Parliament. The South Australians, having failed to secure their own amendments, fought for the Bill as it stood, and claimed that irrigation must not be made paramount unless some just basis of distribution between riparian States were recognized. Finally Mr. Carruthers withdrew his amendment in favour of one by Mr. Reid, to the effect that the navigation power "shall not abridge the rights of a State or its citizens to the use of the waters of rivers for conservation and irrigation." This, it was claimed, merely protected the existing rights of New South Wales, leaving it to the Court to say what those rights were. The South Australian argument, however, was that, whatever the present legal rights of a colony might be, they should not be paramount when they conflicted with the reasonable use of the powers of the Commonwealth. Several previous amendments had offered to concede to the States the "reasonable use" of the waters, and now Sir John Downer proposed to insert "reasonable" before "use" in

Mr. Reid's amendment. Mr. Reid feared that the indefinite word "reasonable" would destroy the effect of the provision for the preservation of rights; but the Convention was against him, and the sub-clause was carried with Sir John Downer's amendment. Later, it was re-modelled by the Drafting Committee into a separate clause explanatory of the "trade and commerce" power.

THE FINANCIAL CLAUSES.—The Finance Committee appointed in Sydney had not, during the Sydney session, found much time for deliberation; but during the early part of the Melbourne session they got to work, and framed a series of resolutions which, with the help of the Drafting Committee, were shaped into clauses. On 10th February, when the first consideration of the whole Bill, except Chap. IV., had been completed, the Finance Committee brought up their report. They proposed a complete reconstruction of the financial scheme of the Bill. They recommended that the Adelaide "guarantees" of a limited expenditure and of a minimum aggregate return of surplus should be omitted. They submitted a new clause to provide against a loss of revenue which it was feared might result during the first year of the tariff if merchants "loaded up" dutiable goods in New South Wales in anticipation of the tariff, in the hope of making them free of the Commonwealth without paying duty. The new clause provided that such goods, on transportation into another State within a certain time after the uniform tariff, should pay the difference between the duty chargeable on importation under the uniform tariff and the duty they had already paid.

As regards the period before the uniform tariff, no substantial change was made; but after the uniform tariff it was proposed to abolish the Adelaide sliding-scale, and revert to the despised system of book-keeping "for five years, and thereafter until the Parliament otherwise provides." In other words, they harked back, practically, to the plan of 1891, ensuring each State a return on the basis of its contributions for five years, and leaving the ultimate mode of distribution to be determined by the Parliament, after five years' experience of federal conditions.

To meet the abnormal position of Western Australia, a clause was suggested to provide that in the event of a falling off in the proportional amount collected in that colony, as compared with the rest of the Commonwealth, the deficiency should be made good by the Commonwealth.

On this report there was a general debate of two days' duration. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 774-895). On the whole, the scheme was received with general, though cautious, approval, as the best that could be done with a difficult problem. The abolition of "guarantees," however, was strongly objected to by Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs for Victoria, and by Sir Edward Braddon and others for Tasmania. Mr. Holder, on the other hand, argued that an express guarantee was unnecessary, because "the necessities of four out of five States" were a sufficient guarantee that the Parliament would raise its revenue and limit its expenditure to meet those necessities. Some of the Tasmanians also thought that their colony ought to receive special terms like those given to Western Australia.

The clauses were then dealt with in detail, and the recommendations of the Finance Committee were substantially accepted, except in respect to the West Australian clause. It was pointed out that any loss of revenue which that colony might suffer would be a purely Treasury loss, owing to a remission of taxation to the West Australian tax-payers; and it was argued that this loss ought to be made up by the tax-payers of Western Australia, not by the tax-payers of the other colonies. Western Australia, however, was not yet in a position to raise much revenue otherwise than through the customs; so it was finally agreed to allow her, for five years, to impose gradually diminishing duties on intercolonial imports. This would, of course, postpone for a while the full benefits of intercolonial freetrade, and was not very welcome to South Australia, the next-door neighbour of Western Australia; but the point was conceded in consideration of the abnormal conditions temporarily existing in the latter colony.

The Adelaide "guarantees" having been struck out, several alternative kinds of guarantee were submitted, but without success; and when the Bill was reported a first time to the Convention it contained no express guarantee whatever as to the return of surplus. This position, which was due to the strenuous objections of the New South Wales delegates, was not accepted as final by the other colonies; and after the third recommittal Sir Edward Braddon, after consultation with others of the same mind, brought up the first draft of the famous Braddon clause, providing that out of the net customs and excise revenue not more than one-twentieth should be spent by the Commonwealth in the exercise of its original powers, not more than four-twentieths should be spent upon transferred services, and the remaining three-fourths should be distributed among the States. The proposal was made in the small hours of the morning, towards the close of the sittings; it had been in print for some days, the Convention had already discussed the whole question fully, and it was carried, with hardly any debate, by 21 votes to 18—the Victorians and Tasmanians voting solid with the "Ayes," and all the representatives of New South Wales, except Mr. Lyne, with the "Noes."

Next day it was reconsidered. Mr. Barton made an effort to limit it to five years, in which he was backed up by Mr. Reid, who reiterated his objections to any guarantee at all, but admitted that, if there must be a guarantee, this was the least objectionable form of it that he had seen. Mr. Holder put the argument for the clause very clearly. The Federal Treasurer would only need, for federal purposes, a revenue of £1,500,000; but to meet the needs of the States, he ought to raise at least £6,000,000. He still thought that the best guarantee was the necessities of the States; that this clause only imposed a statutory obligation to do what in any case the Parliament would be under a political obligation to do. Still, he pointed out the difficulty of satisfying the electors—upon whose acceptance the Constitution depended—without plain words on the face of the Constitution; and he supported the clause without limitation. Mr. Barton's amendment was negatived; and the clause passed with an amendment providing that, when any part of the public debts was taken over, revenue returnable to the States might be devoted to the payment of interest. The clause was discussed yet once again, when Sir Edward Braddon consented to simplify it by omitting the distinction between different kinds of expenditure, and allowing the Commonwealth to spend one-fourth of the net receipts.

The financial clauses, as finally passed, substantially differed from those of 1891 in one respect only—the addition of the “guarantee” contained in the Braddon clause. The question of guarantees to the States against the dislocation of their finances had troubled the Convention from the very first; the problem being to satisfy Victoria, South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania on this point without arousing the fears of New South Wales that a high tariff would be required. In the latter part of their task—as subsequent events in New South Wales proved—the Convention did not altogether succeed; for it was upon the Braddon clause that the opponents of the Bill in New South Wales made the fiercest and most effective attack.

RAILWAY RATES.—The question of regulating the war of railway tariffs caused a series of long and critical debates, owing to the difficulty, in the first place, of finding any satisfactory definition of fair or unfair competition, and the difficulty, in the second place, of securing harmony between the apparently conflicting interests of the rival trade centres, Sydney and Melbourne.

To begin with, Mr. Barton proposed to substitute, for the preference clause agreed to in Adelaide, a clause forbidding both the Commonwealth and the States to make any law or regulation of commerce or revenue which should give any preference to one State over another. This was at once objected to as going too far. That the Commonwealth should give no preferences was admitted; that a State should not be permitted to “derogate from free-trade” by trade barriers of any kind was also admitted; but that a State should be forbidden to attract trade to itself—to compete for trade by increasing the facilities for it—was too sweeping. It was strongly urged that the aim of Federation was to remove obstructions to trade, not to paralyze competition. Mr. Higgins denied this, and argued that differential rates which attracted trade, though they did not interfere with freedom of trade, interfered with equality of trade, and were therefore unfederal. He proposed to add to the existing clause a prohibition against rates made “with a view of attracting trade to ports of one State against ports of another State.” Mr. Reid, however, replied that low rates were used for purposes of developing territory, as well as for attracting trade, and it would be impossible to frame words which would allow the one, and forbid the other. It would be disastrous to federalize the control of railway rates unless the financial responsibility of management were also federalized; and whilst he was prepared to forbid unduly high rates, he favoured an express provision that no rates should be invalid by reason of being unduly low. Such rates cut no throats; they benefited the producers; at the cost of the State, no doubt—but that was the State’s concern. These widely differing views were developed by several speakers, but without any satisfactory compromise being suggested; and the opinion seemed to be gaining ground that there was really no middle course between the complete federation of the railways on the one hand, or unrestricted competition on the other.

15 Mr. Higgins' amendment was negatived by 24 to 18; the clause in the Bill was struck out without division; and then Mr. Barton proposed his new clause in a modified form, limited to the prohibition of preferences by the Commonwealth. This would have left the States free to charge any rates which did not come within the category of "derogating from freedom of trade." An amendment by Sir John Downer, to extend the prohibition to preferences by the States, was negatived; and then Mr. Higgins moved his amendment against rates made to "attract trade"—which this time was carried by 18 votes to 15. 1356

1356 This decision somewhat alarmed New South Wales, and a wrangle followed as to what its precise effect would be. It seemed to aim at fixing points of equidistance between Sydney and Melbourne as the "watershed" of traffic, and preventing "long-haul" rates between Sydney and Riverina. The New South Wales contention was that this would make waste iron of the New South Wales lines in that direction, and Mr. Reid promptly moved a proviso to prevent any interference with the power of a State to fix its railway rates so as to "secure payment of working expenses and interest upon the cost of construction." The Convention was now in something of a tangle. Mr. Reid's amendment was negatived by 22 to 20; but it was decided to postpone the clause until after the consideration of an alternative suggestion by Sir George Turner.

Sir George Turner's proposition was that Parliament might make laws to carry out the trade and commerce power upon railways, "and particularly to forbid such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue and unreasonable, or to be unjust to any State." (Conv. Deb., Melb., p. 1372.) The first part of this—the purport of which is now embodied in sec. 98 of the Constitution—was merely declaratory of the application of the trade and commerce power to State railways; the second part was a particular interpretation of the nature of the power, and was meant to enable the Parliament to deal with all unfair rates, whether too high or too low. Its phraseology was based on the English Railway and Canal Traffic Acts and the American Inter-State Commerce Act. The objections raised on the part of New South Wales were: first, that it purported to control internal commerce, as well as inter-State commerce; next, that it assigned to the Parliament a power that was properly judicial. On the latter point there was an animated debate. Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs argued that the question was political rather than judicial, and was properly entrusted to the Parliament; whilst Mr. Reid insisted that the Parliament would be an interested tribunal and therefore a "tainted tribunal." However, the clause—with the omission of the word "particularly"—was carried by 25 votes to 16.

Mr. Barton's postponed clause was now re-considered, and Mr. Higgins' amendment, being superseded by Sir George Turner's clause, was struck out. The Turner clause was taken very seriously by Mr. Barton, Mr. Reid, Mr. O'Connor, and most of the New South Wales representatives, who complained that it meant that the railway rates of New South Wales in the competitive area were to be fixed to suit the interests of the other colonies. To counteract it Mr. O'Connor moved an amendment providing that no rate should be deemed unlawful on the ground that it was unduly low. Afterwards, to make his purpose clear, he added the words "if such rate is imposed for the development of traffic between places within the limits of the State." The debate became very heated; Victoria was charged with "aggression" and "spoliation," whilst New South Wales was accused of wanting low rates, not for the sake of developing her territory or benefiting her producers, but in order to secure a monopoly for her own railways. The Turner clause had been inserted because it was feared that the trade and commerce clause tied Victoria's hands, and left New South Wales free. Mr. O'Connor's amendment was moved because it was feared that the Turner clause left New South Wales defenceless; and Sir George Turner complained that the amendment undid the whole effect of his clause, and tied Victoria's hands again. At this stage Mr. Grant came to the rescue with an amendment—now practically embodied in sec. 104 of the Constitution—to the effect that there should be no interference with "the imposition of such railway rates by any State as may be necessary for the development of its territory, if such rates apply equally to goods from other States." This would empower the Parliament to prevent rates which discriminated between the goods of different States, unduly high rates which blocked inter-State traffic, and unduly low rates whose purpose was not development, but competition. This suggestion was favourably received by New South Wales; but Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs objected that it would throw an impossible task upon the High Court. They contended that the proper tribunal to determine whether a rate was "necessary for development" was the Parliament; and the Victorian Premier moved the insertion of the words "in the opinion of the Parliament." It seemed that the whole dispute was to be re-opened; but at last something approaching harmony was restored by the suggestion to leave the decision to the Inter-State Commission—a body which would be judicial in attitude, and at the same time better able than the High Court to investigate and determine the questions which would arise.

The whole subject was now—after three days' debate—ripe for settlement; and to simplify the process the various amendments were withdrawn, to be proposed again in the form of new clauses. Mr. Barton's clause, forbidding the Commonwealth to make preferences, was at once carried. Mr. Grant then proposed his clause safeguarding rates which were "necessary for development." Sir George Turner announced himself as unable to accept this unless Parliament were made the judge of the necessity, and he moved an amendment to that effect; but this was rejected in favour of an amendment by Mr. Holder to make the Inter-State Commission the judge of this question. In that form the clause was carried by 22 votes to 21—all the Victorian representatives, except Mr. Higgins, voting against it, and all the New South Wales representatives voting for it. This division was taken to involve, consequentially, the substitution of the Inter-State Commission for the Parliament in the Turner clause.

Mr. Reid then proposed a clause (now substantially embodied in section 102 of the Constitution) requiring that "due consideration shall be given to the financial responsibility incurred in connection with the construction and working expenses of State railways." This also was agreed to, and the settlement was complete.

The clauses were afterwards recast by the Drafting Committee, and on the second recommittal of the Bill Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs again took a division on the proposal that the Parliament, instead of the Inter-State Commission, should be the judge of the fairness of a rate; but the Convention was against them by 22 votes to 15.

These provisions gave important and responsible duties to the Inter-State Commission, and led to some changes in its constitution. Instead of merely empowering the Parliament to constitute an Inter-State Commission, the Convention decided to provide that "there shall be an Inter-State Commission," and to restore the clauses giving the members of the Commission a seven years' tenure, subject only to removal by both Houses of Parliament in the way prescribed for Justices of the Federal Courts. The functions of the Commission were defined as being "the execution and maintenance within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce, and of all laws made thereunder." For this purpose, however, it was only to have "such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament deems necessary." As it was thus contemplated that the Commission should have judicial functions, it was deemed necessary—in order to preserve the unity of the judicial system—to allow an appeal from its decisions to the High Court, but "on questions of law only."

The whole intention of the "railway rate" clauses was to secure the fullest measure of trade equality that was consistent with the management of the railways by the States, and with the responsibilities of the States in connection therewith. This was secured by means of a triple control by the Federal Parliament, the Inter-State Commission, and the High Court. Preferences and discriminations by a State—unlike preferences by the Commonwealth—are not directly prohibited by the Constitution; but the Parliament is enabled, under its trade and commerce power, to make laws prohibiting, not all preferences and discriminations, but preferences and discriminations which are undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any State. This power, however, is hedged about by restrictions intended to prevent its abuse for political purposes; notwithstanding any Parliamentary prohibition, no rate can be prevented without the independent judgment of the Inter-State Commission that it is unfair; nor even then can it be prevented—unless it applies unequally to the goods of different States—if the Commission deem it necessary for development. Any prohibition of preferential rates must, therefore, first be declared by the Parliament, and cases arising under any such prohibition must be independently adjudicated on by the Inter-State Commission; whilst over both Parliament and Commission stands the Constitution, and—as the final arbiter and interpreter of the Constitution—the High Court.

DEADLOCKS.—There was another two days' debate on the deadlock clause, and a number of amendments were moved which re-opened the whole question. The first paragraph of the clause, providing for a consecutive dissolution, was dealt with first. Sir John Forrest, fearing that the provision for dissolving the Senate would place that House at the mercy of the Executive, proposed to substitute, in place of the dissolution of the Senate, a joint sitting in the first instance. This was negatived by 28 to 15. Mr. Barton proposed to omit the first paragraph altogether, according to the understanding at Sydney ; but the friends of the "consecutive dissolution" were determined to make another effort to carry their point, and the paragraph—for the present—was retained by a vote of 28 to 17, the minority being almost wholly composed of representatives of New South Wales and Victoria.

The fight between the consecutive dissolution and the simultaneous dissolution was brought to an issue by Mr. Symon's amendment to strike out the first part of the second paragraph (providing for a simultaneous dissolution) and so attach the joint sitting to the consecutive dissolution. For a time the situation looked serious. The last division indicated that the smaller States preferred the consecutive to the simultaneous dissolution, and there was a prospect that they would follow up their victory by carrying the amendment. Sir George Turner protested that if this were done the chances of carrying the Bill in Victoria would be ruined ; and Mr. Reid followed with a speech which, under a running fire of interjections, developed considerable warmth. At this stage Mr. Barton secured an adjournment for dinner and calm reflection ; and on resuming the debate, it turned out that the danger was imaginary—the amendment being negatived by 28 votes to 12.

The longest debate was on a proposal by Mr. Isaacs to substitute a referendum for the joint sitting. The national referendum was, of course, his ideal ; but he preferred the dual referendum to none at all, as it would secure the voice of the people—and the experience of Switzerland supported the view that the voice of the people was never likely to be contradicted by the voice of the States. A referendum, he contended, was the only satisfactory solution. Dissolution of the Houses was admittedly insufficient ; and the joint sitting was objectionable because it allowed the principle of equal representation to invade the House of Representatives, introduced a unicameral body as final arbiter, and would, in practice, give the Senate a decisive veto. Mr. Wise replied with a powerful attack on the proposed application of the referendum, as being unsuited to the British Parliamentary system, and destructive of Responsible Government. Mr. Reid and Mr. Isaacs contended that these arguments only applied to a referendum, such as that in Switzerland, by way of a veto on the Parliament ; the question here was how to meet the case in which Parliamentary institutions broke down. Most of the Victorians, half of the South Australians, and Mr. Reid and Mr. Carruthers from New South Wales, supported the amendment ; but the Convention was not to be convinced, and it was defeated by 30 votes to 15.

An amendment by Mr. Higgins, to substitute a bare majority for three-fifths, was defeated by 27 to 10. The clause was elaborated in several respects—especially with a view to enabling the joint sitting to consider amendments actually made by either House, whilst making it clear that amendments suggested by the Senate could not be so considered, and that therefore the joint sitting gave the Senate no power of indirectly amending money bills. Finally, Mr. Symon agreed that the isolated provision for a consecutive dissolution was an excrescence, and ought to be struck out; and this was done. Substantially, therefore, the Sydney settlement of the deadlock question was adhered to.

OTHER CHANGES.—During the Melbourne session numerous amendments of considerable constitutional importance were made. The legislative authority of the Commonwealth was—after several unsuccessful attempts—at last extended, on Mr. Howe's motion, to "invalid and old-age pensions;" and power was also given to make laws for the acquisition of property for the public purposes of the Commonwealth. The provisions as to Privy Council appeals were considerably altered. To meet the wishes of an influential section of the mercantile community, who petitioned in favour of preserving the right of appeal, it was decided not to interfere with the existing right of appeal direct from the Supreme Courts of the States to the Privy Council, but to allow an alternative right of appeal to the High Court. Where, however, the appeal was made to the High Court, its decision was to be final, in the sense that there was no further appeal as a matter of right; and in matters involving the interpretation of the Federal Constitution, or of a State Constitution, no appeal was allowed, even as a matter of grace, unless the public interests of some other part of the Queen's dominions were concerned. With this exception, there might be an appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council by special leave of the Queen in Council; but the Federal Parliament might limit the matters in which such leave could be asked.

The suggestion of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, that the federal capital should be at Sydney, was met with a counter-suggestion by Sir Edward Braddon in favour of "some suitable place in Tasmania," whilst Sir George Turner and Mr. Symon kept up the joke by suggesting "St. Kilda" and "Mt. Gambier" respectively. It was felt that the site of the capital ought to be left for the Australian Parliament to choose. The amendment was negatived without division, and an amendment by Mr. Lyne, to provide that the seat of Government should be in New South Wales, was withdrawn at the suggestion of his colleagues. On the first re-committal of the Bill, however, Mr. Lyne pressed his amendment to a division, in which he was defeated by 33 votes to 5; whereupon Mr. Peacock—to show that the vote was not an expression of opinion that the capital ought to be in Victoria—divided the Convention on the question that the capital should be in Victoria—which was defeated by 36 votes to 3. A proposition by Sir George Turner, that the capital should be "within federal territory," was then carried by 32 votes to 12.

There was a widespread feeling that the Constitution ought to contain some recognition of the Deity. At Adelaide numerous petitions to this effect had been received from various religious bodies, and Mr. Glynn had proposed to insert in the preamble a declaration that the people "invoking Divine Providence" had agreed to form a Federal Commonwealth. A majority of the members thought, however, that the insertion of such words might offend some sections of the people, and that the Convention ought to abstain from expressing, by any formula, the religious sentiments of the people. In deference to this feeling, Mr. Glynn had wished to withdraw the amendment; but this was objected to, and it was negatived by 17 votes to 11. Subsequently nine out of the ten Houses of Legislature had suggested the insertion of some words of recognition, and in Melbourne Mr. Glynn proposed to insert the words "humbly relying upon the blessing of Almighty God," which was carried without division. To prevent any implication arising from these words that the Commonwealth had any power to impose religious observances, or require religious tests, Mr. Higgins afterwards proposed the clause which now stands as sec. 116 of the Constitution.

On Saturday, 12th March, after the Bill had been for the fourth time reported with amendments, the Convention adjourned to enable the Drafting Committee to revise the Bill. The Committee worked assiduously, thoroughly revising every clause; and on Wednesday, 16th March, the Bill was recommitted a last time, and finally adopted by the Convention.

Next day the Convention held its last sitting. A motion by Mr. Barton, inviting the Premiers of all the colonies to supply copies of the Draft Constitution to the electors, afforded an opportunity for those members who were present to express their opinions of their work. Mr. Barton and Mr. McMillan for New South Wales, Mr. Deakin and Mr. Trenwith for Victoria, Sir Richard Baker, Mr. Holder and Mr. Glynn for South Australia, Sir Edward Braddon for Tasmania, all expressed themselves, with varying degrees of enthusiasm, as satisfied with the Constitution as a whole, and pledged themselves to its support. Mr. Reid had already left for home; so had the West Australian representatives. Sir George Turner was ill; but his colleague, Mr. Isaacs, spoke for both, and announced that though they were not wholly satisfied, they hoped that after thorough consideration they would be able to recommend the Bill to Victoria. And in putting the motion, Mr. Kingston, from the Chair, declared his faith in memorable words:—

"It seems to me that this is not the time when one should stand trembling on the brink of a distinct declaration as to future policy in connection with this great movement. I can but speak for myself alone; but in regard to this Constitution, I say unhesitatingly that I accept it gladly. More, I welcome it as the most magnificent Constitution into which the chosen representatives of a free and enlightened people have ever breathed the life of popular sentiment and national hope. Mine will be no Laodicean advocacy; but with such ability as I may possess, and with the fullest enthusiasm and warmth of which my nature may be capable—with my whole heart and strength—I pledge myself to recommend the adoption of this Constitution, daring any danger and delighting in any sacrifice which may be necessitated by unswerving devotion to the interests of the Commonwealth of Australia."

After some complimentary resolutions, the proceedings terminated with cheers for the Queen and for Australia, and the Australasian National Convention of 1897-8 came to a close.

(14) THE REFERENDUM OF 1898.

In accordance with the requirements of the Enabling Acts, the Draft Constitution was forwarded to the Governors of the several colonies by the President of the Convention and by the representatives. From the rising of the Convention an interval of eleven weeks elapsed before the popular vote was taken in four colonies—an event which in New South Wales, Victoria and Tasmania, was fixed for Friday, 3rd June, and in South Australia for 4th June. Western Australia alone took no action, but awaited the result of the vote in the other colonies. In the colonies in which the vote was to be taken, copies of the Draft Constitution were freely distributed to the electors. In New South Wales and Tasmania, the Constitution was accompanied by an official explanation prepared by Mr. R. R. Garran; in Victoria the Melbourne Argus published an unofficial explanation by Dr. Quick; and in South Australia a summary of its provisions was circulated by the Government. The campaign for and against the Constitution began promptly, and was vigorously conducted by the newspaper press, the federal representatives of each colony, and prominent politicians of all parties.

NEW SOUTH WALES.—In New South Wales alone was the opposition really formidable. During the last days of the Convention, whilst the leading champions of the Bill were still at their task in Melbourne, a wave of opposition had swept through Sydney. The first opponent in the field was the Sydney Daily Telegraph, which cast its whole influence against the Bill. Mr. J. H. Want resigned his position in the Ministry to fight the Bill with a free hand; whilst many members of Parliament, including the whole of the labour party, threw their influence on the same side, and a strong "Anti-Convention Bill League" was formed with head quarters in Sydney. The objections which were made to the Bill may be classed under three heads—political, financial, and provincial. Criticism of the political aspects of the Constitution was concentrated chiefly on the principle of equal representation in the Senate, and the powers wielded by the Senate—provisions which, it was argued, would stifle the will of the majority, and enable the small States to rule the large. In a less degree, the provision for amending the Constitution was attacked, as making amendment practically impossible, and imposing a "cast-iron" Constitution for all time. A further objection, which consolidated the greater part of the Parliamentary labour party against the Bill, was the rejection of the Referendum—their favourite political institution—as a means for settling deadlocks. The financial objections were that the Bill necessitated the raising of an enormous customs revenue, and consequently an immense increase of taxation in New South Wales; that under the federal tariff New South Wales would contribute an undue proportion of the revenue, and that after the expiration of the book-keeping period there was every probability that her share of the surplus would be "scrambled for" by the other colonies, to meet their pressing needs. The Braddon clause, under the alliterative nickname of the "Braddon Blot," was especially denounced; and apart from the strong case that could be made out against it on its merits, it was made the subject of ingenious misinterpretation—such, for instance, as the constantly reiterated assertion that it required the raising of "four times as much taxation as is necessary."

These arguments, moreover, were reinforced by others which were purely provincial and anti-federal—though seldom avowedly so. Distrust of Victoria, and the other colonies—an alleged "conspiracy" to make Melbourne the federal capital, to annex the trade of Riverina, and to steal the rivers of New South Wales—formed the stock-in-trade of that section of the Anti-Bill party which was really anti-federal, and which appealed rather to prejudice than to reason. The stronghold of this section was in Sydney. What may be called the "old Sydney" party had never been enthusiastic for Federation. The intercolonial jealousies and rivalries of a generation ago had left their mark, and the motives of the other colonies were objects of suspicion. It was thought that the claims of New South Wales as the mother-colony, and of Sydney as the metropolis of Australia, had not been duly recognized, and in fact New South Wales was looked upon as the destined victim of scheming neighbours. These fears, partly a survival of empty prejudices, were in part also due to a short-sighted view of the trade necessities of New South Wales. Historical circumstances which it is unnecessary to recapitulate had left New South Wales with outlying territories southwards, westwards, and northwards, which were geographically nearer to Melbourne, to Adelaide and to Brisbane than to Sydney; and many people earnestly believed that it was necessary in the interests of Sydney—and tried hard to believe that it was necessary in the interests of the whole of New South Wales—to keep an octopus grip on the whole trade of this territory, no matter at what inconvenience to the producers and cost to the public. The doctrine not unreasonably preached by Victoria and South Australia, that "trade should flow in its natural channels," was held to be rank heresy; and no doubts were entertained that the merits in the great battle of railway rates were wholly with New South Wales. Viewed from this standpoint, the carefully contrived compromises as to railways and rivers seemed to be a traitorous surrender of the rights and privileges of New South Wales, and were denounced accordingly in no measured terms.

The "Anti-Billites" were first in the field, but the champions of the Constitution were not long in following. Mr. Barton, and six of his fellow-representatives at the Convention, were untiring in advocacy: federalists from the freetrade and protectionist parties alike rallied energetically; the Federation Leagues throughout the colony helped so far as their non-party organization enabled them to do so; and a strong campaigning body, called the New South Wales Federal Association, was organized. Of the Sydney daily press, the Morning Herald and the Evening News supported the Bill, and the great majority of the provincial press followed suit.

The friends of the Bill had the advantage in debating strength, and had all the weight of national sentiment on their side; its enemies had provincial prejudices and vested interests to help them, and had also the advantage, which the critics of a definite and detailed piece of legislation always have, of being able to choose innumerable points of attack, and challenge the federalists to justify the Bill clause by clause, and line by line. The issue was doubtful, and the great question was—on which side would Mr. Reid throw his great influence and his unrivalled powers as a platform speaker? As Premier of the leading colony, and the man at whose invitation the process of framing the Constitution had been entered upon, he had a heavy responsibility; and it was no secret that he was not wholly satisfied with the Bill.

Mr. Reid kept his own counsel until 28th March, when he addressed a vast meeting at the Sydney Town Hall. He analyzed the Bill from beginning to end, criticized unsparingly what he thought to be its defects, touched more lightly on its merits, and ended with a dramatic declaration that, in spite of all his criticisms and objections, he personally could not be "a deserter to the cause;" that he would vote for the Bill himself—words which were greeted with an outburst of enthusiasm—but would abstain from any recommendation to the electors, one way or the other. Of course, he was claimed by both sides—the "Billites" pointing to his vote, and the "Anti-Billites" to his arguments. During the campaign he only made three other speeches—at Goulburn, Bathurst and Newcastle; and though he still declined to offer advice, his influence undoubtedly was cast against the Bill. Subsequently Mr. Lyne and Mr. Bruncker declared against the Bill.

As time went on, the points of attack were multiplied; a word here, and a phrase there, were culled out to show the iniquity of the measure. But the main line of criticism remained the same. Equal representation would be "the death-knell of majority rule;" the "dead-lock fraud" would be utterly ineffective; the Inter-State Commission would hand over the railways of New South Wales to the other colonies; the federal capital would be in Victoria. The real strength of the attack, however, was directed against the financial clauses. It was here that Mr. Reid's criticisms had been most telling; and rival experts—Mr. Edward Pulsford and Mr. Bruce Smith for the Bill, Mr. R. L. Nash and Mr. Coghlan against it—engaged in a duel of figures which made the bewildered electors ask "What is truth?" The Anti-Bill statisticians maintained their forecast of an impossibly high tariff, and heaped ridicule upon the unfortunate "Braddon blot;" their opponents challenged their assumptions, condemned their Forecasts as unreliable guesswork, and maintained that the Bill did not require excessive taxation. The undeniable fact, which the freetraders had to face, was that the federal tariff would be framed to produce more revenue than the existing tariff of New South Wales—not because the Constitution required it, but because the people of Australia would require it; and this, from the freetrade aspect, was a point scored against Federation. At last the Government appointed a Commission, consisting of Mr. J. Russell French (a banker whose federal views were unknown), Dr. MacLaurin (a strong critic of the Bill), and Mr. Bruce Smith. Witnesses were examined, and on 17th May a report was presented which—like Mr. Reid's speeches—was claimed by both sides as a "triumph." In reality it told against the Bill; for, though it did not bear out the figures of the extreme alarmists, it adopted some of their methods, to which it gave a semi-official authority.

The two sides were thus left as hopelessly at issue as before. On one point only was there no substantial dispute—that the new expenditure for federal establishments would be an inconsiderable item, which might be set down—after allowing a liberal margin—at £300,000 a year for all the colonies. But the opponents of the Bill proceeded to forecast the necessity of ruinous taxation by the following argument. They first calculated the "net deficiency" which each State would have after Federation, supposing no customs or excise revenue whatever were returned by the Federal Government. This they arrived at by simply subtracting the expenditure of which the State would be relieved from the revenue of which it would be deprived. They then assumed that this "net deficiency" of each State was an absolute "requirement" of the State, which must be made up to it by the Commonwealth out of customs and excise revenue. This involved the assumption that the federal tariff must be screwed up to meet the requirements of the weakest State; because, under the distribution clauses, each State could only get back the amount of its own contribution—or rather, the balance of its contribution after deducting its share of the federal expenditure. They then "calculated" the relative percentages which each State would contribute to a common tariff. The first of these calculations—made for the Adelaide Convention—was based frankly on the existing import figures of the various colonies under their widely differing tariffs; and of course the result of applying, say, the Victorian protectionist tariff to the actual imports of New South Wales under a freetrade system gave a startlingly high forecast of the contributions for the latter colony. The absurdity of the assumption led to considerable modifications of these estimates; but it was still contended that New South Wales would contribute an abnormally high percentage of revenue, at least for many years. The conclusion of this elaborate argument was that a tariff high enough to squeeze out of (say) Tasmania enough revenue for her wants would inflict a huge burden of utterly unnecessary taxation upon New South Wales; and though the bulk of this would find its way back to the Treasurer of New South Wales, it would leave him with the demoralizing temptations of an unmanageable surplus. In this argument—which was waged at immense length in the newspapers—the "Braddon Blot" had no place whatever; that was reserved for another line of attack.

The friends of the Bill replied that the whole argument rested on a series of false assumptions. The fixed "deficiencies" were imaginary, and involved the impossible task of foretelling the revenue and expenditure of each State four or five years in advance. There was no justification for assuming that the States could not diminish their "requirements" by savings in expenditure; or that any State which, under a reasonable federal tariff, had a provincial deficiency, could not meet it by provincial taxation. The estimates of the percentage of New South Wales contributions were excessive, and the figures were unduly swollen by refusing to take into account the probable savings due to Federation, whilst loading the expenditure with the most liberal margins for contingencies. In short, it was argued that the Commonwealth would have a perfectly free hand in framing a tariff; and that under a very moderate revenue tariff each State would be left in a perfectly solvent position. It was not denied that New South Wales would be submitted to some additional taxation through the customs; but that was the necessary result of a uniform tariff, and was not due to the financial scheme of the Bill. Moreover, the favourable position of New South Wales as regards taxation was not due to superior wealth, but to the fact that she was living on capital in the shape of the revenue from the alienation of land; she was not at present taxed up to her real requirements, and an increase of taxation revenue would render a sounder system of finance possible.

Mr. Nash frankly admitted that the faults of which he complained were inseparable from the scheme of Federation proposed, and he advocated, as the only solution, a system which would include the immediate federation of railways and debts. These views, however, were not popular in New South Wales, and most of the critics, while having no suggestions of their own to offer, tacitly assumed that a better way was available. They were convinced that a better Bill could be "fixed up in half an hour"—but they had not half an hour to spare.

The progress of the fight showed that the objectors and doubters were in great force, especially in and near the metropolis. Along the borders, and especially in the Riverina district, the disadvantages of disunion were so apparent that criticism had less weight, and there was a general disposition to accept with enthusiasm the work of the Convention.

VICTORIA.—In Victoria, the fight was a one-sided affair from the outset. This fact—which anti-federalists in the mother-colony ascribed to an eagerness to "loot New South Wales"—was really due to quite different causes. In the first place, the sentiment of nationality was far more developed and better organized in the southern colony. The credit of this was chiefly due to the Australian Natives' Association—an institution which had received its chief development in Victoria, and which, on the basis of a mixed friendly society, mutual improvement society, and national association, extended to every corner of the colony, and had immense power by reason of its organization and its enthusiasm. Founded in 1871, it was already a great power in politics, and a recognized ladder to a Parliamentary and Ministerial career. Federation had long been its watchword; it had urged Governments to action, suggested schemes of its own, and lent encouragement to the schemes of others. It had produced the Bendigo scheme, the germ of the Federal Enabling Acts under which the Constitution had been framed; it had contributed three representatives to the Convention—Mr. Deakin, Mr. Peacock, and Dr. Quick. And finally, at a critical juncture, on the eve of the adoption of the Constitution by the Melbourne Convention, when the Age advocated the Fabian policy of caution and delay, and when the Turner Ministry, or at least some members of it, seemed to hesitate, the Association at its annual conference held at Bendigo, stimulated by the inspiring eloquence of Mr. A. Deakin and Mr. J. L. Purves, announced its support of the Bill with a declaration of triumphant enthusiasm that left no doubt as to the result.

Another reason for the comparative weakness of the opposition in Victoria was that the financial obstacles were less than in New South Wales. New South Wales, in the matter of customs taxation, occupied a position at the extreme end of the group; Victoria was near the middle. It was apparent that a tariff of approximately the productiveness of the Victorian tariff would fairly meet the needs of the Commonwealth; and though that productiveness might be attained by a moderate revenue tariff as well as by the existing protective tariff of Victoria, the fears of producers that their protection might be reduced affected few pockets as compared with the fears of tax-payers in New South Wales that their taxation would be increased.

There was, nevertheless, a substantial Anti-Bill party in Victoria, led by Mr. Higgins—the only one of the ten Victorian representatives who did not support the Bill. His objections were almost wholly from a constitutional standpoint, and were directed against equal representation in the Senate, and against the restrictions upon the amendment of the Constitution. He was supported by a section of the labour party, which was however hopelessly divided—seeing that Mr. Trenwith, the ablest and most influential of the party's leaders, was warmly advocating the Bill. These were the most effective criticisms used against the Bill in the metropolitan centres; but in the country districts the chief concern was over the abolition of the stock tax, which would have to go when intercolonial freetrade began. The farmers had an unbounded belief in the extra value added to their land and stock by this tax; and Mr. Allan McLean, its chief apostle, conducted a vigorous campaign against the Bill.

There was some dissatisfaction in Victoria with the "railway rate" clauses, which the Premier and Attorney-General of Victoria—in spite of the precisely opposite fears expressed in New South Wales—feared would unfairly hamper Victorian competition for the Riverina trade, whilst leaving New South Wales free to do as she liked, under the pretext of developing her territory and making her railways pay. However, after a report from Mr. Mathieson, the Commissioner for Railways, which went to show that the revenue loss, on the most unfavourable interpretation of the Bill, would not be considerable, the Victorian Ministry announced their unanimous support of the Bill.

A few vested interests felt some mild alarm about bounties and protective duties. The clause prohibiting the granting of bounties by the States, except with the consent of the Federal Parliament, had in New South Wales been thought to hide a cunning conspiracy to enable its provisions to be evaded, and Victorian bounties to be perpetuated; in Victoria it was complained of as a death-blow to the few bounty-assisted industries in existence. Nor did the Victorian Anti-Billites share the confidence of their brethren across the Murray that the federal tariff must inevitably be protective; and they would fain have seen some guarantee against the predominance of freetrade views in the Commonwealth.

All these arguments were overwhelmingly answered by the federalists, who, strong in numbers, in debating ability, and in enthusiasm, swept the country with an unbroken series of campaigning triumphs. Victoria as a whole had confidence in the Convention, and confidence also in the ability of the Australian people to work out their own destiny under a free Constitution. The federal compromises were accepted as necessary conditions of union, and the fears of the Anti-Billites were outweighed by the obvious commercial advantages of Federation, and by the strong sentiment in favour of national institutions. The Victorian newspapers almost unanimously supported the Bill. The Argus, the Australasian, and the Evening Herald in the metropolis, and the Bendigo Advertiser, the Bendigo Independent, the Bendigo Evening Mail, the Ballarat Courier, the Ballarat Star, the Geelong Advertiser, the Geelong Times, the Gippsland Times, and other country journals gave the Bill powerful advocacy. The Age and the Leader were not opposed to federation, but anxious to promote the improvement of the Bill. Although doubtful and critical at first, the Age eventually, in consideration of the many democratic features of the Constitution rendering it more liberal even than the Constitution of Victoria, recommended its acceptance with the hope of securing its reform at a later stage.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—In South Australia all the federal representatives united in an appeal to the electors to vote for the Bill. The chief difficulties that had to be met were the fears that the cost would be excessive, and that the rights and interests of the less populous States would be unduly subordinated to the mass vote of the majority. But the argument of the advantages of union, and especially the benefits arising from intercolonial freetrade, prevailed; and the issue was never really in doubt.

TASMANIA.—In Tasmania there was widespread dissatisfaction, at the outset, with the provisions limiting the powers of the Senate, which were thought to endanger the interests of the smaller States; and it was also feared that, notwithstanding the Braddon clause, there were not sufficient "guarantees" that the surplus returned to Tasmania would enable her to meet her provincial obligations. However, the federal representatives threw themselves courageously into the fight, and their efforts were rewarded with complete success.

THE VOTE OF THE PEOPLE.—The result of the voting in the four colonies for and against the draft Constitution was as follows:—

	N.S.W.	Victoria.	S. Australia.	Tasmania.	Total.
For	71,595	100,520	35,800	11,797	219,712
Against... ..	66,228	22,099	17,320	2,716	108,363
Majority for the Constitution ...	5,367	78,421	18,480	9,081	111,349

There was thus a majority for the Bill in each of the four colonies. In Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania, the majorities were decisive; but in New South Wales not only was the majority a slender one, but the total affirmative vote fell short by 8,405 of the 10,000 minimum required by the Federation Enabling Act Amendment Act of 1897. In New South Wales, therefore, under the provisions of the Act, the barely victorious Bill was "deemed to be rejected"—the prescribed effect of which was to be that in New South Wales "no further action shall be taken pursuant to this Act." In other words, the whole statutory process, so far as New South Wales was concerned, was at an end.

(15) EVENTS IN NEW SOUTH WALES.

THE TASK RESUMED.—Had the federalists in New South Wales been in an actual minority, the discouragement would have been serious; but their majority, slender as it was, spurred them to fresh exertions. On the evening of 3rd June, an accidental duplication of some of the telegraphic returns had caused the coveted 80,000 to be posted at the Sydney Morning Herald office, and for a few minutes federalists were congratulating themselves on having won the battle. In the first disappointment of the awakening, some brave words were said about repealing the Act requiring an 80,000 minimum; but calmer judgment showed the unwisdom of "cramming the Bill down the throats" of a minority, many of whom were rather fearful than hostile. It was clear that some effort must be made to secure amendments which would dispel the fears of opponents, and diminish the opposition; but Mr. Barton and his following wisely held their hands until Mr. Reid, as Premier of the colony, should open negotiations.

This Mr. Reid promptly did. The day after the referendum he telegraphed to the other Premiers inviting them to a Conference with a view of amending the Bill to meet the wishes of New South Wales, and suggesting that the amendments, when agreed upon, should be transmitted with the draft Constitution to the Imperial Government. The Premiers did not receive this suggestion with favour. Their own colonies had given overwhelming majorities for the Bill, and they resented the idea that, at the instance of a minority in New South Wales, they should be asked to reopen the question—especially as New South Wales was on the eve of a general election, and it remained to be seen whether that colony could not yet be brought into line. The Premiers of South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania, refused point blank to confer; whilst Sir George Turner, in Victoria, replied diplomatically that it would be well for Mr. Reid to intimate what amendments he desired. Mr. T. J. Byrnes, the Premier of Queensland, whom Mr. Reid had also consulted, expressed his willingness to confer; but the attitude of the other Premiers made it clear that nothing could be done till after the New South Wales elections.

The expiring Parliament met on 21st June, and the Governor's speech disclosed Mr. Reid's federal programme. After reciting the result of the Referendum, and the de jure rejection of the draft Constitution, the speech proceeded:—

“The Government are not prepared, however, to abandon their efforts to arrive at a satisfactory removal of those features of the Bill which have prevented the people of this country from voting more largely in its favour, and which have caused so many thousands of the electors to vote against it.

“My advisers are, therefore, anxiously engaged upon the preparation of proposals to modify the Convention Bill in certain respects. These will shortly be submitted in clear and definite terms to the electors of New South Wales.

“They will include:—

1. An objection to the principle of equal representation in the Senate, which, if not altered, must be accompanied by the removal of the stipulation requiring that a majority vote at a joint sitting of both Houses, to be effective, shall consist of three-fifths of the members present; or, failing that, the principle should be qualified by a provision for a national referendum instead of a joint sitting.
2. Some of the financial provisions to be recast, and the Braddon clause omitted altogether.
3. Money bills not to be amended by the Senate.
4. The same protection for the territorial rights of each State, as there is for the representation of each State in the federal Parliament, and this should include more definite provisions with regard to inland rivers.
5. Seat of Government—instead of the proposal in the Bill, adoption, in a slightly modified form, of the plan followed in the Canadian Constitution.
6. It is also considered that the appellate jurisdiction should be remodelled.”

The bulk of the session, which only lasted three weeks, was taken up, in both Houses, with the Address-in-Reply. The main attack upon the Government programme came from Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor in the Legislative Council. They objected strongly to the demands of New South Wales being stated in the form of an ultimatum before conference, and maintained that the Government ought to go untrammelled into conference, and negotiate for the best terms possible. Moreover, they challenged Mr. Reid's good faith in the matter, and especially pointed to the fact that Mr. Want—who had left the Ministry to lead the opposition to the Bill, and whose criticisms had a decidedly anti-federal complexion—had since the Referendum been readmitted to the Ministry. As regards amendment in the draft Constitution, they took this position. They believed that the Bill was a good and a fair one, and had heartily recommended it for acceptance. With some of the provisions they had never been fully in accord, but they had loyally accepted the whole as the best compromise available. It now appeared that a large minority of the people were dissatisfied; and they recognized not only that an effort must be made to secure amendments which would meet the chief objections made, but also that the result of the vote—showing as it did that unless some amendments were made it would be difficult to secure the adherence of New South Wales—made concessions possible which previously would have been impossible. Mr. Barton therefore approved of asking for reconsideration of the Bill with a view to three amendments—the removal of the three-fifths majority at the joint sitting, the omission of the Braddon clause, and the location of the capital in New South Wales.

THE GENERAL ELECTION.—Parliament was dissolved on 8th July, and the campaign began at once. Mr. Reid and the Ministerialists took the field as the "Liberal Federal Party," whilst Mr. Barton led the Opposition on behalf of the "National Federal Party." Federation thus became, for the first time, a question of party politics; and curiously enough, both parties seemed to be fighting for substantially the same thing—the draft Constitution, with a few amendments. The amendments foreshadowed by Mr. Barton were indeed only three, as against Mr. Reid's seven; but that was not the real distinction between the parties. The real difference was of a twofold kind, involving a question of federal attitude, and a question of leadership. In the first place, Mr. Reid and his following were definitely hostile to the Bill as it stood, and demanded substantial amendments as a condition of its acceptance. Mr. Barton and his following had been, and still were, ready to accept the Bill as it stood; but urged amendments with the double view of making it a still better Bill and of conciliating opposition. Consequent upon this difference of attitude, the Reid party urged that Mr. Reid stood for the interests of New South Wales, and Mr. Barton for those of the other colonies—that Mr. Reid's demands would meet acceptance, whilst Mr. Barton's "negotiations" meant surrender. The Barton party replied that no agreement could be reached by a policy of dictating terms; that Mr. Barton, as a persona grata to the other colonies and the trusted leader of the federalists, would be able to make better terms than Mr. Reid; and that the interests of New South Wales, as well as those of Australia, would be safe in his hands.

The main issue, however, was mixed up in every electorate, not only with the personal claims of the candidates, but with the old lines of party cleavage. The "fiscal issue" was indeed supposed to be sunk; but the fact that in the Ministerial party freetraders preponderated, and in the Opposition party protectionists, showed that the allegiance of many candidates was influenced by the old party ties. The same thing undoubtedly held true of the electors, and stood in the way of a "straight out" issue on the federal programme.

The result of the general election, which took place on 27th July, was very evenly balanced. Mr. Reid himself defeated Mr. Barton in the King Division of Sydney; but his previous large Parliamentary majority was reduced to a narrow majority of about four—including the labour party—whilst three Ministers lost their seats. But though neither party could claim a triumph, Federation had undoubtedly won all along the line. The preceding Legislative Assembly, though not avowedly anti-federal, was so trenchantly critical of the whole Commonwealth scheme as to be, in effect, hostile to Federation. In the new Assembly, every member stood pledged to the main principles of the draft Constitution, and the debatable points were narrowed down to a small schedule of amendments. The unanimity was perhaps more apparent than real. Both parties numbered adherents whose federal sentiment was little more than a polite concession to the necessities of party unity. Still, the fact that there were two federal parties and no anti-federal party—nor even an avowedly anti-federal candidate for election—showed the immense development of popular feeling in New South Wales. Federation may be said to have been assured from the date of the election.

THE FEDERAL RESOLUTIONS.—Parliament met on 16th August, and after the adoption of the Address-in-Reply, Mr. Reid introduced his federal resolutions. The first resolution affirmed the desire of the House that “steps should be taken without delay, in conjunction with the other colonies, to bring about the completion of federal union.” The second resolution affirmed the desire of the House “that the other colonies should agree to reconsider those provisions of the Bill most generally objected to in New South Wales,” and proceeded to “submit for the consideration of the other colonies” the following propositions:—

- (a) Representation in the Senate.—That if equal representation be insisted upon, the provision for a three-fifths majority at a joint sitting of both Houses should be removed, and that a simple majority should decide; or that the provision for a joint sitting be replaced by a provision for a national referendum.
- (b) The 57th clause, known as the Braddon clause.—That this clause should be removed from the Bill.
- (c) The capital of the Commonwealth.—That clause 124 should be amended, and provision made in the Bill for the establishment of the federal capital in such place within the boundaries of New South Wales as the Federal Parliament may determine.
- (d) The boundaries of States.—That better provision should be made against the alteration of the boundaries of a State without its own consent—namely, by the protection afforded by clause 127, as to the representation of States.
- (e) Inland rivers.—That the use of inland rivers for purposes of water conservation and irrigation should be more clearly safeguarded.

- (f) Money Bills.—That there should be a uniform practice in respect to such Bills, namely, that provided in the case of taxation Bills and Bills for the ordinary annual services of the Commonwealth.
- (g) Judicial appeals from States.—That the mode of appeal from the Supreme Courts of the States should be made uniform, namely, the appeal should either be to the Privy Council or to the High Court, but not as at present, indiscriminately to either.

The third resolution dealt with the financial system of the Bill, and supplemented the suggestion for the removal of the Braddon clause as follows:—

- (3) Although prepared, for the sake of union—if it be placed in other respects upon a fair and just footing—to accept the financial system embodied in the Bill, with the one exception mentioned, this House earnestly invites further inquiry into, and a more thorough consideration of, the financial clauses, regarding as evils to be avoided if possible excessive burdens of taxation, a prolonged system of book-keeping, uncertainty as to the amount of surplus to be divided, and uncertainty as to the method of distributing it among the States.

It was recognized on all hands that these resolutions were studiously moderate in tone, and that the language of demand had been renounced in favour of the language of request. Nevertheless, Mr. Barton still feared that the difference might be merely one of form, and that under the velvet paw of “negotiation” might lurk the claw of dictation. He still objected to the requests of the House being embodied in a “placard,” and thought that the Government ought merely to have defined its policy and then asked the House for authority to confer. However, the resolutions were debated in the House and in Committee, and were passed, with the addition of requests for the consideration of the two following propositions (the first moved by Mr. J. S. T. McGowen, leader of the Labour Party, and the second by Mr. Henry Copeland):—

- (h) The alteration of the Constitution.—That clause 127 should be altered to provide:—

1. That any proposed alteration of the Constitution, approved by both Houses and a national referendum, should be submitted to the Governor-General for the Queen’s assent.
2. That, where a proposed alteration has been affirmed in two succeeding sessions by an absolute majority in one House, but rejected by the other, such proposed alteration should be submitted to the national referendum.

3. That, respecting proposed alterations transferring to the Commonwealth any of the powers retained by the several States at the date of their acceptance of the Constitution, such alteration should not take effect in any State unless approved by a majority of electors in such State voting.

(i) Number of Senators.—That the number of Senators from each State should be increased from six to not less than eight. Twenty Senators, including the President or Chairman of Committees, to constitute a quorum.

In the Legislative Council the same resolutions, with Mr. McGowen's and Mr. Copeland's propositions attached, were moved by Mr. J. H. Want, the Attorney-General. After debate, they were passed with the following substantial modifications:—(1) The suggestion of a national referendum as an alternative to a joint sitting was struck out. (2) The proposition that the federal capital should be in New South Wales was—by a majority of one—amended so as to require that the capital should be in Sydney. (3) As to rivers, the Council asked that their use for irrigation and conservation, instead of being merely “more clearly safeguarded,” should be “preserved for their respective colonies.” In Resolution 3, the declaration that the House was “prepared for the sake of union to accept the financial system embodied in the Bill” was struck out. Mr. McGowen's proposal for the alteration of the Constitution was also struck out, and replaced by a resolution objecting to the plan of submitting alterations of the Constitution to a Referendum, but asking that any alteration transferring State powers to the Commonwealth should not take effect in any State without the consent of both Houses of Parliament of that State.

(16) THE PREMIERS' CONFERENCE, 1899.

No attempt was made to harmonize the resolutions of the two Houses; and on 29th January, 1899, the Premiers of all the six colonies met at Melbourne, at Mr. Reid's request, to consider the suggestions made by New South Wales. A noteworthy feature of this meeting was that Queensland, which since the Hobart Conference of 1895 had stood aloof from the movement, was represented by its new Premier, Mr. J. R. Dickson. The conference was held behind closed doors, and lasted till 2nd February, when a unanimous agreement was arrived at which all the Premiers agreed to submit to their respective Parliaments for reference to the electors.

THE JOINT SITTING.—The first request of New South Wales was almost wholly complied with. The requirement of a three-fifths majority at a joint sitting was done away with; and replaced, not indeed by a simple majority, but by “an absolute majority of the total number of the members of both Houses.”

THE FINANCIAL CLAUSES.—The financial question proved the hardest of all to solve, and nearly caused a break-up of the Conference. Several brand-new financial schemes were offered, but none of them met with general acceptance, and the Conference, like the Convention, was obliged to fall back on the scheme in the Bill. As to the Braddon clause, every one was willing to let it go, if any substitute could be found; but every cure seemed worse than the disease. The Conference reported as follows:—

“The Premiers have given full consideration to the objections which have been urged against this clause, and have also considered other proposals which have been suggested for the purpose of giving some security to the States that a reasonable amount of the revenue collected in the States shall be returned to them, while, if possible, avoiding excessive burdens of taxation, a prolonged system of book-keeping, uncertainty as to the amount of the surplus to be divided, and uncertainty as to the method of distributing the surplus amongst the States.

“The Premiers consider that all the other proposals are open to more serious objections than those which have been raised against the clause as it appears in the Bill; but with a view of meeting the objections as far as possible, consistently with the safety of the States, the Premiers are of opinion that the operation of the clause should not continue after a period of ten years if the Parliament then desires to repeal or alter it; and that, in addition, power should be granted to the Parliament to deal with any exceptional circumstances which may from time to time arise in the financial position of any of the States.”

To give effect to these opinions, they limited the Braddon clause to “a period of ten years after the establishment of the Commonwealth, and thereafter until the Parliament otherwise provides;” and added a new clause (sec. 96) empowering the Parliament, during the same period, to grant financial assistance to any State.

THE FEDERAL CAPITAL.—With regard to the Federal Capital, the Conference reported thus:—

“It is considered that the fixing of the site of the capital is a question which might well be left to the Parliament to decide; but in view of the strong expression of opinion in relation to this matter in New South Wales, the Premiers have modified the clause, so that while the capital cannot be fixed at Sydney, or in its neighbourhood, provision is made in the Constitution for its establishment in New South Wales at a reasonable distance from that city.”

Accordingly the request of New South Wales, that the capital should be in that colony, was granted; but with two conditions which Victoria insisted upon: (1) that it should not be within 100 miles of Sydney; (2) that the Parliament should sit at Melbourne until it met at the seat of Government.

BOUNDARIES OF STATES.—The protection asked for by New South Wales against the alteration of the boundaries of any State without its consent was given, by requiring that any law or constitutional amendment to that effect should be submitted to the electors of the State affected, and should require the assent of a majority of those voting.

ALTERATION OF THE CONSTITUTION.—With regard to the suggested amendments in the mode of altering the Constitution, the Premiers reported as follows :—

“The Premiers agree that, where there is a difference of opinion between the two Houses as to whether the people should have the opportunity of deciding if any alteration should be made in the provisions of the Constitution, one House should not have the power to prevent the question being decided by the people. They have therefore endeavoured to provide a means whereby, after full discussion and reasonable delay, the matter may be referred from either House to the electors. The Premiers are unable to agree that the decision should rest on the result of a National Referendum, it being considered of vital importance that any alteration in the Constitution which the States have agreed to accept should only be made if a majority of the electors of the Commonwealth and also a majority of the electors in a majority of the States determine that it is proper to make such alteration.”

Accordingly the provision was inserted which enables a proposed law for the alteration of the Constitution, if twice passed by either House of the Federal Parliament, to be submitted to a Referendum notwithstanding the dissent of the other House.

OTHER SUGGESTIONS.—As to Rivers, Money Bills, and Judicial Appeals, the Premiers after fully considering the proposals of New South Wales did not find it practicable to recommend any alteration of the Bill; whilst they did not regard as desirable the proposed increase in the number of Senators. But in addition to the amendments made at the instance of New South Wales, one was agreed to at the instance of Queensland. To meet the peculiar conditions of that colony, it was provided that if Queensland joined as an Original State, the Parliament of that State might, pending federal legislation, divide the State into electorates for the purposes of Senate elections.

RESULT OF THE CONFERENCE.—As a result of the Conference, therefore, seven amendments were made in the Bill—six at the instance of New South Wales, and one at the instance of Queensland. The three main requests of New South Wales had each been met by a substantial concession. The abolition of the three-fifths majority was a great extension of the actual, as well as the moral, efficiency of the deadlock clause. The provision as to the capital prevented the possibility of the permanent seat of Government being fixed anywhere but in New South Wales. As to the Braddon clause—the temporary retention of which was a general surprise, for it had few friends—it was certainly a great advantage to diminish its rigidity by placing it, after ten years, at the mercy of the Parliament, and thus obviating the necessity for a constitutional amendment if its removal should prove desirable.

(17) ADOPTION OF THE CONSTITUTION, 1899.

THE POSITION IN NEW SOUTH WALES.—A welcome piece of news to federalists was Mr. Reid's prompt announcement that he had done with doubt and indecision, and would support the amended Bill with all his powers. It soon became evident, however, that the opposition in New South Wales would be strong. The Sydney Daily Telegraph, on second thoughts, took up as uncompromising an attitude as ever, and the opposing forces began to consolidate themselves. Their cry was that the "demands" of New South Wales had been trifled with, and that the Bill was in substance "the same old Bill." The absolute majority at the joint sitting was denounced as being little if any better than the three-fifths majority, and elaborate calculations were made to show how New South Wales would invariably be defeated if most of her representatives absented themselves. The "Braddon Blot" was the subject of renewed attack, and its limitation in point of time was made light of. The 100 mile limit for the federal capital was complained of as a gross insult to Sydney—the corresponding "insult" to the rest of Australia, implied in the demand made by New South Wales, being ignored. The provision was in fact a most unfortunate one, because it aroused fierce opposition in the metropolitan and suburban area—the very district which it was most important to conciliate. In particular the provision for the temporary meeting of Parliament in Melbourne was attacked as hiding a deep conspiracy to establish the seat of Government there permanently, and it was roundly stated that Mr. Reid had been "outwitted" by the cunning of the other colonies. The real fight, however, centred round the financial clauses, against which all the old arguments were reiterated, but with greater wealth of detail.

THE ENABLING BILL.—The New South Wales Parliament met on 21st February, and the new Enabling Bill was at once introduced in the Assembly. It provided for the submission of the amended Constitution to a Referendum, at which a simple majority was to decide; and it allowed any holder of an elector's right to vote at any polling-booth in the colony, whether or not he was qualified as a Parliamentary voter for any electorate. In the Assembly no difficulties were met; even the malcontents admitting that the Constitution must be submitted to the people, and reserving their hostility for the present. In Committee, amendments were moved to make acceptance by an "absolute majority" of all the electors necessary; to make the inclusion of Queensland a condition of New South Wales entering the Federation; and to take an alternative referendum on the Bill as amended by the Premiers, and on the Bill "as amended by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales." The object of all these amendments, however, was too apparent, and they were all defeated by overwhelming majorities. An amendment was also moved to defer the referendum for three months after the passing of the Bill; but this was withdrawn on the Premier undertaking to allow an interval of six weeks.

The Bill passed the Assembly without amendment, and went to the Council, where it met with a very different reception. A large petition was presented against the Bill, and the opposition was led by Dr. McLaurin with a powerful attack on the financial clauses, which he claimed to be unworkable. In Committee, three vital amendments were passed by large majorities; one to defer the referendum for three months; another to make acceptance by one-third of all the electors necessary; and a third making the inclusion of Queensland a condition of Federation. To these amendments the Assembly refused to agree; the Council insisted, and a free Conference was held, but both sides were unyielding, and on 30th March Parliament was prorogued.

The Council was at this time much below its normal strength, owing to deaths and resignations, and a few days after the prorogation the Governor, on the advice of his Ministers, appointed twelve new members. On 11th April Parliament was again called together, and the Enabling Bill was again passed by the Assembly and sent up to the Council. The hint was sufficient. Only one amendment was proposed, to require an interval of eight weeks before the referendum should be taken. This was agreed to by the Assembly, and on 22nd April the Bill was assented to.

THE SECOND REFERENDUM.—The 20th June, 1899, was the day fixed for the Referendum, and the last great fight began at once. The federal campaign was organized by the United Federal Executive, formed of representatives from the non-party Australasian Federation League, from the New South Wales Federal Association, which had fought the last battle for the Bill, and from the Ministerial and Opposition parties in Parliament. On the other side, the Anti-Convention Bill League took up its old attitude. Of the Sydney daily press, the Telegraph was alone in its opposition; the Sydney Morning Herald, the Evening News, and the Australian Star all worked zealously for Federation. The Sydney Bulletin, which—when it has a positive policy—is a great power throughout Australia, concentrated its unrivalled wealth of ridicule against the opponents of the Bill, and the suburban and provincial press were almost unanimous on the same side. Of the 125 members of the Legislative Assembly, some 86 supported the Bill with varying degrees of zeal; and nine of the New South Wales representatives at the Convention worked earnestly for it—Mr. Lyne alone expressing himself still dissatisfied.

With all these odds against them, the Anti-Bill party made a gallant fight. Their virtual leader was Dr. MacLaurin, whose criticism of the financial clauses undoubtedly made a deep impression; whilst the rank and file of the party made onslaughts upon every joint in their opponents' armour, and devoted themselves especially to stir up jealousy in the metropolitan area. The great bulk of the Parliamentary Labour Party still yearned for the national referendum, and opposed the Bill consistently; though at the polls the labour vote was fairly evenly divided. The heart of the controversy, however, was the financial argument, and the whole country seemed plunged into a bewildering maze of figures, devoted to proving—and disproving—that the Bill would involve oppressive and unfair taxation in New South Wales. Eight days before the vote a fillip was given to the cause by the passing, at last, of a Federal Enabling Bill in Queensland—the colony of which federalists and anti-federalists alike had always spoken as the “natural ally” of New South Wales.

The result of the polling was a decisive victory for Federation by a majority of 24,679 votes, the figures in the city, suburban, and country electorates being as follows :—

	Yes.	No.
City	11,019	10,546
Suburbs	24,475	25,237
Country	71,926	46,958
Total	107,420	82,741

Taken by electorates, the vote shows 79 electorates for the Bill, and 46 against—or a majority of 33 for union.

THE SOUTHERN COLONIES.—South Australia had passed the new Enabling Act in March, and seizing the opportunity afforded by a general election, had taken the vote upon the amended Bill on 29th April, when the verdict of the previous year was, without much excitement, reaffirmed by an even larger majority than before—the voting being 65,990 for Federation, and 17,053 against.

Victoria and Tasmania, as soon as the verdict of New South Wales was known, passed Enabling Acts on the same lines, and fixed 27th July, 1899, as Referendum Day. In Victoria, despite the weakness of the opposition, federalists determined to exhibit their strength, and aroused enthusiasm to such a pitch that a great muster of 152,653 votes were recorded for the Bill, and only 9,805 against it. In Tasmania also the majority was increased, and the minority reduced, the figures being 13,437 for and only 791 against the Bill.

QUEENSLAND.—The real interest now centred in Queensland. The Premier, Mr. Dickson, ably supported by his colleague, Mr. R. Philp, took up the cause with enthusiasm. The Enabling Bill, providing for the submission of the amended Constitution to a referendum, and for its subsequent transmission, by address of both Houses, to the Home Government, was introduced in May. It was nearly wrecked at the outset by a proposition from the democratic party to adopt the principle of “one man one vote,” without restriction, at the referendum. There was in Queensland a “plural vote”—electors being entitled to vote in every electorate in which they possessed property of an annual value of £10—and there was also a considerable nomad population not registered as voters. It was urged that every man over the age of twenty-one should be allowed to vote whether registered as a voter or not. This the Government were unable to accept, but they only gained their point, and saved the Bill, by one vote. They afterwards conciliated opposition by affording facilities for a revision of the rolls before referendum day.

One difficulty to be faced was that Queensland—though it had been ably represented at the 1891 Convention, whose work was the basis of the draft Constitution now presented—had, through the fault of its politicians, taken no part (except through its Premier, Mr. Dickson, at the Premiers' Conference) in the actual framing of the Constitution. A natural though belated desire was felt to have a voice in the details; and as the Constitution was appended as a schedule to the Enabling Bill they could, technically, make amendments in it. An attempt to do so was, however, thwarted by the leaders of all parties, who pointed out the futility of taking a vote on anything but the identical Constitution agreed to by the other colonies; and the Bill and the schedule were passed through both Houses without amendment, and became law on 19th June—the eve of the referendum in New South Wales. The vote was fixed for 2nd September, and the campaign began.

But the friends of Federation had to face great difficulties. The question in Queensland was comparatively new, and the Constitution came definitely before the people for the first time. The forces of prejudice, ignorance, and suspicion, which in the other colonies had gradually given way as a result of repeated federal campaigns, had to be met and beaten down at a single blow; the principles of the Constitution, which in the other colonies had been expounded, analyzed, attacked and defended, discussed in public and in private, for two or three years, had to be brought home to the people in the space of a few weeks. The friends of the Bill worked zealously, and achieved wonders. It soon became clear that the North and the Centre were the federal strongholds—federal sentiment being there aided by the hope that the separation of those districts into distinct provinces, so long unsuccessfully contended for, would be easier after Federation. The one clause of the draft Constitution which aroused the fears of the Separatist federalists was clause 124, providing that a new State might be formed by separation of territory from a State, "but only with the consent of the Parliament thereof." The Separatists were in a minority in the Queensland Parliament, and objected to the desires of an overwhelming majority in the North and Centre being thwarted by a majority in the South.

In Brisbane and throughout the southern district the opposition to the Bill was very strong. Farmers, merchants, and manufacturers feared the competition of their New South Wales neighbours under a system of intercolonial freetrade; and—while the anti-federalists in New South Wales hailed Queensland as their "natural ally" against the southern colonies—the extreme anti-federalists of Queensland turned against New South Wales the epithets which their brethren in New South Wales had hurled against Victoria. Brisbane feared the competition of Sydney, just as Sydney had feared the competition of Melbourne; and federalists had a hard task in convincing their opponents that the benefits of free intercourse would vastly outweigh any sacrifice of intercolonial protection.

In Queensland, therefore, the opposition was directed against a vital principle of Federation, and was undeniably anti-federal. The objection was not to this Constitution merely, but to any Federation worthy of the name. It was a war of vested interests and intercolonial protection against commercial unity. Minor issues were, of course, raised, and the "Anti-Bill" catchwords of the other colonies—however inapplicable—were caught up and scattered broadcast. The cry of "increased taxation through the customs," and even the exact figures of "22s. 6d. per head increased taxation," were copied from New South Wales manifestoes with calm indifference to the fact that these forecasts were based upon the existing tariff of New South Wales—which produced about 30s. per head less than that of Queensland. Equal representation in the Senate was, from the Queensland point of view, a merit; but it was largely discounted by the Money-Bill and deadlock clauses, which it was feared would lead to the undue supremacy of the larger colonies.

The result of the vote was a victory for Federation by a substantial majority of 7,492—the figures being 38,488 for the Bill, and 30,996 against. In the Northern district there was an overwhelming federalist majority of 8,993, every electorate showing a majority for the Bill. In the Centre, there was a majority of 2,156, eight electorates being favourable, and three unfavourable. Rockhampton, the capital of the centre, polled against the Bill—a result due, not to antagonism to Federation, but to a Separatist fear of clause 124. The Centre and North thus gave a combined federal majority of 11,149; but this was unfortunately reduced by an anti-federal majority of 3,657 in the South—the metropolitan electorates being all against the Bill, and the rest of the Southern district polling slightly in its favour.

THE TOTAL RESULTS.—The voting in the five colonies whose electors had accepted the draft Constitution was as follows:—

	New South Wales.	Victoria.	South Australia.	Tasmania.	Queensland.	Total.
Yes ...	107,420	152,653	65,990	13,437	38,488	377,988
No ...	82,741	9,805	17,053	791	30,996	141,386
Majority ...	24,679	142,848	48,937	12,646	7,492	236,602

These figures are a striking proof of the extent and sincerity of the national sentiment throughout the whole of Eastern Australia; and they are also a unique testimony to the high political capacity of the Australian people. Never before have a group of self-governing, practically independent communities, without external pressure or foreign complications of any kind, deliberately chosen of their own free will to put aside their provincial jealousies and come together as one people, from a simple intellectual and sentimental conviction of the folly of disunion and the advantages of nationhood. The States of America, of Switzerland, of Germany, were drawn together under the shadow of war. Even the Canadian provinces were forced to unite by the neighbourhood of a great foreign power. But the Australian Commonwealth, the fifth great Federation of the world, came into voluntary being through a deep conviction of national unity. We may well be proud of the statesmen who constructed a Constitution which—whatever may be its faults and its shortcomings—has proved acceptable to a large majority of the people of five great communities scattered over a continent; and proud of a people who, without the compulsion of war or the fear of conquest, have succeeded in agreeing upon the terms of a binding and indissoluble Social Compact.

THE ADDRESSES TO THE QUEEN.—The last step towards the acceptance of the draft Constitution by the five colonies was taken by the Legislatures in passing Addresses to the Queen praying that the Constitution should be passed into law by the Imperial Parliament. In the three southern colonies—Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania—this proceeding, after the emphatic vote of the electors, was little more than a matter of form; and during the month of August both Houses of Parliament in each of those colonies adopted the Addresses without opposition and amid general congratulations.

In New South Wales there was a show of opposition, but only by a few of the most irreconcilable critics. Many of those who had opposed the Bill had been influenced by misgivings rather than by real hostility, and accepted the verdict of the people loyally. The Address was debated at length in the Assembly, but an amendment purporting to inform the Queen that 82,000 of her loyal and dutiful subjects had voted against the Bill, and that “such vote was not a declaration against Federation, but against the adoption of any Constitution which could not be amended by a majority of the Australian people,” was defeated by 75 votes to 22, and the Address was then passed on the voices. In the Council the opposition was stronger. An amendment, moved by Mr. C. G. Heydon, to declare that if the Parliament did not meet at the Seat of Government within four years, it should sit in alternate years at Sydney and Melbourne, was prompted by the fear that the sittings of the Parliament at Melbourne might become permanent. Federalists recognized, however, that it was impossible to re-open the terms of union at this stage, and the amendment was defeated by a narrow majority of four. On 17th August the Address itself was carried, after several nights’ debate, by 24 votes to 21.

In the Queensland Assembly the verdict of the people was also loyally accepted, and the Address was passed, on 4th August, by 57 votes to 9. In the Council, an amendment was moved to declare that the Bill had been carried by majorities in the Centre and North only; but this effort to elevate sectional differences over the decision of the whole colony failed, and the Address was passed by 16 votes to 9.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.—At the close of the Convention, Sir John Forrest had seemed prepared to recommend Western Australia to adopt the Constitution as it stood; but his attitude subsequently became less favourable. At the Premiers’ Conference, 1899, it is understood that he asked, unsuccessfully, for certain concessions. In July, 1899, after the second referendum in New South Wales, the Constitution was for the first time submitted to the Parliament of Western Australia, and was referred to a Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly. On 19th September the Committee brought up its report, declaring its opinion that before Western Australia could safely join the Commonwealth, four amendments were necessary:—

- (1.) Enabling the colony to be divided into electorates for the election of Senators ;
- (2.) Empowering the Federal Parliament to authorize the construction of a transcontinental railway ;
- (3.) Allowing Western Australia, for five years after the adoption of a federal tariff, to impose her own customs duties on intercolonial and other imports ;
- (4.) Exempting Western Australia, for the same period, from the jurisdiction of the Inter-State Commission.

The object of the second of these amendments was to dispense with the necessity of the consent of South Australia (under sec. 51—xxxiv.) to the selection of the route and the construction of the line within that colony. The five years' control of the tariff was for the double purpose of securing the revenue necessities of the colony and affording temporary protection to the West Australian farmers, and other producers of foodstuffs.

On the consideration of this report in the Legislative Assembly, the Government proposed to submit to the electors both the Bill as adopted by the Premiers' Conference and the Bill with the West Australian amendments. This was stoutly opposed by federalists, who were confident that there was an overwhelming majority of the population, especially on the goldfields, in favour of the Bill as it stood, and that the proposed alternative ballot would confuse the issue. In Parliament, however, the goldfields were very scantily represented as compared with the settled districts ; and though Mr. Leake moved an amendment that the Bill as adopted by the Premiers' Conference should alone be referred to the people, the Government proposal was carried by the House.

In the Council the proceedings were hopelessly tangled. First a proposal by Mr. Matheson, that the Bill as adopted by the other colonies should be referred to the people, was negatived. Then a proposal by Mr. Whitcombe, that it was undesirable at present to submit the question of Federation to the people at all, was also rejected. The Government's proposal to submit both Bills met with the same fate ; and finally a proposal by Mr. Hackett, to submit only the Bill with the Committee's amendments, was also lost. The result was that the submission of the Bill to the people was blocked altogether. The federalists raised the cry that the whole fiasco had been planned by the Government ; and an agitation was promptly started on the goldfields for separation from Western Australia, under the power reserved by the Queen in the Constitution of the colony.

In January, 1900, Sir John Forrest, with a view to securing assent to his amendments, visited the eastern colonies and attended a Conference of Premiers at Sydney. He finally gave up three of the West Australian amendments, but stood firm on the five years' liberty to impose intercolonial customs duties. Had the matter been still in the stage of negotiation, this might have been granted ; but the difficulty was that the Constitution was now a compact upon which the people of the accepting colonies had set the seal of their approval.

and whose alteration the Governments of those colonies were unable to countenance.

NEW ZEALAND.—New Zealand, alone of the seven Australasian colonies, had, since the Convention of 1891, taken no part in the process of framing the Federal Constitution. Following the example of 1891, New Zealand is mentioned in covering clause 6 as a possible "State," but as yet she has taken no steps to adopt the Constitution. This does not mean that New Zealand is without interest in Australian Federation. The progress of the movement has been watched by that colony with keen attention; and a substantial section of public opinion favours the adoption of the Constitution. In July, 1899, a Federation League was formed in Auckland; and though the question of Federation has not risen to the magnitude of a party issue, it has been much discussed by politicians, by the press, and by the people. For the most part, however, Federation is in New Zealand not so much a national as a commercial question. Her geographical isolation from Australia by 1,200 miles of sea is a factor which cannot be neglected, though it may be exaggerated. At the same time, her commercial and other relations with Australia are most important; her interests, as regards defence and external affairs, are largely identical; and the alternatives either of union or of a reciprocal commercial arrangement with the Commonwealth are pressing themselves upon the attention of the people of New Zealand.

(18) ENACTMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION, 1900.

On 22nd December, 1899, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, in a telegraphic despatch to Earl Beauchamp, Governor of New South Wales, expressed a hope that a delegation from the federating colonies would visit England and be present when the Commonwealth Bill was submitted to the Imperial Parliament. This invitation was considered at a Conference of Premiers held at Sydney from 24th to 27th January; and it was arranged that a delegation should be sent, consisting of Mr. Edmund Barton (N.S.W.), Mr. Alfred Deakin (Victoria), Mr. J. R. Dickson (Queensland), Mr. C. C. Kingston (S.A.), and that they should be joined in London by Sir Philip O. Fysh (Tasmania). It was agreed that the delegation should represent all the federating colonies in unitedly urging the passage of the Bill through the Imperial Parliament without amendment, and in explaining any legal or constitutional questions that might arise. The Government of Western Australia also expressed a desire to be represented, and, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State, despatched Mr. S. H. Parker, Q.C., as a Delegate from that colony.

IMPERIAL CRITICISMS.—Towards the middle of March, 1900, the Australian Delegates arrived in London. Mr. Barton was appointed their spokesman; and on 15th March they had their first informal conference with the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Crown Law Officers. Mr. Chamberlain having welcomed the Delegates, Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Attorney-General, indicated the provisions of the Bill which the Crown Law Officers thought required discussion and explanation, and perhaps amendment. The chief objection made was to clause 74, as restricting the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

It was evident from the outset that, whilst the Delegates were anxious to secure the passage of the Bill without amendment, the Imperial Government were equally anxious to amend certain provisions which seemed to them to affect Imperial interests. The only way in which the Imperial Government had been heard in connection with the framing of the Bill was in consultation with the Australian Premiers at London at the Diamond Jubilee celebrations in 1897, when certain criticisms had been made on the Bill as drafted at Adelaide. Mr. Chamberlain had subsequently sent Mr. Reid a confidential memorandum of the criticism of the Crown Law Officers, which included an objection to the almost total abolition of Privy Council appeals, as proposed in the Adelaide draft. (See Extract from this memorandum, Parl. Papers, May, 1900.) This memorandum had been handed by Mr. Reid to the Drafting Committee, and had led to several amendments being made, and particularly to a considerable modification of the clause relating to Privy Council appeals. The Crown Law Officers, however, were not satisfied with the new clause, and had also some new criticisms to offer.

A memorandum of the amendments suggested by the Crown Law Office was afterwards handed to the Delegates. (House of Com. Pap., May, 1900, p. 19.) These amendments, only five in number, were wholly confined to the covering clauses of the Bill. (1) As regards Privy Council appeals, it was proposed to modify the effect of clause 74 by adding to covering clause 5 a declaration that nothing in the Act or the Constitution should affect any prerogative of the Crown to grant special leave of appeal to Her Majesty in Council. (2) In covering clause 2, the words "This Act shall bind the Crown" were proposed to be omitted, as involving an unnecessary interference with the prerogative. (3) In covering clause 5, the provision that the laws of the Commonwealth should be in force on British ships plying between ports of the Commonwealth was proposed to be omitted as being too wide and involving a possible conflict of jurisdiction; whilst it was thought that all necessary powers of legislation in respect of the coasting trade were given by sec. 736 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (see p. 50, supra). (4) It was proposed to declare, in covering clause 5, that the laws of the Commonwealth were "colonial laws" within the meaning of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865 (28 and 29 Vic. c. 63). A contention had been raised in Canada that this Act was not fully applicable to laws of the Dominion (see Lefroy, Legisl. Power in Canada, pp. 227-8); and the Crown Law Officers feared that in Australia a similar contention might derive some support from the definition of "colony" in covering clause 6. (5) It was proposed that the Constitution, instead of being appended to covering clause 9, should be placed as a schedule to the Act.

MEMORANDUM OF THE DELEGATES.—Preliminary to a further interview with the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Delegates forwarded to him a Memorandum, dated 23rd March, of their reasons for urging the passage of the Bill in the form in which it had been affirmed by the people. (House of Com. Pap., May, 1900, p. 13). In defending the provisions proposed to be altered, they carefully guarded themselves against even appearing to acquiesce in the suggestion that any amendment was necessary. They called attention to the recital in the preamble that the people of the federating colonies had agreed to unite in a federal Commonwealth "under the Constitution hereby established;" and argued that this recital would not be justified if the Constitution were in any way altered.

In answer to a question whether, if alterations were made, it was preferable that they should be placed in the covering clauses rather than in the Constitution itself, the Delegates replied that though this would, in appearance, be the less objectionable method, yet any amendment in the covering clauses which altered the meaning of the Constitution would be in effect an alteration of the Constitution, and would therefore be equally objectionable.

They then dealt categorically with the specific amendments foreshadowed by the Crown Law Officers. As regards the application of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, they thought that the meaning of the Bill was clear without the proposed amendment, and that the definition of "colony" in covering clause 6, which had been framed simply for the purpose of clearly including South Australia in the Bill, could not exclude the definition of "colony" in the Colonial Laws Validity Act from applying to the Commonwealth. In support of this view, they cited the definition of "colony" in the (Imperial) Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vic. c. 63). And they hinted that, if the Imperial Government thought that any doubt was raised by the definition in the Bill, it would be better to omit the definition, as being unnecessary, than introduce new matter.

With regard to the proposed omission of the provision relating to British ships, they pointed out that the provision was much more restricted than that inserted, at the instance of the Imperial Government, in the Federal Council Act of 1885. If the contention were correct that the matter was sufficiently provided for by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the phrase objected to was at the worst a harmless redundancy. But the expression "coasting trade" in that Act was not defined, and might be taken to include only the trade of vessels plying within the "three-mile" territorial limits. Moreover, the provision removed a further anomaly by protecting a vessel which passes from the territorial waters of one colony into those of another from being subjected to a change of laws, and by applying the uniform laws of the Commonwealth during the whole passage from one port of the Commonwealth to another. The power, though larger than that conceded by the Merchant Shipping Act, was larger only for the most beneficial purposes.

To the amendment relating to Privy Council appeals they objected as substantially altering, and in great part nullifying, clause 74 of the Constitution. They entered into an elaborate defence of clause 74, pointing out that it was not as far-reaching as was supposed in some quarters, and justifying the demand for the finality of the judgments of the High Court, in constitutional cases, by the argument that if the Australians were fit to make a Constitution for themselves they were fit also to interpret that Constitution. The concluding sentence of the clause, giving the Federal Parliament power to limit the right of appeal, only conferred on the Commonwealth (they argued) a right to do what each State could do at present, subject to the reservation of the Bill as affecting the prerogative; and they referred to the Instructions to Australian Governors, dated July, 1892, clause viii., par. 7 (see note, § 56, infra) as showing that the framers of the Instructions considered that the colonies had full legislative powers in matters affecting the prerogative, subject to reservation for the royal assent. The last sentence of the clause, therefore, seemed only to confer on the Commonwealth a legislative power which had long been possessed by each of the States. They asked the Imperial Government to consider whether clause 74 was of such a nature as to justify alarm, and whether it was worth while to incur the risk of serious dissatisfaction in Australia for the sake of preserving the small degree of prerogative affected.

They referred to the generous attitude taken by the Imperial Government in respect of the Federal Council Bill in 1885, when it had been recognized that it would be inexpedient to make any unavoidable alterations in the draft submitted from Australia; and they concluded with an eloquent appeal to the mother-country to place in the hands of the Australian colonies the trust for which they asked. This memorandum was signed by the Delegates of the five federating colonies.

MR. HALDANE'S PROPOSAL.—At this stage a new element was introduced into the appeal question by a proposal from Mr. R. B. Haldane, Q.C., M.P. Mr. Haldane, in an article in the March number of the Juridical Review, dwelt on the confidence felt in the Privy Council by all parts of the Empire, and the valuable work it had done in reviewing the decisions of the High Court of Canada, and giving a liberal interpretation to the powers of the provinces as defined in the British North America Act. The Commonwealth Bill, however, proposed to restrict this right of appeal, and he contended that this could only be averted "by making our Australasian colonies feel that we offer them the finest court of ultimate appeal that the Empire can produce." He proposed that the three colonial members of the Privy Council should be made life peers, and that this step should be followed by the fusion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council with the House of Lords in its judicial capacity. There would then be one great Imperial tribunal, and the anomaly of having one court of final appeal for the United Kingdom, and another for the dependencies, would be removed.

Mr. Haldane's suggestion attracted much notice in the press, and was regarded with favour by the Imperial Government and the Crown Law officers.

MEMORANDUM OF IMPERIAL OBJECTIONS.—In answer to the Memorandum of the Delegates, the Imperial Government prepared a Memorandum, dated 29th March, setting forth their objections to some provisions of the Bill. (House of Com. Pap., May 1900, p. 22.) It stated that they were most anxious for the speedy passage of the Bill in a form which would give the Australian colonies the Federation which they desired; but, at the same time, it was their bounden duty to protect the interests of the United Kingdom and the rest of the Empire. The points of difference were few, and involved a minimum of alteration. They observed that the Memorandum of the Delegates abstained from discussing any of the proposed alterations on their merits, and consisted almost wholly of an appeal to the Government to accept the Bill unaltered, as embodying the wishes of the Australian people. They felt it their duty to place on record some of the reasons which made it impossible for them to accede to this request.

In the first place, they contended that the distinction, which the Delegates now refused to recognize, between the "covering clauses" and the Constitution, had been clearly recognized in the debates of the Convention, and that the Enabling Acts showed that the agreement at which the people of the colonies had arrived related to the "Constitution" only and not to the covering clauses.

As to the application of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, they cited a suggestion by Mr. R. E. O'Connor (Conv. Deb., Syd., p. 252) that the Act would not apply to the laws of the Commonwealth. They contended that doubts arose, not only from covering clause 6, but also from sub-sections xxix. and xxxviii. of section 51; and they added that "in the absence of any definition or limitation of the privilege claimed by these provisions of the Constitution, Her Majesty's Government would fail in their duty if they left any room for doubt as to the paramount authority of Imperial legislation."

As to the enforcement of the laws of the Commonwealth on British ships trading between ports of the Commonwealth, they said that the provision in the Federal Council Act, relied on by the Delegates, was unduly wide. They contended that the power to control the coasting trade, given by sec. 736 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, was not confined to territorial waters, and that the words "first port of clearance" and "port of destination" were not free from ambiguity.

As to Privy Council appeals, they thought there would be uncertainty as to the definition of "matters involving the interpretation of the Constitution" and "public interests." They objected to the powers given to the Federal Parliament to limit the prerogative, and urged that the establishment of two final courts of appeal would introduce confusion and uncertainty. The clause seemed to have originated, to some extent, in objections to the present constitution and working of the Judicial Committee—which however had, on the whole, commanded the confidence of the Empire. But the time was specially inopportune to curtail its jurisdiction. Proposals were under consideration for securing a permanent and effective representation of the colonies on the Judicial Committee, and for amalgamating the Judicial Committee with the House of Lords, so as to constitute a Court of Appeal from the whole British Empire. It would be unfortunate if Australia should choose this moment to take from the Imperial tribunal the determination of the class of cases of greatest importance and often of greatest difficulty. They stated at some length the arguments against the contention for the finality of judgments of the High Court, and concluded by saying:—"The retention of the prerogative to allow an appeal to Her Majesty in Council would accomplish the great desire of Her Majesty's subjects both in England and Australia, that the bonds which now unite them may be strengthened rather than severed, and, by ensuring uniform interpretation of the law throughout the Empire, facilitate that unity of action for the common interests which will lead to a real Federation of the Empire. The object of everyone at present should be to draw closer together all parts of the Empire. The existence of the right of appeal, subject to the leave of the Privy Council, has been a link effectively binding together every part of Her Majesty's dominions; the weakening of this tie would seriously lessen the value of even so great and beneficent a result as the Federation of Australia. If the Bill were passed in its present form, while it would mark a step in advance as far as the Federation of Australia is concerned, it would be a retrograde measure so far as it affects the larger question of Imperial Federation."

NEW ZEALAND.—On 27th March, Mr. W. P. Reeves, the Agent-General for New Zealand, informed the Colonial Office that he had been appointed a Delegate for that colony; and on 30th March he forwarded to the Colonial Office a Memorandum of certain amendments desired by New Zealand. (House of Com. Pap., May 1900, p. 29.) These amendments, three in number, were in effect:—

- (1.) That New Zealand should preserve the right of joining the Commonwealth at any time, or within a specified time, on the same terms as the Original States.
- (2.) That while New Zealand remains outside the Commonwealth, litigants in her Higher Courts, though reserving the right of appeal to the Privy Council, should have an alternative right of appeal to the High Court.
- (3.) That the Commonwealth and New Zealand should be empowered to make the necessary arrangements for joint naval and military defence, including operations outside their own boundaries, and for that purpose to form a homogeneous Australasian force.

In support of the first amendment—the request for an "open door"—Mr. Reeves urged that New Zealand, on account of her geographical distance and her peculiar circumstances, ought to be given a longer time to make up her mind than had been necessary in the case of contiguous colonies. Though New Zealand was linked to Australia by bonds of intercourse, friendship, and sympathy, she had also vital and separate interests. She had watched the federal movement with caution and reserve, and her decision needed prudent deliberation. To forestall a possible objection that his demands came too late, Mr. Reeves said that New Zealand had been unable to judge of the intentions of the Australian colonies until they had accepted the Commonwealth Bill; and as the leading statesmen of Australia, in response to a request by the Premier of Western Australia, had refused to consider any further amendments, the only course open to New Zealand was that now taken.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.—On the same day Mr. S. H. Parker, the Delegate for Western Australia, forwarded to the Colonial Office a Memorandum of the amendment asked for by that colony. (House of Com. Pap., May, 1900, p. 31). Following the recommendation of the West Australian Select Committee (p. 226 supra) he asked that clause 95 should be struck out, and a clause substituted empowering Western Australia, for five years after the imposition of the Federal tariff, to receive the same customs duties as were in force at the passing of the Commonwealth Act, such duties to be collected by the Commonwealth. He announced that if this amendment were made, the Government of Western Australia would immediately summon Parliament in order to pass an Act to refer the Commonwealth Bill to the people, and would use their utmost endeavours to secure its acceptance.

CONFERENCE AT THE COLONIAL OFFICE.—On 5th April there was a Conference at the Colonial Office, at which Mr. Chamberlain presided, and the Delegates from all the seven colonies were present (House of Com. Pap., May, 1900, p. 35). Mr. Chamberlain first asked Mr. Parker and Mr. Reeves to say anything which they might wish to add to their respective Memoranda. Mr. Parker urged that the sliding scale in the Bill, by which the intercolonial duties of Western Australia would be annually reduced by one-fifth, was not a sufficient protection for infant industries, and particularly for agriculture, and that an annual alteration of duties would greatly injure and disturb trade. If the Bill were to be amended at all by the Imperial Legislature, he did not see why the West Australian amendment should not be introduced. The argument against the amendment was that a further referendum would be necessary; and if there must be a referendum there was an opportunity for this amendment. Questioned by Mr. Chamberlain, he admitted that a referendum would cause some delay, and that he could not ask for the amendment if it alone necessitated a referendum. He also urged that if his amendment were accepted, a further amendment would be necessary to enable Western Australia, within a certain time, to be admitted as an Original State. Cross-examined by Mr. Kingston, he admitted that there was a strong feeling on the goldfields in favour of accepting the Bill without amendment, but maintained that the majority of the producing population were against it. He could not form an opinion whether the Bill if referred to the people would be accepted.

Mr. Reeves expanded the arguments of his Memorandum, and said that while the attitude of New Zealand was one of "cautious examination," the feeling in favour of Federation was growing. Asked by Mr. Chamberlain whether two of his suggestions—namely, the appeal to the High Court and the arrangements for mutual defence—were not rather a matter for subsequent agreement with the Commonwealth than for amendment of the Bill, he merely pointed to other special provisions in the Bill relating to particular colonies. He suggested seven years as the time during which the "open door" should be allowed to New Zealand. As to the question of delay, he agreed with Mr. Parker that if the Bill were to be amended at all these amendments could be put in.

From remarks made by Mr. Chamberlain, it appears that though some amendment of the covering clauses was contemplated by the Imperial Government, no decision had then been come to whether any amendment would be made in the Constitution itself.

Mr. Parker and Mr. Reeves then withdrew, and the remainder of the Conference was devoted to discussing, with the Delegates of the five federating colonies, the different points at issue. The Delegates seem to have understood that the amendments relating to the Colonial Laws Validity Act and to British ships would be abandoned.

At midnight, Mr. Chamberlain despatched to the Governors of the five colonies a telegram announcing the result of the Conference. He disclaimed any intention to interfere in interests exclusively Australian, but was confident that the Ministers of the colonies would give full weight to the suggestions of the Imperial Government when urged on behalf of the United Kingdom, or as Trustees for the Empire at large. The Imperial Government would have desired amendment as to various questions which had arisen, but were unwilling to risk delaying Federation by pressing their views; and the operation of clause 74, in restricting the right of appeal to the Privy Council, was now practically the only matter in issue. The Imperial objections to the clause were set out substantially as follows:—

- (1.) The term "public interests" is vague, and would lead to increased litigation.
- (2.) A most important link of Empire would be seriously impaired, and the consequences would be far-reaching in allowing divergency to spring up where uniformity is most desirable.
- (3.) In the interests of Australia, the final decision in important questions as to boundaries of Federal and State powers should lie with the highest court of the Empire, beyond suspicion of local bias.
- (4.) Important questions as to the operation of Commonwealth laws on British shipping, or generally as to whether such laws are ultra vires, can hardly be allowed to be concluded by the High Court.
- (5.) Commonwealth laws on fisheries, &c., may seriously affect the interests of other parts of the Empire.
- (6.) Banks and other institutions having large interests in Australia are strongly against the limitation, and weighty representations on the subject have been made to the Imperial Government.
- (7.) The actual restriction, and the power claimed to make further restriction, equivalent to practical abolition of appeal, are specially inopportune when a Bill is under consideration for enhancing the dignity and efficiency of the Judicial Committee by practically amalgamating it with the House of Lords, and providing for the adequate and permanent representation of the great colonies in a new court.

For these and other reasons the Imperial Government felt that they must press for the amendment of clause 74, but they wished to effect the amendment in the way most agreeable to Australian sentiment, and so as to avoid if possible the delay and expense of a further referendum. Several suggestions had been made, but the Delegates' lack of instructions prevented their discussing the form of the proposed amendment.

The only other amendment alluded to was the declaration that the Colonial Laws Validity Act applied to Acts of the Commonwealth—a declaration which the Imperial Government still regarded as necessary. Mr. Chamberlain earnestly appealed to the colonial governments to co-operate with him in securing the unopposed passage of a Bill which, while accepting the draft Constitution practically in its entirety, would take account of the above considerations; and he trusted that they would enlarge the instructions to their Delegates, and authorize them to arrange with the Imperial Government the speediest and best method of securing these objects.

On the same date Mr. Chamberlain telegraphed to the Governors asking whether their Ministers would consent to the amendment desired by Western Australia being inserted in the covering clauses.

PREMIERS' CONFERENCE.—On receipt of these telegrams the five Australian Governments decided to hold a conference of Premiers to discuss the position. Meanwhile, on 16th April, Mr. Chamberlain sent a further telegram stating that whilst he would be glad to learn that the Premiers concurred in his policy of amending the Bill, what he immediately desired was that the Delegates should be authorized to consult with the Imperial Government as to the best means of effecting the alterations, especially with a view to avoiding, if possible, a further referendum. The responsibility would rest with the Imperial Government, but they were anxious to avail themselves of the assistance of the Delegates. On 17th April Mr. Chamberlain, at the request of Mr. Reeves, sent a telegram inviting consideration of the New Zealand request for an "open door" for seven years. If the Premiers approved, he would be prepared to consider the amendment, otherwise he would not be justified in making it.

The Premiers' Conference sat at Melbourne from 19th to 21st April. Neither Mr. Philp, for Queensland, nor Mr. Lewis, for Tasmania, were averse to the alteration of clause 74; but ultimately the following resolution was agreed to:—

"The Premiers of New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania, in conference assembled, having given full consideration to the despatches from the Secretary of State for the Colonies respecting suggested amendments in the Commonwealth Bill, reply:—

"(1.) While they fully recognize the feeling of the Imperial Government that vigilance on their part is essential in the interests of all parts of the Empire, and also the importance of securing the inclusion of Western Australia in the Federation from the first, they cannot forget that by the enabling Acts and in pursuance of them (a) the framing of the Federal Constitution was expressly entrusted to the Convention of Representatives, specially elected by the people for the purpose, in all the Colonies, except Queensland and Western Australia, and that the final acceptance or rejection of the Constitution when framed was also remitted to the people; (b) the question as to appeals was, inter alia, considered by the Convention in Adelaide, and no appeal to the Privy Council was allowed. During the visit of the Premiers to England at the Jubilee the matter was referred to by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who urged reconsideration. It was accordingly reconsidered at the meeting of the Convention in Melbourne, and resolved in the opposite direction to the decision in Adelaide. Later, the matter was again discussed, and the compromise now in the Bill agreed to. It was yet again debated in the Premiers' Conference prior to the last referendum, and no alteration was made in the form of the Bill. The vote was then taken and the Bill was adopted by a large majority of the electors; (c) the Commonwealth Bill belongs therefore in a very special sense to the people of Australia, whose only mandate to Governments and Parliaments is to seek its enactment by the Imperial Parliament in the form in which it was adopted by the people.

"(2.) The Premiers believe that the Appeal Clause, as framed, could not work injuriously to any part of the Empire, although the proposed new Court of Appeal for the Empire would doubtless present attractions to the people of Australia.

"(3.) The only alternatives suggested in the despatches are:— (1) Amendment of the Bill and (2) postponement of its consideration. Of these two the Premiers do not hesitate to say that the latter course would be much more objectionable to Australians generally even than the former.

"(4.) Without disputing the constitutional power of the Imperial Parliament to amend the Bill on its own responsibility, the Premiers respectfully urge that the voice of the Australian people given on the Bill as it stands should receive that favourable consideration which such a weighty referendum demands. The Premiers do not consider themselves as having authority to accept any amendments. They hope that the colony of Western Australia, whose representatives assisted to frame the Bill and in the Convention almost unanimously agreed to clause 95, may be urged to accept it as it stands. They think that the Bill already sufficiently provides for the admission of New Zealand."

WESTERN AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND.—On 27th April, Mr. Chamberlain telegraphed to Sir A. C. Onslow, the Acting-Governor of Western Australia, that the Premiers had declared that they had no authority to accept amendments, and had given their Delegates no fresh instructions. He therefore could not press the matter further, and now urged West Australian Ministers to consider whether they should not, in the best interests of that colony as well as of Australia, make a resolute effort to bring the colony into Federation at once. Western Australia, unless she joined as an Original State, could only enter later on condition of complete intercolonial freetrade, and would thus lose the temporary protection of clause 95; whilst, in view of her present population, she might find it difficult to secure such large representation in the Federal Parliament as she would get as an Original State. He also asked them to consider the effect of the agitation of the Federalist party, especially in the goldfields, if the colony did not enter as an Original State. He thought it of the utmost importance to the future of Western Australia that she should join at once, and he urged that they should immediately summon Parliament and take steps for ascertaining the wishes of the people. If they agreed to this course, a clause would be inserted in the Bill providing that, if the people intimated, before the issue of the Queen's proclamation, a desire to be included, Western Australia might join as an Original State.

To this the Acting-Governor replied, on 2nd May, that Parliament had been summoned for 17th May, when an Enabling Bill would be introduced by the Premier providing for the immediate submission of the Commonwealth Bill to the people.

On 28th April the Colonial Office informed Mr. Reeves that the Premiers at the Melbourne Conference had decided that they had no authority to accept any amendments, and considered that the Bill already provided sufficiently for the admission of New Zealand. Under these circumstances he did not feel justified in further pressing for amendments in regard to a question which appeared to be one to be settled by the Australian colonies without Imperial interference.

THE DELEGATES' SECOND MEMORANDUM.—In some quarters, the Premiers' resolution was viewed as an "invitation" to the Imperial Government to amend the Bill. The Delegates of the federating colonies—except Queensland—made haste to correct this impression. They addressed a second Memorandum to the Colonial Office, dated 27th April. (House of Com. Pap., May, 1900, p. 65.) They said that the one remaining amendment suggested by the Imperial Government had been fully considered by the Premiers in Conference. As the Premiers had been unable to accept it, or to withdraw, enlarge, or modify the instructions to the Delegates, it continued to be the common duty of the Delegates—each of whom was appointed to represent all the colonies—to press for the speedy passage of the Bill, as prepared by the instructions, and endorsed by the votes, of the Australian people. In firmly preferring this request with all possible respect, they deemed it desirable to offer some comment on the Colonial Office Memorandum of 29th March.

The substantial issue which they again pressed upon the attention of Her Majesty's Government was that the Bill as prepared was an Australian Constitution in a double sense—Australian not only in origin, but by the deliberate endorsement of Parliaments and peoples. Any amendment, not both absolutely essential and incapable of achievement by any other means and at any other time, was to be deprecated as destroying the character of the measure, and re-opening numerous issues at present happily and conclusively settled. They again drew attention to the phrase in the preamble, reciting that the people of the colonies had agreed to federate "under the Constitution hereby established;" and urged that the proposed amendment would at once vitiate the agreement, and render this solemn declaration a violation of the facts.

They pointed out that it was not quite accurate to say that the Enabling Acts referred to the "Constitution" only, and not to the covering clauses. Both in the Enabling Acts and in the Addresses the "Constitution" meant the whole Bill—the Acts having imposed on the Convention the duty of framing a Federal Constitution "in the form of a Bill for enactment by the Imperial Parliament." It was true that there were ways in which the covering clauses might be amended without changing the meaning of the Constitution itself; but the proposed amendment of clause 74 was not of this character. It had never been admitted that such an alteration would preserve the intercolonial compact of the electors.

They feared that the amendment of clause 74 would encourage the persistent opponents of the Bill to renew their agitation. A fresh referendum would involve expense, delay, and vexation; and if a referendum were not granted it would be truly asserted that the Bill no longer contained the compact accepted by the people. In either case, the initiation of the Commonwealth would be embittered by the introduction of issues fruitful in strife.

They had hitherto forbore to dilate on the disadvantages of the present system of appeals to the Privy Council; for not only were the delay and expense incapable of serious dispute, and the evils patent which were inseparable from the want of judicial knowledge of Australian laws and conditions, but the court as at present constituted was not attempted to be defended. Whether its proposed reconstitution would suffice from the Australian point of view would depend on subsequent Imperial legislation. When Australia had at length, after infinite pains, formulated a scheme which satisfied Australian requirements, it would be manifestly unfair to postpone its adoption pending the consideration of a measure not yet prepared, and which might, or might not, be satisfactory.

The substantial questions were:—(1) whether clause 74 derogates from the rights of other parts of the Empire; and (2) even if it technically appears to do so, whether its operation would injuriously affect other parts of the Empire. The delegates confessed their inability to see that an affirmative answer could be given to either question. The clause expressly preserved the rights—or, in its own words, the "public interests"—of every part of the Queen's Dominions outside the Federation. If the words "public interests" had no technical meaning, they must be construed in their ordinary and common-sense signification, which was sufficiently definite.

They elaborated the arguments for the final interpretation in Australia of the Australian Constitution. The capacity and integrity of Australian Judges would not be disputed. The contention that clause 74 would "tend to destroy uniformity of decision on constitutional questions" was untenable. The principles of interpretation of statutes were so well understood that lack of uniformity in that regard was out of the question; and in their application to the words of the Australian Constitution the question of uniformity with decisions given on (say) the Canadian Constitution would not arise. Uniformity of decision as to Constitutions of different design would be as unattainable as it was undesirable. Judicial knowledge of local conditions was essential to true interpretation.

To the contention that the final decision in Australia of a few Australian questions would weaken a "link of Empire," and that uniform interpretation of the law would facilitate that unity of action which would lead to a real Federation of the Empire, the Delegates replied that "unity of action" and "uniform interpretation of the law" seemed to them wholly unrelated, and certain to remain so. They reflected with pride that there were sentiments which would constitute eternal links of Empire. "The consciousness of kinship, the consciousness of a common blood and a common sense of duty, the pride of their race and history—these are the links of Empire; bands which attach, not bonds which chafe. When the Australian fights for the Empire, he is inspired by these sentiments; but no patriotism was ever inspired or sustained by the thought of the Privy Council."

The Delegates assured Her Majesty's Government that the proposed amendment, even through a covering clause, could not fail to be distasteful and harassing to the Australian people. "If they accepted the Constitution with such an amendment, it would be because they were made to choose between the bowl of intervention and the dagger of delay."

In conclusion, they submitted that the object of those who sought "to draw closer together all parts of the Empire" would be best served in Australia by never permitting its Federation to be placed in even apparent opposition to "the larger question of Imperial Federation." So far from there being any conflict between the two, it had always been maintained in the colonies that local union was an essential preliminary to any practical scheme of Imperial co-operation. The suggestion that they were antagonistic was therefore to be deprecated, as it was not only unjustified, but must deal a serious blow in Australia to the prospects of Imperial Federation.

"The Delegates therefore plead most earnestly with Her Majesty's Government that effect may be given to the representations made by the Australian Premiers in their recent telegram. That despatch makes it clear that the clause as it stands was repeatedly considered and ratified by Convention, Premiers, and people; that the electoral adoption of the Bill is a mandate to Executives and Legislatures to seek its enactment in the form which the people gave it by their representatives, and confirmed by their votes; that the Premiers decline to accept alterations, because that course is unauthorized in view of the mandate, and would therefore be improper; and that they decline to authorize others to do on their behalf that which they cannot rightly do themselves. This request implies no questioning of the trusteeship of Her Majesty's Government, of the wisdom of Parliament, or of its sovereign power; but often it has been the truest wisdom of sovereignty to abstain from the exercise of its power, or so to exercise it as only to win the gratitude of those who are subject to its authority."

This Memorandum was subscribed by the Delegates of four of the federating colonies; but Mr. Dickson, the Queensland Delegate, refused to sign it, on the ground that to continue to press upon the Imperial Government correspondence which might lead to further arguments would invite delay in presenting the Bill to Parliament, with a possibility of imperilling its immediate consideration. In a subsequent Memorandum to the Colonial Office, dated 5th May, Mr. Dickson explained that a further reason for his refusal to sign was "a conviction that the maintenance of plenary appeal to the Privy Council, notwithstanding the provisions of the Bill, is regarded with most cordial approval by every loyal subject—certainly in Queensland—and, I believe, generally throughout Australia." He added that since their arrival in London, the Delegates had had the honour and immense advantage of consultations with the Attorney-General, Sir Richard Webster, and Sir Robert Finlay, Solicitor-General, who, at interviews and in the reply to the Delegates' first Memorandum, had expressed arguments for the maintenance of full appeal which seemed to him to be practically unanswerable.

FINAL IMPERIAL MEMORANDUM.—On 4th May, the Imperial Government addressed a final Memorandum to the Delegates. They said that a detailed reply to the Delegates' arguments would merely involve repetition of their previous Memorandum; but there were one or two points which deserved a brief comment. First, it could not fairly be contended that the referendum on the Bill was to be taken as an unqualified and considered ratification of every detail of the Constitution, and that no single provision could be altered without contravening the decision of the electors. Next, as to the alleged disadvantages attending appeals to the Privy Council, they did not believe that there was such delay and expense as suggested, and were not aware of any patent evils arising from want of knowledge of Australian laws and conditions. It had never been admitted, nor could it be justly asserted, that the Judicial Committee as at present constituted was incapable of defence. They referred to the statement, in their first Memorandum, that the administration of justice by the Privy Council had, on the whole, been such as to command the confidence of the Empire. This statement was amply justified by the history of that Tribunal, and no inference to the contrary could be drawn from any proposals for improving its constitution. The excellent work which it had done in deciding the difficult and delicate questions arising between the Dominion and the Provinces in Canada was in itself a complete refutation of such an idea. The proposed amendments were based upon no distrust of the people of Australia; the sole desire of the Government was that, in a matter which affected the whole Empire, the Bill should be passed in a form which would be best alike for Australia and for every other part of the Queen's Dominions. In this endeavour they confidently hoped for the co-operation and support of the Australian people.

DELEGATES' FINAL MEMORANDUM.—To this the four Delegates replied briefly with yet another Memorandum dated 8th May. They agreed that no useful purpose would be served by further written discussion of the proposed amendments. They denied, however, that the amendment as to appeals was in any sense "a detail of the Constitution." It had been treated from the first, on both sides, as vital. To the suggested amendment in regard to the Colonial Laws Validity Act they had made no reference in their second Memorandum, as they had understood that it had been abandoned. Without receding from their previous opinion, they now urged that such an Act ought not to apply to great self-governing communities like the Dominion and the Commonwealth, whose statutory authority should be subordinate only to that of the Imperial Parliament when exercised after the establishment of their Constitutions and expressly applied. They trusted that even now the Imperial Government might be willing to provide by separate legislation for this and any other matter they might consider essential, passing the Commonwealth Bill without amendment as desired by the peoples, Parliaments, and Governments of the colonies. For the immediate and ultimate consequences if the suggested amendments were made the Delegates could not be held responsible. If they had been outspoken and tenacious of their views, the sincerity of their apprehensions would, no doubt, be accepted as sufficient justification.

INTRODUCTION OF THE BILL.—On 14th May, Mr. Chamberlain introduced the Commonwealth Bill into the House of Commons. The Bill as introduced differed from the draft of the Convention in the following particulars:—

In the preamble, the words “and under the Constitution hereby established” were omitted. In covering clause 2, the words “This Act shall bind the Crown” were omitted, and the clause consequentially amended so as to read “The provisions of this Act and of the Constitution set forth in the schedule to this Act,” &c. The blanks in the preamble and in covering clause 3 were filled in, and in the latter clause the words providing for the admission of Western Australia as an Original State were inserted. To covering clause 5 the following words were added:—“Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution set forth in the schedule to this Act, the prerogative of Her Majesty to grant special leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council may be exercised with respect to any judgment or order of the High Court of the Commonwealth or of the Supreme Court of any State.” To the definition of “Commonwealth” in covering clause 6 the following words were added:—“and the laws of the Commonwealth shall be colonial laws within the meaning of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865.” Covering clause 9 was altered to read:—“Subject to the foregoing provisions, the Constitution of the Commonwealth shall be as set forth in the schedule to this Act.” Before the Constitution the word “SCHEDULE” was inserted; and at the end of the table of divisions of the Constitution the words “The Schedule” were omitted.

In the Constitution itself, the blank in clause 26 was filled in, with an alternative provision in the event of Western Australia being an Original State. In clause 42, the words “to this Constitution” were added after “schedule.” Clause 74 was omitted, and the last paragraph of clause 73 was placed as clause 74. In clause 95, after “Western Australia,” the words “if that State be an Original State” were added. In clause 125, the words “if New South Wales be an Original State” and “if Victoria be an Original State” were omitted, with consequential amendments. At the end of the Constitution, the word “The” before “Schedule” was omitted.

In introducing the Bill, Mr. Chamberlain said, to a crowded and enthusiastic House, that it marked an era in the history of Australia, and a great and important step towards the organization of the British Empire. This Bill—the result of the careful and prolonged labours of the ablest statesmen of Australia—enabled that great island continent to enter at once the widening circle of English-speaking nations. It would be in the interests of Australia, and also of the Empire, rendering the relations between the colonies and the motherland more cordial, more frequent, and more unrestricted. “Therefore we all of us—independently of party—welcome the new birth of which we are witnesses, and anticipate for these great, free, and progressive communities a future even more prosperous than the past, and an honourable and important position in the history of the Anglo-Saxon race.”

He then briefly sketched the history of the movement, and lauded the services of Sir Henry Parkes, Sir Samuel Griffith, and Mr. Barton. He described the Bill as “a monument of legislative capacity.” Though it might not be perfect, yet, considering the magnitude and variety of the interests dealt with, no praise could be too high for those whose moderation, patience, skill, mutual consideration, and patriotism, had been able to produce so great a result.

He contrasted the Constitution with that of Canada, and briefly outlined its provisions. The Bill had been prepared by the Australian people; and though he denied altogether that Australia regarded the Imperial Parliament merely as a court for the registration of their decrees—though he was convinced that the Australian people would be neither offended nor insulted at the alteration of a word or even a clause—he did think that they expected a reasonable regard to their opinion whenever it had been conclusively shown, and to those rights of self-government of which they had made so magnificent a use. The principles on which the Imperial Government had dealt with the Bill were these. They had accepted without demur, and they asked the House to accept, every word, every line, every clause, which dealt exclusively with the interests of Australia. But where the Bill touched the interests of the Empire as a whole, or of Her Majesty’s subjects or possessions outside Australia, the Imperial Parliament occupied a position of trust which it was not the desire of the Empire—nor, he believed, of Australia—that they should fulfil in a formal or perfunctory manner. In accordance with these principles they had made some amendments: but they had refused—even at the desire of Western Australia and New Zealand—to make amendments where Imperial interests were not affected.

With regard to the Colonial Laws Validity Act, he proposed to make its application clear. The Delegates had recently raised a new point—whether the Act ought to apply to great Commonwealths like Australia and Canada. He admitted that this was a perfectly fair point to raise; but such an important change could not be introduced without mature consideration, and consultation with both Canada and Australia. He thought that clause 74 of the draft Bill would weaken a link of Empire. He admitted that those links depended entirely on freewill and assent; but before agreeing to so serious a change, he wanted to be quite certain that it had behind it the whole force of Australian opinion. The resolutions of the Premiers did not indicate that there would be any strong feeling in Australia against the amendments. The Governments of three out of seven colonies—Queensland, Western Australia, and New Zealand—were in favour of the amendments; so were the Chief Justices of all the colonies, and an enormous preponderance of the newspapers of Australia.

With regard to the reconstitution of the Supreme Court of the Empire, he admitted that the tentative provisions of the Judicial Committee Amendment Act, 1895, for the appointment of Colonial Judges to the Privy Council, had not been satisfactory. The question of constituting a new Court required further consideration; but, meanwhile, he proposed to introduce a Bill to provide for the appointment of a representative from each great colonial possession and from India to the Privy Council; such representatives to hold office for seven years, to sit during that time as Lords of Appeal, to receive from the Imperial Exchequer the salary of Lords of Appeal, and to have life peerages.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, leader of the Opposition, expressed regret and disappointment that the Government had not felt themselves obliged to accept the Bill in its entirety. He thought that any proposed amendments should have been formulated and submitted to Australia at an earlier stage, and that Conferences and Memoranda in the Jubilee Year were not enough, in view of the many subsequent opportunities for intervention. The Government, by reserving action, had in effect, though not in intention, flouted Australia. He deprecated the conduct of the Government in going behind the opinions of the accredited representatives of Australia.

Mr. George Denison Faber, the new member for York, spoke of the appeal clauses from an experience of nine years as Registrar of the Privy Council. He pointed out that the nominal strength of the Privy Council was greater than that of the House of Lords; the real trouble was when both were sitting. He opposed amalgamation, but thought that the time had come for the establishment of a new Court altogether, and the appointment of more paid Judges. Sir Charles Dilke was glad that the substantial amendments had been reduced to two, and thought that Mr. Chamberlain had failed to show any vital necessity for amending the Bill. Mr. Vicary Gibbs spoke in favour of the amendments. Mr. Haldane saw no necessity for postponing the amalgamation of the Judicial Committee and the House of Lords; and urged that so long as the jurisdiction of the House of Lords was retained, it would be impossible to preserve the status of the Privy Council. Whilst there were two tribunals, one was starved to keep up the other, and judicial strength inevitably gravitated to the House of Lords. Mr. Stanley Leighton agreed that the objections to the present constitution of the Judicial Committee were well founded. The first reading was carried on the voices, with cheers.

THE FIRST COMPROMISE.—In spite of the apparently uncompromising attitude of the Imperial Government, the Delegates did not despair of securing some modification of the proposed amendment. They had failed in what they believed to be their mandate to endeavour to secure the passage of the Bill without amendment; and when the amended Bill had been actually introduced, they conceived that the position was altered, and that they were authorized to negotiate with a view to securing a compromise. The publication of the Blue Book, containing the correspondence between the Delegates and the Imperial Government, had greatly increased public interest in the question; and the English press, whilst generally approving the resolve of the Government to protect Imperial interests, showed a marked sympathy with the aims of the Delegates. The Delegates had several interviews with Mr. Chamberlain and the Crown Law Officers, who met them cordially, and were willing to concede what they could, consistently with the principle of reserving the right of appeal to the Privy Council where interests outside Australia were affected. At last, on 19th May, Mr. Chamberlain offered to substitute for the first paragraph of clause 74 the following words:—

“No question, howsoever arising, as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and those of any State or States, or as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of any two or more States, shall be capable of final decision except by the High Court, and no appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council from any decision of the High Court on any such question unless by the consent of the Executive Government or Governments concerned, to be signified in writing by the Governor-General in the case of the Commonwealth, and by the Governor in the case of any State.”

The second paragraph of clause 74 was unaltered, except that to the power to make laws limiting the right of appeal was added a proviso that “any proposed laws containing any such limitation shall be reserved by the Governor-General for Her Majesty’s pleasure.” To clause 73, after “final and conclusive,” it was proposed to add “unless the Queen grants special leave to appeal in accordance with section 74.”

The object of this provision was to make the decision of the High Court final on questions as to the limits of Federal and State powers inter se, unless both parties—or, if the parties were private citizens, the Governments whose powers were affected—desired an appeal. The Delegates, at their own request, were authorized by their Governments to secure the nearest approach possible to the original Bill; and as this was offered by Mr. Chamberlain as the utmost limit of concession, they expressed their approval of it, subject to possible verbal improvements.

SECOND READING OF THE BILL.—On 21st May, Mr. Chamberlain moved the second reading of the Bill in the House of Commons. With regard to the Colonial Laws Validity Act, he announced that after further discussion with the Delegates, the Government had decided that the best way of removing doubts would be to omit the definition of “colony” in covering clause 6. It would then be unnecessary to make any further amendment in this respect. With regard to Privy Council appeals, he reaffirmed the principle of non-interference with purely Australian interests, and vigilance for Imperial interests. He pointed out that clause 74 of the draft Constitution recognized this distinction by making an exception where

“the public interests” of some part of Her Majesty’s dominions outside Australia were involved; but the distinction did not go far enough. It was uncertain whether the phrase “public interests” would cover, for instance, the private interests of investors, or of any body of Her Majesty’s subjects. Moreover, foreign relations were of equal importance with Imperial relations. The proposals of the Imperial Government had been before Australia for a week, and had been in most cases favourably considered. The Delegates, too, finding it impossible to carry out what they believed to be their mandate to secure the passage of the Bill without amendment, had been most considerate, and he had now arrived at an absolute agreement with four of them. He then read and explained the proposed new clause. With regard to the power of the Federal Parliament to limit the right of appeal, the Delegates had pointed out to him that a similar power was inherent in the Parliaments of the Australian colonies, subject to the reservation of the Bill exercising such power. Accordingly, it was proposed to grant this right to the Commonwealth, subject to an absolute statutory requirement that such Bills should be reserved.

Mr. Asquith, for the Opposition, expressed his gratification at Mr. Chamberlain’s announcement of a settlement. He admitted the trusteeship of the Imperial Parliament, but thought that the danger of clause 74 had been exaggerated in some quarters. Mr. Henniker Heaton, Mr. Blake, Mr. James Bryce, and Mr. S. Evans joined in the congratulations. The Attorney-General expressed his appreciation of the tone of the debate, which was concluded by Mr. W. Redmond and Mr. T. M. Healy declaring, on behalf of Ireland, their envy at the rights of self-government accorded to Australia. The Bill was then read a second time with cheers, and taken into Committee pro forma.

AUSTRALIAN CRITICISMS.—In Australia, however, the suggested compromise was received, first with hesitation, and then with distinct disapproval, both the drafting and the policy of the new clause being condemned. On 24th May, a telegram seems to have been sent by the Government of New South Wales to Mr. Chamberlain, indicating acceptance of the arrangement by the Premiers; but a study of the cabled text of the clause changed the situation. In Queensland, Sir Samuel Griffith pointed out that the provision that no constitutional question should be “capable of final decision except by the High Court” was a clumsy and inaccurate mode of saying that all appeals in such cases should be brought to the High Court alone. He also argued that this would be a restriction, and not an extension, of the right of appeal to the Privy Council given by the original clause—under which he contended that appeals, even in constitutional cases, would lie from the State Courts direct to the Privy Council. This, however, was not the generally received interpretation of the original clause, nor was it the intention of the Convention, which clearly intended that the prohibition of appeals to the Privy Council in constitutional matters should include appeals from the State Courts; (see Historical Note to sec. 74 infra). But his strongest point was that in cases between private suitors, in which a constitutional point arose, a party’s right of appeal ought not to be made dependent on the consent of the Executive Government of his State or of the Commonwealth. In all the colonies it was forcibly urged that the interference of the political with the judicial department would be fraught with danger. Mr. Philp threatened that, if the new amendment were adhered to, he would demand the insertion of a clause requiring the assent of the Queensland Parliament before the Bill became operative in that colony. In South Australia, the Chief Justice, Sir Samuel Way, commented on the new clause as being not only obscure, but dangerous, novel, and unauthorized.

Meanwhile, to remove ambiguities and meet some of the criticisms from Australia, the first part of the proposed clause was redrafted as follows:—

“No question, however arising, as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth on the one hand, and those of any State or States on the other, shall be capable of final decision by any Court other than the High Court, except that an appeal may be permitted to the Queen in Council from any decision of the High Court on any such question by the consent of the Executive Governments concerned, whether parties or not to the litigation, the consent to be signified by the Governor-General in the case of the Commonwealth, and by the Governor in the case of a State.”

This verbal improvement, however, did not meet the main objections to the proposed clause; and on 14th June the Premiers of the southern colonies sent a joint telegram to Mr. Chamberlain, stating that opinion throughout Australia was strongly opposed to subjecting the right of appeal to the consent of the Executive Governments. They urged the reconsideration of the proposal to pass the Bill without amendment. If that was impossible, they said that the original proposal to preserve the prerogative right of appeal intact would be less objectionable than the new proposal.

THE FINAL COMPROMISE.—Sir George Turner, in an interview, suggested the substitution of the leave of the High Court for that of the Executive Councils. Mr. Wise and Mr. O'Connor telegraphed the same suggestion to Mr. Barton; but on 16th June, just before the arrival of this telegram, Mr. Chamberlain, in consultation with the Delegates, had at last resolved to make this further concession, and to offer clause 74 in the form in which it now stands in the Constitution. This was gladly accepted by the Delegates, including Mr. Dickson. The Queensland Government withdrew their protest, and offered no objection. The Government of Victoria expressed approval of the clause as altered; and the Government of South Australia, while reiterating their inability to accept any amendment, telegraphed that they did not anticipate any difficulty from the amendment now proposed. The Government of Western Australia telegraphed that the new proposal was preferable to the previous one, but that they would have preferred an appeal as a right, without leave. In New South Wales—the only colony in which Parliament was then sitting—the Government submitted to both Houses a resolution affirming that the amendment now proposed was not such an important departure from the original Bill as would justify any action which would further delay Federation. This was carried without division in the Assembly on 21st June, and in the Council on 27th June.

THE BILL IN COMMITTEE.—On Monday, 18th June, the discussion of the Bill in Committee of the House of Commons was begun. In covering clause 5, Mr. Chamberlain moved the omission of the words which had been inserted to save the prerogative of appeal in all cases (see p. 242, supra). He suggested that as some of the verbal amendments which were on the notice paper in his name hinged upon the acceptance of clause 74 as now proposed, this would be the best time for a general debate on the subject of appeals. He described the proposed settlement as an “arrangement” rather than a compromise, as neither party gave up anything to which they attached importance. The Australian objections to the previous proposal had been (1) that it would limit the right of appeal from the State courts more than was done by the original Bill—it being thought in some quarters that the original Bill did not prohibit appeals from the State courts to the Privy Council in constitutional cases; (2) that it introduced the Executive into judicial questions. The new arrangement—in connection with which he acknowledged the assistance given by Sir Samuel Griffith—met these objections, and satisfied all the five Delegates; though no reply had yet been received from their Governments. Several members of the Opposition complained that the House was placed in a difficult position by being asked to debate so important a clause on such short notice, and without information as to the views of the Australian Governments. Eventually, after some discussion, the debate was adjourned till Thursday, 21st June.

On that date the Committee stage was resumed. Mr. Chamberlain read telegrams announcing that the Governments of Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania, were satisfied with the proposed arrangement, and that the Parliament of New South Wales was being consulted, and would probably agree. He pointed out that the right of appeal to the Privy Council would be the same as in Canada, with the trifling exception—which he was almost inclined to think an improvement—that in certain rare cases the leave to appeal would be granted by the High Court and not by the Privy Council. Mr. Haldane and Mr. Bryce thought that in some respects—and particularly as regards cases involving the public interests of Imperial possessions outside the Commonwealth—the clause in the original Bill was better than that now proposed; and they suggested that there would be some ground for the argument that in constitutional cases the High Court was co-ordinate with, and not subordinate to, the Privy Council. This contention was answered by Sir William Anson and by the Attorney-General, Sir Robert Finlay. Mr. Asquith admitted that as the colonies had assented to the arrangement, it should be carried into effect. Mr. Chamberlain’s amendment to covering clause 5 was agreed to.

In covering clause 6, the reference to the Colonial Laws Validity Act was omitted, as was also the definition “Colony shall mean any colony or province.” Covering clause 9 was restored to its original form, the Constitution being thus appended to the clause, instead of forming a Schedule to the Act.

In the Constitution itself, the original last paragraph of clause 73 was restored to its position, instead of standing as clause 74, and the new clause 74 was inserted according to arrangement. In the Preamble, the words "and under the Constitution hereby established" were restored. The Bill was then reported with amendments.

THE BILL IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—In the House of Lords, the Bill was read a first time on 26th June. The second reading was moved on 29th June by the Earl of Selborne, Under-Secretary for the Colonies. Earl Carrington accused Mr. Chamberlain of imprudence which had imperilled the Bill, and characterized his settlement as an unconditional surrender. The Earl of Halsbury, Lord Chancellor, deprecated this as a partizan attack which would mar the harmony and unanimity of the Empire's acceptance of the Bill. Lord Davey thought the appeal clause was not a happy solution of the difficulty, and hoped that the colonies would hereafter modify it. The Earl of Jersey, the Earl of Kimberley, Lord James of Hereford, Lord Russell of Killowen, Viscount Knutsford, and Lord Brassey, spoke in terms of congratulation. The Bill was read a second time and taken into committee pro forma. On 3rd July, it was carried through Committee without amendment, and on 5th July it was read a third time and passed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.—On 9th July, the Queen gave her assent to the Bill. At the request of the Delegates, Her Majesty signed the Commission, declaring her assent to the Bill, in duplicate, and gave Mr. Barton one of the copies, as well as the pen, inkstand, and table used by Her Majesty, to be preserved in the Federal Parliament Buildings. On the same day, in the House of Lords, the House of Commons having been summoned to the bar, the Lords Commissioners (the Earl of Halsbury, the Earl of Hopetoun, and the Earl of Kintore), announced the Royal assent to the Bill, which was received with cheers.

ADOPTION BY WESTERN AUSTRALIA.—On 17th May—three days after the introduction of the Commonwealth Bill in the House of Commons—the West Australian Parliament met, and an Enabling Bill was at once introduced. It was on the lines of the Enabling Acts passed in the other colonies, and provided for the submission of the Constitution to a referendum of the people of the colony, and for an address to the Queen in the event of the vote being in the affirmative.

On 23rd May Sir John Forrest moved the second reading, and announced that he would vote for Federation, though he did not see that it would be any great benefit to Western Australia for some time. The Bill as introduced provided for a referendum on the existing rolls; but during the debate the Government consented to have it taken in accordance with the newly extended franchise of the colony (see p. 71 supra), so that all adults—men and women—who had been twelve months in the colony should be entitled to vote.

The second reading was carried without a division on 31st May. In the Council slight amendments were made, which were accepted by the Assembly. On 13th June the Bill was assented to.

The referendum was fixed for 31st July, and the campaign for and against the Constitution began at once. Sir John Forrest fought hard for the Bill, though some of his colleagues opposed it. The logical and sentimental argument for the completion of the continental union was made the most of. The ultimate entry of Western Australia into the Commonwealth was recognized as inevitable; and it was forcibly urged that even if the immediate benefits of Federation to Western Australia were not obvious, her interests would be better secured by joining the union at the outset, and helping to mould the federal policy, than by standing aloof. The strongest argument of the opponents was that a federal tariff with intercolonial freetrade would dislocate the finances of the colony, and that section 95, allowing Western Australia to retain intercolonial duties on a diminishing scale for five years, was inadequate to meet the difficulty. This argument was assisted by appeals to intercolonial jealousy and by vague allusion to the terrors of the unknown. The stronghold of the federal party was on the goldfields, where the population was largely recruited from the other colonies; whilst the most solid opposition came from the agricultural interests, which dreaded the removal of the duties on intercolonial produce.

Though federalists were confident of victory, the decisive issue was a surprise. The result of the poll was a vote of 44,800 for the Constitution, and 19,691 against, leaving an affirmative majority of 25,109. An analysis of the voting gives the following result:—

—	Yes.	No.	Majority.
Metropolitan Electorates	7,008	4,380	2,628
Fremantle Electorates	4,687	3,141	1,546
Goldfields Electorates	26,330	1,813	24,517
Country Electorates	6,775	10,357	(Min. 3,582)
Total	44,800	19,691	25,109

On 21st August, both Houses of the Parliament of Western Australia passed addresses to the Queen, praying that Western Australia might be included as an Original State of the Commonwealth in the Proclamation shortly to be made.

THE ROYAL PROCLAMATION.—The issue of the Queen's Proclamation fixing the day for the establishment of the Commonwealth had been withheld pending the issue of the referendum in Western Australia, in order to enable her Majesty to be "satisfied that the people of Western Australia have agreed" to join the Commonwealth. Meanwhile some telegraphic communications passed between the Imperial and Colonial Governments as to the date on which the Commonwealth should be established. The prevailing opinion was in favour of the 1st January, 1901, the first day of the twentieth century—a dramatic and significant date for the birth of Australian nationhood. The sentimental argument was reinforced by the practical one that the 1st January was the beginning of a financial half-year in all the colonies. On the other hand there was some advocacy of the 26th January—the anniversary of the foundation of New South Wales in 1788—which was celebrated in several of the colonies as the patriotic festival of the year. The date chosen was the 1st January; accordingly, on 17th September, 1900, the Queen signed the Proclamation declaring that on and after the first day of January, 1901, the people of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and Western Australia should be united in a Federal Commonwealth under the name of the Commonwealth of Australia.

Thus all the five colonies of the mainland of Australia, and also the adjacent island of Tasmania, become Original States of the Commonwealth which is to be inaugurated on the first day of the twentieth century. The Commonwealth, as few dared to hope it would, comes into existence complete from the first—"a nation for a continent, and a continent for a nation." The delays at which federalists have chafed have been tedious, and perhaps dangerous, but they have been providential; they have given time for the gradual but sure development of the national spirit in the great colonies of Queensland and Western Australia, and have prevented the establishment of a Commonwealth of Australia with half the continent of Australia left, for a time, outside.

But though Australian union has been completed, Australasian union has not. New Zealand—separated from Australia by 1,200 miles of sea, and correspondingly more self-contained and less in touch with the national sentiment of Australia—has not yet decided to enter the Commonwealth. The choice between union or isolation, which has not yet been directly presented to the people of New Zealand, cannot long be deferred. On 19th October, 1900, a resolution was passed by the New Zealand House of Representatives, on Mr. Seddon's motion, declaring it to be desirable (a) That a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into and report upon the desirability or otherwise of New Zealand becoming a State of the Commonwealth: (b) that if the Commissioners deem Federation for the present inadvisable or premature, they should report as to the establishment of a reciprocal treaty between the Commonwealth and New Zealand, and indicate the lines on which it should be based: (c) that the Commissioners entrusted with this all-important matter, affecting the national life and well-being of New Zealand, should be conversant with the agricultural, commercial, and industrial interests of the colony, and be otherwise eminently fitted for their high office: (d) that they should be empowered to proceed to Australia to take evidence: and (e) that their report should be presented to the New Zealand Parliament within ten days of the opening of the next session.

The report of this Commission will be awaited with interest. Meanwhile Mr. Seddon's "Greater New Zealand" policy (see p. 639, infra) indicates that he is endeavouring to secure as advantageous a position as possible for a commercial treaty with the Commonwealth, in the event of a decision adverse to immediate union.

APPOINTMENT OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.—On 14th July it was officially announced that the first Governor-General of the Commonwealth of Australia would be the Right Honourable the Earl of Hopetoun, G.C.M.G., then Lord Chamberlain. Lord Hopetoun was already well known in Australia, having been Governor of Victoria from 1889 to 1895, during which time he had been one of the most popular, although one of the youngest, of Australian Governors, and had earned the reputation of a tactful and capable administrator, and a worthy representative of the Crown. His choice as the first holder of the high and honourable office of Governor-General of the Commonwealth gave general satisfaction.

The actual appointment of the Governor-General could not, in accordance with clause 3 of the Commonwealth Act, be made until after the issue of the Queen's Proclamation which fixed the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth. On 21st September Lord Hopetoun waited upon the Queen at Balmoral Castle, when Her Majesty invested him with the knighthood of the Order of the Thistle. He delivered into Her Majesty's hands the wand and badge of the Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty's Household, and received the commission of his appointment as Governor-General.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE INAUGURATION.—Shortly after the Royal Proclamation, it was announced that the inauguration of the Commonwealth, on the 1st January, 1901, would take place in Sydney. The Parliaments of the six colonies began to legislate, under the authority of clause 4 of the Commonwealth Act, and secs. 9 and 29 of the Constitution, for prescribing the method of choosing senators, determining the times and places of elections of senators, and determining the electoral divisions for the House of Representatives; with such other local legislation as was deemed advisable in view of the approaching change in the political condition of the colonies.

On 17th September, it was officially announced that the Queen, on the recommendation of Lord Salisbury, had assented to a visit by the Duke and Duchess of York to Australia, early in the year 1901, when the Duke of York would be commissioned by Her Majesty to open the first session of the Parliament of the Commonwealth in her name. Although Her Majesty naturally shrank from parting from her grandson for so long a period, she fully recognized the greatness of the occasion which would bring her colonies of Australia into federal union, and desired to give this special proof of her interest in all that concerned the welfare of her Australian subjects. Her Majesty wished at the same time to signify her sense of the loyalty and devotion which had prompted the spontaneous aid so liberally offered by all the colonies in the South African War, and of the splendid gallantry of her colonial troops.

CONCLUSION.—During the past century the foundations of Australian nationhood have been laid; with the new century will begin the task of building the superstructure. Political barriers have been broken down, and the constitutional compact which, politically speaking, creates the Australian people, has been framed, accepted, and established. But all this is only the beginning. The new national institutions of Australia have to be tested in the fire of experience; provincial jealousies have to be obliterated; national sentiment has to be consolidated; the fields of national legislation and national administration have to be occupied. Australian statesmanship and patriotism, which have proved equal to the task of constructing the Constitution, and of creating a new nation within the Empire, are now face to face with the greater and more responsible task of welding into a harmonious whole the elements of national unity, and of guiding the Australian people to their destiny—a destiny which, it may be hoped, will always be linked with that of the mighty Empire of which they form a part.

CONSTITUTION ACT.

63 & 64 VICT.

CHAPTER 12.

An Act to constitute the Commonwealth of Australia.

[9th July 1900.]

WHEREAS the people of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania, humbly relying on the blessing of Almighty God, have agreed to unite in one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and under the Constitution hereby established :

And whereas it is expedient to provide for the admission into the Commonwealth of other Australasian Colonies and possessions of the Queen :

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows :—

1. This Act may be cited as The Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act.
2. The provisions of this Act referring to the Queen shall extend to Her Majesty's heirs and successors in the sovereignty of the United Kingdom.
3. It shall be lawful for the Queen, with the advice of the Privy Council, to declare by proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being later than one year after the passing of this Act, the people of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania, and also, if Her Majesty is satisfied that the people of Western Australia have agreed thereto, of Western Australia, shall be united in a Federal Commonwealth under the name of the Commonwealth of Australia. But the Queen may, at any time after the proclamation, appoint a Governor-General for the Commonwealth.
4. The Commonwealth shall be established, and the Constitution of the Commonwealth shall take effect, on and after the day so appointed. But the Parliaments of the several colonies may at any time after the passing of this Act make any such laws, to come into operation on the day so appointed, as they might have made if the Constitution had taken effect at the passing of this Act.
5. This Act, and all laws made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth under the Constitution, shall be binding on the courts, judges, and people of every State and of every part of the Commonwealth, notwithstanding anything in the laws of any State; and the laws of the Commonwealth shall be in force on all British ships, the Queen's ships of war excepted, whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the Commonwealth.
6. "The Commonwealth" shall mean the Commonwealth of Australia as established under this Act.

"The States" shall mean such of the colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, Western Australia, and South Australia, including the northern territory of South Australia, as for the time being are parts of the Commonwealth, and such colonies or territories as may be admitted into or established by the Commonwealth as States; and each of such parts of the Commonwealth shall be called "a State."

7. The Federal Council of Australasia Act, 1885, is hereby repealed, but so as not to affect any laws passed by the Federal Council of Australasia and in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Repeal of Federal Council Act, 48 and 49 Vict. c. 60.

Any such law may be repealed as to any State by the Parliament of the Commonwealth, or as to any colony not being a State by the Parliament thereof.

8. After the passing of this Act the Colonial Boundaries Act, 1895, shall not apply to any colony which becomes a State of the Commonwealth; but the Commonwealth shall be taken to be a self-governing colony for the purposes of that Act.

Application of Colonial Boundaries Act, 58 and 59 Vict. c. 34. Constitution.

9. The Constitution of the Commonwealth shall be as follows:—

THE CONSTITUTION.

This Constitution is divided as follows:—

- CHAPTER I.—THE PARLIAMENT:
 - PART I.—General:
 - PART II.—The Senate:
 - PART III.—The House of Representatives:
 - PART IV.—Both Houses of the Parliament:
 - PART V.—Powers of the Parliament:
- CHAPTER II.—THE EXECUTIVE GOVERNMENT:
- CHAPTER III.—THE JUDICATURE:
- CHAPTER IV.—FINANCE AND TRADE:
- CHAPTER V.—THE STATES:
- CHAPTER VI.—NEW STATES:
- CHAPTER VII.—MISCELLANEOUS:
- CHAPTER VIII.—ALTERATION OF THE CONSTITUTION
- THE SCHEDULE.

CHAPTER I.

The Parliament.

PART I.—GENERAL.

CHAP. I.
THE PARLIAM
PART I.
GENERAL.

1. The legislative power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament, which shall consist of the Queen, a Senate, and a House of Representatives, and which is herein-after called “The Parliament,” or “The Parliament of the Commonwealth.”

Legislative power.

2. A Governor-General appointed by the Queen shall be Her Majesty’s representative in the Commonwealth, and shall have and may exercise in the Commonwealth during the Queen’s pleasure, but subject to this Constitution, such powers and functions of the Queen as Her Majesty may be pleased to assign to him.

Governor-General.

3. There shall be payable to the Queen out of the Consolidated Revenue fund of the Commonwealth, for the salary of the Governor-General, an annual sum which, until the Parliament otherwise provides, shall be ten thousand pounds.

Salary of Governor-General.

The salary of a Governor-General shall not be altered during his continuance in office.

4. The provisions of this Constitution relating to the Governor-General extend and apply to the Governor-General for the time being, or such person as the Queen may appoint to administer the Government of the Commonwealth; but no such person shall be entitled to receive any salary from the Commonwealth in respect of any other office during his administration of the Government of the Commonwealth.

Provisions relating to Governor-General.

5. The Governor-General may appoint such times for holding the sessions of the Parliament as he thinks fit, and may also from time to time, by Proclamation or otherwise, prorogue the Parliament, and may in like manner dissolve the House of Representatives.

Sessions of Parliament. Prorogation and dissolution.

A.D. 1900.

Summoning Parliament. After any general election the Parliament shall be summoned to meet not later than thirty days after the day appointed for the return of the writs.

First session. The Parliament shall be summoned to meet not later than six months after the establishment of the Commonwealth

Yearly session of Parliament. 6. There shall be a session of the Parliament once at least in every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Parliament in one session and its first sitting in the next session.

PART II.

THE SENATE.

PART II.—THE SENATE.

The Senate. 7. The Senate shall be composed of senators for each State, directly chosen by the people of the State, voting, until the Parliament otherwise provides, as one electorate.

But until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the Parliament of the State of Queensland, if that State be an Original State, may make laws dividing the State into divisions and determining the number of senators to be chosen for each division, and in the absence of such provision the State shall be one electorate.

Until the Parliament otherwise provides there shall be six senators for each Original State. The Parliament may make laws increasing or diminishing the number of senators for each State, but so that equal representation of the several Original States shall be maintained and that no Original State shall have less than six senators.

The senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the senators chosen for each State shall be certified by the Governor to the Governor-General.

Qualification of electors. 8. The qualification of electors of senators shall be in each State that which is prescribed by this Constitution, or by the Parliament, as the qualification for electors of members of the House of Representatives; but in the choosing of senators each elector shall vote only once.

Method of election of senators. 9. The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws prescribing the method of choosing senators, but so that the method shall be uniform for all the States. Subject to any such law, the Parliament of each State may make laws prescribing the method of choosing the senators for that State.

Times and places. The Parliament of a State may make laws for determining the times and places of elections of senators for the State.

Application of State laws. 10. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, but subject to this Constitution, the laws in force in each State, for the time being, relating to elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections of Senators for the State.

Failure to choose senators. 11. The Senate may proceed to the despatch of business, notwithstanding the failure of any State to provide for its representation in the Senate.

Issue of writs. 12. The Governor of any State may cause writs to be issued for elections of senators for the State. In case of the dissolution of the Senate the writs shall be issued within ten days from the proclamation of such dissolution.

Rotation of senators. 13. As soon as may be after the Senate first meets, and after each first meeting of the Senate following a dissolution thereof, the Senate shall divide the senators chosen for each State into two classes, as nearly equal in number as practicable; and the places of the senators of the first class shall become vacant at the expiration of the third year, and the places of those of the second class at the expiration of the sixth year, from the beginning of their term of service; and afterwards the places of senators shall become vacant at the expiration of six years from the beginning of their term of service.

The election to fill vacant places shall be made in the year at the expiration of which the places are to become vacant.

For the purposes of this section the term of service of a senator shall be taken to begin on the first day of January following the day of his election, except in the cases of the first election and of the election next after any dissolution of the Senate, when it shall be taken to begin on the first day of January preceding the day of his election.

Further provision for rotation. 14. Whenever the number of senators for a State is increased or diminished, the Parliament of the Commonwealth may make such provision for the vacating of the places of senators for the State as it deems necessary to maintain regularity in the rotation.

Casual vacancies. 15. If the place of a senator becomes vacant before the expiration of his term of service, the Houses of Parliament of the State for which he was chosen shall, sitting and voting together, choose a person to hold the place until the expiration of the term, or until the election of a successor as hereinafter provided, whichever first happens.

But if the Houses of Parliament of the State are not in session at the time when the vacancy is notified, the Governor of the State, with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, may appoint a person to hold the place until the expiration of fourteen days after the beginning of the next session of the Parliament of the State, or until the election of a successor, whichever first happens.

At the next general election of members of the House of Representatives, or at the next election of senators for the State, whichever first happens, a successor shall, if the term has not then expired, be chosen to hold the place from the date of his election until the expiration of the term.

The name of any senator so chosen or appointed shall be certified by the Governor of the State to the Governor-General.

16. The qualifications of a senator shall be the same as those of a member of the House of Representatives. Qualifications of senator.

17. The Senate shall, before proceeding to the despatch of any other business, choose a senator to be the President of the Senate; and as often as the office of President becomes vacant the Senate shall again choose a senator to be the President. Election of President.

The President shall cease to hold his office if he ceases to be a senator. He may be removed from office by a vote of the Senate, or he may resign his office or his seat by writing addressed to the Governor-General.

18. Before or during any absence of the President, the Senate may choose a senator to perform his duties in his absence. Absence of President.

19. A senator may, by writing addressed to the President, or to the Governor-General if there is no President or if the President is absent from the Commonwealth, resign his place, which thereupon shall become vacant. Resignation of senator.

20. The place of a senator shall become vacant if for two consecutive months of any session of the Parliament he, without the permission of the Senate, fails to attend the Senate. Vacancy by absence.

21. Whenever a vacancy happens in the Senate, the President, or if there is no President or if the President is absent from the Commonwealth the Governor-General, shall notify the same to the Governor of the State in the representation of which the vacancy has happened. Vacancy to be notified.

22. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the presence of at least one-third of the whole number of the senators shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers. Quorum.

23. Questions arising in the Senate shall be determined by a majority of votes, and each senator shall have one vote. The President shall in all cases be entitled to a vote; and when the votes are equal the question shall pass in the negative. Voting in Senate.

PART III.—THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

PART III. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

24. The House of Representatives shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the Commonwealth, and the number of such members shall be, as nearly as practicable, twice the number of the senators. Constitution of House of Representatives.

The number of members chosen in the several States shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people, and shall, until the Parliament otherwise provides, be determined, whenever necessary, in the following manner:—

(i.) A quota shall be ascertained by dividing the number of the people of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by twice the number of the senators:

(ii.) The number of members to be chosen in each State shall be determined by dividing the number of the people of the State, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by the quota: and if on such division there is a remainder greater than one-half of the quota, one more member shall be chosen in the State.

But notwithstanding anything in this section, five members at least shall be chosen in each Original State.

25. For the purposes of the last section, if by the law of any State all persons of any race are disqualified from voting at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, then, in reckoning the number of the people of the State or of the Commonwealth, persons of that race resident in that State shall not be counted. Provision as to races disqualified from voting.

A.D. 1900.

Representatives in first Parliament.

26. Notwithstanding anything in section twenty-four, the number of members to be chosen in each State at the first election shall be as follows:—

New South Wales	twenty-three;
Victoria	twenty;
Queensland	eight;
South Australia	six;
Tasmania	five;

Provided that if Western Australia is an Original State, the numbers shall be as follows:—

New South Wales	twenty-six;
Victoria	twenty-three;
Queensland	nine;
South Australia	seven;
Western Australia	five;
Tasmania	five.

Alteration of number of members.
Duration of House of Representatives.

27. Subject to this Constitution, the Parliament may make laws for increasing or diminishing the number of the members of the House of Representatives.

28. Every House of Representatives shall continue for three years from the first meeting of the House, and no longer, but may be sooner dissolved by the Governor-General.

divisions.

29. Until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the Parliament of any State may make laws for determining the divisions in each State for which members of the House of Representatives may be chosen, and the number of members to be chosen for each division. A division shall not be formed out of parts of different States.

In the absence of other provision, each State shall be one electorate.

electors.

30. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each State that which is prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification of electors of the more numerous House of Parliament of the State; but in the choosing of members each elector shall vote only once.

Application of State laws.

31. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, but subject to this Constitution, the laws in force in each State for the time being relating to elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the State of members of the House of Representatives.

Writs for general

32. The Governor-General in Council may cause writs to be issued for general elections of members of the House of Representatives.

After the first general election, the writs shall be issued within ten days from the expiry of a House of Representatives or from the proclamation of a dissolution thereof.

Writs for vacancies.

33. Whenever a vacancy happens in the House of Representatives, the Speaker shall issue his writ for the election of a new member, or if there is no Speaker or if he is absent from the Commonwealth the Governor-General in Council may issue the writ.

Qualifications of members.

34. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the qualifications of a member of the House of Representatives shall be as follows:—

(i.) He must be of the full age of twenty-one years, and must be an elector entitled to vote at the election of members of the House of Representatives, or a person qualified to become such elector, and must have been for three years at the least a resident within the limits of the Commonwealth as existing at the time when he is chosen:

(ii.) He must be a subject of the Queen, either natural-born or for at least five years naturalized under a law of the United Kingdom, or of a Colony which has become or becomes a State, or of the Commonwealth, or of a State.

Election of Speaker.

35. The House of Representatives shall, before proceeding to the despatch of any other business, choose a member to be the Speaker of the House, and as often as the office of Speaker becomes vacant the House shall again choose a member to be the Speaker.

The Speaker shall cease to hold his office if he ceases to be a member. He may be removed from office by a vote of the House, or he may resign his office or his seat by writing addressed to the Governor-General.

35. Before or during any absence of the Speaker, the House of Representatives may choose a member to perform his duties in his absence. Absence of Speaker.
37. A member may by writing addressed to the Speaker, or to the Governor-General if there is no Speaker or if the Speaker is absent from the Commonwealth, resign his place, which thereupon shall become vacant. Resignation of member.
38. The place of a member shall become vacant if for two consecutive months of any session of the Parliament he, without the permission of the House, fails to attend the House. Vacancy by absence.
39. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the presence of at least one-third of the whole number of the members of the House of Representatives shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the House for the exercise of its powers. Quorum.
40. Questions arising in the House of Representatives shall be determined by a majority of votes other than that of the Speaker. The Speaker shall not vote unless the numbers are equal, and then he shall have a casting vote. Voting in House of Representatives.

PART IV.—BOTH HOUSES OF THE PARLIAMENT.

PART IV.
BOTH HOUSES OF
THE PARLIAMENT.

41. No adult person who has or acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of a State shall, while the right continues, be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from voting at elections for either House of the Parliament of the Commonwealth. Right of electors of States.
42. Every senator and every member of the House of Representatives shall before taking his seat make and subscribe before the Governor-General, or some person authorised by him, an oath or affirmation of allegiance in the form set forth in the schedule to this Constitution. Oath or affirmation of allegiance.
43. A member of either House of the Parliament shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of the other House. Member of one House ineligible for other.
44. Any person who— Disqualification.
- (i.) Is under any acknowledgment of allegiance, obedience, or adherence to a foreign power, or is a subject or a citizen or entitled to the rights or privileges of a subject or a citizen of a foreign power : or
 - (ii.) Is attainted of treason, or has been convicted and is under sentence, or subject to be sentenced, for any offence punishable under the law of the Commonwealth or of a State by imprisonment for one year or longer : or
 - (iii.) Is an undischarged bankrupt or insolvent : or
 - (iv.) Holds any office of profit under the Crown, or any pension payable during the pleasure of the Crown out of any of the revenues of the Commonwealth : or
 - (v.) Has any direct or indirect pecuniary interest in any agreement with the Public Service of the Commonwealth otherwise than as a member and in common with the other members of an incorporated company consisting of more than twenty-five persons :
- shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a senator or a member of the House of Representatives.

But sub-section iv. does not apply to the office of any of the Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth, or of any of the Queen's Ministers for a State, or to the receipt of pay, half pay, or a pension by any person as an officer or member of the Queen's navy or army, or to the receipt of pay as an officer or member of the naval or military forces of the Commonwealth by any person whose services are not wholly employed by the Commonwealth.

45. If a senator or member of the House of Representatives— Vacancy on happening of disqualification
- (i.) Becomes subject to any of the disabilities mentioned in the last preceding section : or
 - (ii.) Takes the benefit, whether by assignment, composition, or otherwise, of any law relating to bankrupt or insolvent debtors : or
 - (iii.) Directly or indirectly takes or agrees to take any fee or honorarium for services rendered to the Commonwealth, or for services rendered in the Parliament to any person or State :
- his place shall thereupon become vacant.

A.D. 1900.

Penalty for sitting when disqualified.

46. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, any person declared by this Constitution to be incapable of sitting as a senator or as a member of the House of Representatives shall, for every day on which he so sits, be liable to pay the sum of one hundred pounds to any person who sues for it in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Disputed elections.

47. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, any question respecting the qualification of a senator or of a member of the House of Representatives, or respecting a vacancy in either House of the Parliament, and any question of a disputed election to either House, shall be determined by the House in which the question arises.

Allowance to members.

48. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, each senator and each member of the House of Representatives shall receive an allowance of four hundred pounds a year, to be reckoned from the day on which he takes his seat.

Privileges, &c. of Houses.

49. The powers, privileges, and immunities of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and of the members and the committees of each House, shall be such as are declared by the Parliament, and until declared shall be those of the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom, and of its members and committees, at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Rules and orders.

50. Each House of the Parliament may make rules and orders with respect to—

- (i.) The mode in which its powers, privileges, and immunities may be exercised and upheld :
- (ii.) The order and conduct of its business and proceedings either separately or jointly with the other House.

PART V.
POWERS OF THE PARLIAMENT.

PART V.—POWERS OF THE PARLIAMENT.

Legislative powers of the Parliament.

51. The Parliament shall, subject to this Constitution, have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth, with respect to :—

- (i.) Trade and commerce with other countries, and among the States :
- (ii.) Taxation ; but so as not to discriminate between States or parts of States :
- (iii.) Bounties on the production or export of goods, but so that such bounties shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth :
- (iv.) Borrowing money on the public credit of the Commonwealth :
- (v.) Postal, telegraphic, telephonic, and other like services :
- (vi.) The naval and military defence of the Commonwealth and of the several States, and the control of the forces to execute and maintain the laws of the Commonwealth :
- (vii.) Lighthouses, lightships, beacons and buoys :
- (viii.) Astronomical and meteorological observations :
- (ix.) Quarantine :
- (x.) Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits :
- (xi.) Census and statistics :
- (xii.) Currency, coinage, and legal tender :
- (xiii.) Banking, other than State banking ; also State banking extending beyond the limits of the State concerned, the incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money :
- (xiv.) Insurance, other than State insurance ; also State insurance extending beyond the limits of the State concerned :
- (xv.) Weights and measures :
- (xvi.) Bills of exchange and promissory notes :
- (xvii.) Bankruptcy and insolvency :
- (xviii.) Copyrights, patents of inventions and designs, and trade marks :
- (xix.) Naturalization and aliens :
- (xx.) Foreign corporations, and trading or financial corporations formed within the limits of the Commonwealth :

- (xxi.) Marriage :
- (xxii.) Divorce and matrimonial causes ; and in relation thereto, parental rights, and the custody and guardianship of infants :
- (xxiii.) Invalid and old-age pensions :
- (xxiv.) The service and execution throughout the Commonwealth of the civil and criminal process and the judgments of the courts of the States :
- (xxv.) The recognition throughout the Commonwealth of the laws, the public Acts and records, and the judicial proceedings of the States :
- (xxvi.) The people of any race, other than the aboriginal race in any State, for whom it is deemed necessary to make special laws :
- (xxvii.) Immigration and emigration :
- (xxviii.) The influx of criminals :
- (xxix.) External affairs :
- (xxx.) The relations of the Commonwealth with the islands of the Pacific :
- (xxxi.) The acquisition of property on just terms from any State or person for any purpose in respect of which the Parliament has power to make laws :
- (xxxii.) The control of railways with respect to transport for the naval and military purposes of the Commonwealth :
- (xxxiii.) The acquisition, with the consent of a State, of any railways of the State on terms arranged between the Commonwealth and the State :
- (xxxiv.) Railway construction and extension in any State with the consent of that State :
- (xxxv.) Conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes extending beyond the limits of any one State :
- (xxxvi.) Matters in respect of which this Constitution makes provision until the Parliament otherwise provides :
- (xxxvii.) Matters referred to the Parliament of the Commonwealth by the Parliament or Parliaments of any State or States, but so that the law shall extend only to States by whose Parliaments the matter is referred, or which afterwards adopt the law :
- (xxxviii.) The exercise within the Commonwealth, at the request or with the concurrence of the Parliaments of all the States directly concerned, of any power which can at the establishment of this Constitution be exercised only by the Parliament of the United Kingdom or by the Federal Council of Australasia :
- (xxxix.) Matters incidental to the execution of any power vested by this Constitution in the Parliament or in either House thereof, or in the Government of the Commonwealth, or in the Federal Judicature, or in any department or officer of the Commonwealth.

52. The Parliament shall, subject to this Constitution, have exclusive power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to— Exclusive powers of the Parliament

- (i.) The seat of government of the Commonwealth, and all places acquired by the Commonwealth for public purposes :
- (ii.) Matters relating to any department of the public service the control of which is by this Constitution transferred to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth :
- (iii.) Other matters declared by this Constitution to be within the exclusive power of the Parliament.

53. Proposed laws appropriating revenue or moneys, or imposing taxation, shall not originate in the Senate. But a proposed law shall not be taken to appropriate revenue or moneys, or to impose taxation, by reason only of its containing provisions for the imposition or appropriation of fines or other pecuniary penalties, or for the demand or payment or appropriation of fees for licences, or fees for services under the proposed law. Powers of the Houses in respect of legislation.

The Senate may not amend proposed laws imposing taxation, or proposed laws appropriating revenue or moneys for the ordinary annual services of the Government.

The Senate may not amend any proposed law so as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people.

The Senate may at any stage return to the House of Representatives any proposed law which the Senate may not amend, requesting, by message, the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein. And the House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make any of such omissions or amendments, with or without modifications.

Except as provided in this section, the Senate shall have equal power with the House of Representatives in respect of all proposed laws.

54. The proposed law which appropriates revenue or moneys for the ordinary annual services of the Government shall deal only with such appropriation.

55. Laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxation, and any provision therein dealing with any other matter shall be of no effect.

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs or of excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only; but laws imposing duties of customs shall deal with duties of customs only, and laws imposing duties of excise shall deal with duties of excise only.

56. A vote, resolution, or proposed law for the appropriation of revenue or moneys shall not be passed unless the purpose of the appropriation has in the same session been recommended by message of the Governor-General to the House in which the proposal originated.

57. If the House of Representatives passes any proposed law, and the Senate rejects or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree, and if after an interval of three months the House of Representatives, in the same or the next session, again passes the proposed law with or without any amendments which have been made, suggested, or agreed to by the Senate, and the Senate rejects or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree, the Governor-General may dissolve the Senate and the House of Representatives simultaneously. But such dissolution shall not take place within six months before the date of the expiry of the House of Representatives by effluxion of time.

If after such dissolution the House of Representatives again passes the proposed law, with or without any amendments which have been made, suggested, or agreed to by the Senate, and the Senate rejects or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree, the Governor-General may convene a joint sitting of the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

The members present at the joint sitting may deliberate and shall vote together upon the proposed law as last proposed by the House of Representatives, and upon amendments, if any, which have been made therein by one House and not agreed to by the other, and any such amendments which are affirmed by an absolute majority of the total number of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be taken to have been carried, and if the proposed law, with the amendments, if any, so carried is affirmed by an absolute majority of the total number of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, it shall be taken to have been duly passed by both Houses of the Parliament, and shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

58. When a proposed law passed by both Houses of the Parliament is presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent, he shall declare, according to his discretion, but subject to this Constitution, that he assents in the Queen's name, or that he withholds assent, or that he reserves the law for the Queen's pleasure.

The Governor-General may return to the House in which it originated any proposed law so presented to him, and may transmit therewith any amendments which he may recommend, and the Houses may deal with the recommendation.

59. The Queen may disallow any law within one year from the Governor-General's assent, and such disallowance on being made known by the Governor-General by speech or message to each of the Houses of the Parliament, or by Proclamation, shall annul the law from the day when the disallowance is so made known.

60. A proposed law reserved for the Queen's pleasure shall not have any force unless and until within two years from the day on which it was presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent the Governor-General makes known, by speech or message to each of the Houses of the Parliament, or by Proclamation, that it has received the Queen's assent.

Appropriation Bills.

Tax Bills.

Recommendation of money votes.

Disagreement between the Houses.

Royal assent to Bills.

Recommendations by Governor-General.

Disallowance by the Queen.

Signification of Queen's pleasure on Bills reserved.

CHAPTER II.

The Executive Government.

CHAP. II.
GOVERNMENT.

61. The executive power of the Commonwealth is vested in the Queen and is exercisable by the Governor-General as the Queen's representative, and extends to the execution and maintenance of this Constitution, and of the laws of the Commonwealth.

Executive power.

62. There shall be a Federal Executive Council to advise the Governor-General in the government of the Commonwealth, and the members of the Council shall be chosen and summoned by the Governor-General and sworn as Executive Councillors, and shall hold office during his pleasure.

Federal Executive Council.

63. The provisions of this Constitution referring to the Governor-General in Council shall be construed as referring to the Governor-General acting with the advice of the Federal Executive Council.

Provisions referring to Governor-General.

64. The Governor-General may appoint officers to administer such departments of State of the Commonwealth as the Governor-General in Council may establish.

Ministers of State.

Such officers shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor-General. They shall be members of the Federal Executive Council, and shall be the Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth.

After the first general election no Minister of State shall hold office for a longer period than three months unless he is or becomes a senator or a member of the House of Representatives.

Ministers to sit in Parliament

65. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the Ministers of State shall not exceed seven in number, and shall hold such offices as the Parliament prescribes, or, in the absence of provision, as the Governor-General directs.

Number of Ministers.

66. There shall be payable to the Queen, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the Commonwealth, for the salaries of the Ministers of State, an annual sum which, until the Parliament otherwise provides, shall not exceed twelve thousand pounds a year.

Salaries of Ministers.

67. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the appointment and removal of all other officers of the Executive Government of the Commonwealth shall be vested in the Governor-General in Council, unless the appointment is delegated by the Governor-General in Council or by a law of the Commonwealth to some other authority.

Appointment of civil servants.

68. The command in chief of the naval and military forces of the Commonwealth is vested in the Governor-General as the Queen's representative.

Command of naval and military forces.

69. On a date or dates to be proclaimed by the Governor-General after the establishment of the Commonwealth the following departments of the public service in each State shall become transferred to the Commonwealth:—

Transfer of certain departments.

- Posts, telegraphs, and telephones :
- Naval and military defence :
- Lighthouses, lightships, beacons, and buoys :
- Quarantine.

But the departments of customs and of excise in each State shall become transferred to the Commonwealth on its establishment.

70. In respect of matters which, under this Constitution, pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, all powers and functions which at the establishment of the Commonwealth are vested in the Governor of a Colony, or in the Governor of a Colony with the advice of his Executive Council, or in any authority of a Colony, shall vest in the Governor-General, or in the Governor-General in Council, or in the authority exercising similar powers under the Commonwealth, as the case requires.

Certain powers of Governors to vest in Governor General.

A. D. 1900.

CHAPTER III.The Judicature.

CHAP. III.

THE JUDICATURE.

Judicial power and Courts.

71. The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, and in such other federal courts as the Parliament creates, and in such other courts as it invests with federal jurisdiction. The High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice, and so many other Justices, not less than two, as the Parliament prescribes.

Judges' appointment, tenure, and remuneration.

72. The Justices of the High Court and of the other courts created by the Parliament—

- (i.) Shall be appointed by the Governor-General in Council :
- (ii.) Shall not be removed except by the Governor-General in Council, on an address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same session, praying for such removal on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity :
- (iii.) Shall receive such remuneration as the Parliament may fix ; but the remuneration shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Appellate jurisdiction of High Court.

73. The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament prescribes, to hear and determine appeals from all judgments, decrees, orders, and sentences—

- (i.) Of any Justice or Justices exercising the original jurisdiction of the High Court :
- (ii.) Of any other federal court, or court exercising federal jurisdiction ; or of the Supreme Court of any State, or of any other court of any State from which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lies to the Queen in Council :
- (iii.) Of the Inter-State Commission, but as to questions of law only :

and the judgment of the High Court in all such cases shall be final and conclusive.

But no exception or regulation prescribed by the Parliament shall prevent the High Court from hearing and determining any appeal from the Supreme Court of a State in any matter in which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lies from such Supreme Court to the Queen in Council.

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the conditions of and restrictions on appeals to the Queen in Council from the Supreme Courts of the several States shall be applicable to appeals from them to the High Court.

Appeal to
Council.

74. No appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council from a decision of the High Court upon any question, howsoever arising, as to the limits inter se of the Constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and those of any State or States, or as to the limits inter se of the Constitutional powers of any two or more States, unless the High Court shall certify that the question is one which ought to be determined by Her Majesty in Council.

The High Court may so certify if satisfied that for any special reason the certificate should be granted, and thereupon an appeal shall lie to Her Majesty in Council on the question without further leave.

Except as provided in this section, this Constitution shall not impair any right which the Queen may be pleased to exercise by virtue of Her Royal prerogative to grant special leave of appeal from the High Court to Her Majesty in Council. The Parliament may make laws limiting the matters in which such leave may be asked, but proposed laws containing any such limitation shall be reserved by the Governor-General for Her Majesty's pleasure.

Original jurisdiction of High Court.

75. In all matters—

- (i.) Arising under any treaty :
- (ii.) Affecting consuls or other representatives of other countries :
- (iii.) In which the Commonwealth, or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth, is a party :
- (iv.) Between States, or between residents of different States, or between a State and a resident of another State :
- (v.) In which a writ of Mandamus or prohibition or an injunction is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth :

the High Court shall have original jurisdiction

76. The Parliament may make laws conferring original jurisdiction on the High Court in any matter—
- (i.) Arising under this Constitution, or involving its interpretation :
 - (ii.) Arising under any laws made by the Parliament :
 - (iii.) Of Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction :
 - (iv.) Relating to the same subject-matter claimed under the laws of different States.
77. With respect to any of the matters mentioned in the last two sections the Parliament may make laws—
- (i.) Defining the jurisdiction of any federal court other than the High Court :
 - (ii.) Defining the extent to which the jurisdiction of any federal court shall be exclusive of that which belongs to or is invested in the courts of the States :
 - (iii.) Investing any court of a State with federal jurisdiction.
78. The Parliament may make laws conferring rights to proceed against the Commonwealth or a State in respect of matters within the limits of the judicial power.
79. The federal jurisdiction of any court may be exercised by such number of judges as the Parliament prescribes.
80. The trial on indictment of any offence against any law of the Commonwealth shall be by jury, and every such trial shall be held in the State where the offence was committed, and if the offence was not committed within any State the trial shall be held at such place or places as the Parliament prescribes.

CHAPTER IV.

Finance and Trade.

CHAP. IV FINANCE AND TRADE.

81. All revenues or moneys raised or received by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth shall form one Consolidated Revenue Fund, to be appropriated for the purposes of the Commonwealth in the manner and subject to the charges and liabilities imposed by this Constitution.
82. The costs, charges, and expenses incident to the collection, management, and receipt of the Consolidated Revenue Fund shall form the first charge thereon ; and the revenue of the Commonwealth shall in the first instance be applied to the payment of the expenditure of the Commonwealth.
83. No money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the Commonwealth except under appropriation made by law.
- But until the expiration of one month after the first meeting of the Parliament the Governor-General in Council may draw from the Treasury and expend such moneys as may be necessary for the maintenance of any department transferred to the Commonwealth and for the holding of the first elections for the Parliament.
84. When any department of the public service of a State becomes transferred to the Commonwealth, all officers of the department shall become subject to the control of the Executive Government of the Commonwealth.
- Any such officer who is not retained in the service of the Commonwealth shall, unless he is appointed to some other office of equal emolument in the public service of the State, be entitled to receive from the State any pension, gratuity, or other compensation, payable under the law of the State on the abolition of his office.
- Any such officer who is retained in the service of the Commonwealth shall preserve all his existing and accruing rights, and shall be entitled to retire from office at the time, and on the pension or retiring allowance, which would be permitted by the law of the State if his service with the Commonwealth were a continuation of his service with the State. Such pension or retiring allowance shall be paid to him by the Commonwealth ; but the State shall pay to the Commonwealth a part thereof, to be calculated on the proportion which his term of service with the State bears to his whole term of service, and for the purpose of the calculation his salary shall be taken to be that paid to him by the State at the time of the transfer.

A. D. 1900.

Any officer who is, at the establishment of the Commonwealth, in the public service of a State, and who is, by consent of the Governor of the State with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, transferred to the public service of the Commonwealth, shall have the same rights as if he had been an officer of a department transferred to the Commonwealth and were retained in the service of the Commonwealth.

85. When any department of the public service of a State is transferred to the Commonwealth—

- (i.) All property of the State of any kind, used exclusively in connexion with the department, shall become vested in the Commonwealth; but, in the case of the departments controlling customs and excise and bounties, for such time only as the Governor-General in Council may declare to be necessary:
- (ii.) The Commonwealth may acquire any property of the State, of any kind used, but not exclusively used in connexion with the department; the value thereof shall, if no agreement can be made, be ascertained in, as nearly as may be, the manner in which the value of land, or of an interest in land, taken by the State for public purposes is ascertained under the law of the State in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth:
- (iii.) The Commonwealth shall compensate the State for the value of any property passing to the Commonwealth under this section; if no agreement can be made as to the mode of compensation, it shall be determined under laws to be made by the Parliament:
- (iv.) The Commonwealth shall, at the date of the transfer, assume the current obligations of the State in respect of the department transferred.

86. On the establishment of the Commonwealth, the collection and control of duties of customs and of excise, and the control of the payment of bounties, shall pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth.

87. During a period of ten years after the establishment of the Commonwealth and thereafter until the Parliament otherwise provides, of the net revenue of the Commonwealth from duties of customs and of excise not more than one-fourth shall be applied annually by the Commonwealth towards its expenditure.

The balance shall, in accordance with this Constitution, be paid to the several States, or applied towards the payment of interest on debts of the several States taken over by the Commonwealth.

88. Uniform duties of customs shall be imposed within two years after the establishment of the Commonwealth.

89. Until the imposition of uniform duties of customs—

- (i.) The Commonwealth shall credit to each State the revenues collected therein by the Commonwealth.
- (ii.) The Commonwealth shall debit to each State—
 - (a) the expenditure therein of the Commonwealth incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance, as at the time of transfer, of any department transferred from the State to the Commonwealth;
 - (b) the proportion of the State, according to the number of its people, in the other expenditure of the Commonwealth.
- (iii.) The Commonwealth shall pay to each State month by month the balance (if any) in favour of the State.

90. On the imposition of uniform duties of customs the power of the Parliament to impose duties of customs and of excise, and to grant bounties on the production or export of goods, shall become exclusive.

On the imposition of uniform duties of customs all laws of the several States imposing duties of customs or of excise, or offering bounties on the production or export of goods, shall cease to have effect, but any grant of or agreement for any such bounty lawfully made by or under the authority of the Government of any State shall be taken to be good if made before the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and not otherwise.

91. Nothing in this Constitution prohibits a State from granting any aid to or bounty on mining for gold, silver, or other metals, nor from granting, with the consent of both Houses of the Parliament of the Commonwealth expressed by resolution, any aid to or bounty on the production or export of goods.

Transfer of property of State.

Uniform duties of customs.

Payment to States before uniform duties.

Exclusive power over customs, excise, and bounties.

Exceptions as to bounties.

92. On the imposition of uniform duties of customs, trade, commerce, and inter-course among the States, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free. Trade within the Commonwealth to be free.

But notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, goods imported before the imposition of uniform duties of customs into any State, or into any Colony which whilst the goods remain therein, becomes a State, shall, on thence passing into another State within two years after the imposition of such duties, be liable to any duty chargeable on the importation of such goods into the Commonwealth, less any duty paid in respect of the goods on their importation.

93. During the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties of customs, and thereafter until the Parliament otherwise provides— Payment to States for five years after uniform tariffs.

(i.) The duties of customs chargeable on goods imported into a State and afterwards passing into another State for consumption, and the duties of excise paid on goods produced or manufactured in a State and afterwards passing into another State for consumption, shall be taken to have been collected not in the former but in the latter State :

(ii.) Subject to the last subsection, the Commonwealth shall credit revenue, debit expenditure, and pay balances to the several States as prescribed for the period preceding the imposition of uniform duties of customs.

94. After five years from the imposition of uniform duties of customs, the Parlia- Distribution of surplus. ment may provide, on such basis as it deems fair, for the monthly payment to the several States of all surplus revenue of the Commonwealth.

95. Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, the Parliament of the State of Customs duties of Western Australia. Western Australia, if that State be an Original State, may, during the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties of customs, impose duties of customs on goods passing into that State and not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth ; and such duties shall be collected by the Commonwealth.

But any duty so imposed on any goods shall not exceed during the first of such years the duty chargeable on the goods under the law of Western Australia in force at the imposition of uniform duties, and shall not exceed during the second, third, fourth, and fifth of such years respectively, four-fifths, three-fifths, two-fifths, and one-fifth of such latter duty, and all duties imposed under this section shall cease at the expiration of the fifth year after the imposition of uniform duties.

If at any time during the five years the duty on any goods under this section is higher than the duty imposed by the Commonwealth on the importation of the like goods, then such higher duty shall be collected on the goods when imported into Western Australia from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth.

96. During a period of ten years after the establishment of the Commonwealth and thereafter until the Parliament otherwise provides, the Parliament may grant financial Financial assistance to States. assistance to any State on such terms and conditions as the Parliament thinks fit.

97. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the laws in force in any Colony which has become or becomes a State with respect to the receipt of revenue and the expenditure of money on account of the Government of the Colony, and the review and audit of such receipt and expenditure, shall apply to the receipt of revenue and the expenditure of money on account of the Commonwealth in the State in the same manner as if the Commonwealth, or the Government or an officer of the Commonwealth, were mentioned whenever the Colony, or the Government or an officer of the Colony, is mentioned. Audit.

98. The power of the Parliament to make laws with respect to trade and commerce extends to navigation and shipping, and to railways the property of any State. Trade and commerce includes navigation and State railways.

99. The Commonwealth shall not, by any law or regulation of trade, commerce, or revenue, give preference to one State or any part thereof over another State or any part thereof. Commonwealth not to give preference.

100. The Commonwealth shall not, by any law or regulation of trade or commerce, abridge the right of a State or of the residents therein to the reasonable use of the waters of rivers for conservation or irrigation. Nor abridge right to use water.

101. There shall be an Inter-State Commission, with such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament deems necessary for the execution and maintenance, within the Commonwealth, of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce, and of all laws made thereunder. Inter-State Commission.

102. The Parliament may by any law with respect to trade or commerce forbid, as Parliament may forbid preferences by State. to railways, any preference or discrimination by any State, or by any authority constituted under a State, if such preference or discrimination is undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any State ; due regard being had to the financial responsibilities incurred by any State in connexion with the construction and maintenance of its railways. But no preference or discrimination shall, within the meaning of this section, be taken to be undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any State, unless so adjudged by the Inter-State Commission.

103. The members of the Inter-State Commission—

(i.) Shall be appointed by the Governor-General in Council :

(ii.) Shall hold office for seven years, but may be removed within that time by the Governor-General in Council, on an address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same session praying for such removal on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity :

(iii.) Shall receive such remuneration as the Parliament may fix ; but such remuneration shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Commissioners' appointment, tenure, and remuneration

Saving of certain rates.

104. Nothing in this Constitution shall render unlawful any rate for the carriage of goods upon a railway, the property of a State, if the rate is deemed by the Inter-State Commission to be necessary for the development of the territory of the State, and if the rate applies equally to goods within the State and to goods passing into the State from other States.

Taking over public debts of States.

105. The Parliament may take over from the States their public debts as existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or a proportion thereof according to the respective numbers of their people as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, and may convert, renew, or consolidate such debts, or any part thereof ; and the States shall indemnify the Commonwealth in respect of the debts taken over, and thereafter the interest payable in respect of the debts shall be deducted and retained from the portions of the surplus revenue of the Commonwealth payable to the several States, or if such surplus is insufficient, or if there is no surplus, then the deficiency or the whole amount shall be paid by the several States.

CHAP. V.

CHAPTER V.

THE STATES.

The States.

Saving of Constitutions

106. The Constitution of each State of the Commonwealth shall, subject to this Constitution, continue as at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or as at the admission or establishment of the State, as the case may be, until altered in accordance with the Constitution of the State.

Saving of Power of State Parliaments.

107. Every power of the Parliament of a Colony which has become or becomes a State, shall, unless it is by this Constitution exclusively vested in the Parliament of the Commonwealth or withdrawn from the Parliament of the State, continue as at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or as at the admission or establishment of the State, as the case may be.

Saving of State laws.

108. Every law in force in a Colony which has become or becomes a State, and relating to any matter within the powers of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, shall, subject to this Constitution, continue in force in the State ; and, until provision is made in that behalf by the Parliament of the Commonwealth, the Parliament of the State shall have such powers of alteration and of repeal in respect of any such law as the Parliament of the Colony had until the Colony became a State.

Inconsistency of laws.

109. When a law of a State is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth, the latter shall prevail, and the former shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid.

Provisions referring to Governor.

110. The provisions of this Constitution relating to the Governor of a State extend and apply to the Governor for the time being of the State, or other chief executive officer or administrator of the government of the State.

States may surrender territory.

111. The Parliament of a State may surrender any part of the State to the Commonwealth ; and upon such surrender, and the acceptance thereof by the Commonwealth, such part of the State shall become subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commonwealth.

States may levy charges for inspection laws.

112. After uniform duties of customs have been imposed, a State may levy on imports or exports, or on goods passing into or out of the State, such charges as may be necessary for executing the inspection laws of the State ; but the net produce of all charges so levied shall be for the use of the Commonwealth ; and any such inspection laws may be annulled by the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

113. All fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquids passing into any State or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, shall be subject to the laws of the State as if such liquids had been produced in the State. Intoxicating liquids.

114. A State shall not, without the consent of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, raise or maintain any naval or military force, or impose any tax on property of any kind belonging to the Commonwealth, nor shall the Commonwealth impose any tax on property of any kind belonging to a State. States may not raise forces. Taxation of property of Commonwealth or State.

115. A State shall not coin money, nor make anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender in payment of debts. States not to coin money.

116. The Commonwealth shall not make any law for establishing any religion, or for imposing any religious observance, or for prohibiting the free exercise of any religion, and no religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust under the Commonwealth. Commonwealth not to legislate in respect of religion.

117. A subject of the Queen, resident in any State, shall not be subject in any other State to any disability or discrimination which would not be equally applicable to him if he were a subject of the Queen resident in such other State. Rights of residents in States.

118. Full faith and credit shall be given, throughout the Commonwealth, to the laws, the public Acts and records, and the judicial proceedings of every State. Recognition of laws, &c. of States.

119. The Commonwealth shall protect every State against invasion and, on the application of the Executive Government of the State, against domestic violence. Protection of States from invasion and violence.

120. Every State shall make provision for the detention in its prisons of persons accused or convicted of offences against the laws of the Commonwealth, and for the punishment of persons convicted of such offences, and the Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws to give effect to this provision. Custody of offenders against laws of the Commonwealth.

CHAPTER VI.

CHAP. VI.

New States.

NEW STATES.

121. The Parliament may admit to the Commonwealth or establish new States, and may upon such admission or establishment make or impose such terms and conditions, including the extent of representation in either House of the Parliament, as it thinks fit. New States may be admitted or established.

122. The Parliament may make laws for the government of any territory surrendered by any State to and accepted by the Commonwealth, or of any territory placed by the Queen under the authority of and accepted by the Commonwealth, or otherwise acquired by the Commonwealth, and may allow the representation of such territory in either House of the Parliament to the extent and on the terms which it thinks fit. Government of territories.

123. The Parliament of the Commonwealth may, with the consent of the Parliament of a State, and the approval of the majority of the electors of the State voting upon the question, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of the State, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed on, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any State affected. Alteration of limits of States.

124. A new State may be formed by separation of territory from a State, but only with the consent of the Parliament thereof, and a new State may be formed by the union of two or more States or parts of States, but only with the consent of the Parliaments of the States affected. Formation of new States.

CHAPTER VII.

CHAP. VII.

Miscellaneous.

MISCELLANEOUS

125. The seat of Government of the Commonwealth shall be determined by the Parliament, and shall be within territory which shall have been granted to or acquired by the Commonwealth, and shall be vested in and belong to the Commonwealth, and shall be in the State of New South Wales, and be distant not less than one hundred miles from Sydney. Seat of Government.

Such territory shall contain an area of not less than one hundred square miles, and such portion thereof as shall consist of Crown lands shall be granted to the Commonwealth without any payment therefor.

The Parliament shall sit at Melbourne until it meet at the seat of Government.

Power to Her Majesty to authorise Governor-General to appoint deputies.

126. The Queen may authorise the Governor-General to appoint any person, or any persons jointly or severally, to be his deputy or deputies within any part of the Commonwealth, and in that capacity to exercise during the pleasure of the Governor-General such powers and functions of the Governor-General as he thinks fit to assign to such deputy or deputies, subject to any limitations expressed or directions given by the Queen; but the appointment of such deputy or deputies shall not affect the exercise by the Governor-General himself of any power or function.

Aborigines not to be counted in reckoning population

127. In reckoning the numbers of the people of the Commonwealth, or of a State or other part of the Commonwealth, aboriginal natives shall not be counted.

CHAP. VIII.

CHAPTER VIII.

ALTERATION OF CONSTITUTION.

Alteration of the Constitution.

Mode of altering the Constitution.

128. This Constitution shall not be altered except in the following manner:—

The proposed law for the alteration thereof must be passed by an absolute majority of each House of the Parliament, and not less than two nor more than six months after its passage through both Houses the proposed law shall be submitted in each State to the electors qualified to vote for the election of members of the House of Representatives.

But if either House passes any such proposed law by an absolute majority, and the other House rejects or fails to pass it or passes it with any amendment to which the first-mentioned House will not agree, and if after an interval of three months the first-mentioned House in the same or the next session again passes the proposed law by an absolute majority with or without any amendment which has been made or agreed to by the other House, and such other House rejects or fails to pass it or passes it with any amendment to which the first-mentioned House will not agree, the Governor-General may submit the proposed law as last proposed by the first-mentioned House, and either with or without any amendments subsequently agreed to by both Houses, to the electors in each State qualified to vote for the election of the House of Representatives.

When a proposed law is submitted to the electors the vote shall be taken in such manner as the Parliament prescribes. But until the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives becomes uniform throughout the Commonwealth, only one-half the electors voting for and against the proposed law shall be counted in any State in which adult suffrage prevails.

And if in a majority of the States a majority of the electors voting approve the proposed law, and if a majority of all the electors voting also approve the proposed law, it shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

No alteration diminishing the proportionate representation of any State in either House of the Parliament, or the minimum number of representatives of a State in the House of Representatives, or increasing, diminishing, or otherwise altering the limits of the State, or in any manner affecting the provisions of the Constitution in relation thereto, shall become law unless the majority of the electors voting in that State approve the proposed law.

COMMENTARIES

CONSTITUTION

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA.

NOTE.

In these Commentaries, the text of each clause of the Act and each section of the Constitution is printed in large type. After the several clauses and sections are printed in small type the corresponding provisions of other Federal Constitutions. Then follows a Historical Note on each clause and section; after which come the notes, which are numbered consecutively (with the sign §) throughout the Act and Constitution.

In the large-type text each word or phrase annotated is followed by an index number referring to the corresponding note. At the top inner corner of each left-hand page there is a reference to the clause or section under discussion; and at the top inner corner of each right-hand page is a reference to the number of the note.

CONSTITUTION OF THE AUSTRALIAN
COMMONWEALTH.

An Act¹ to constitute the Commonwealth of Australia.

UNITED STATES.—Constitution of the United States. (17th September, 1787.) [Title.]

CANADA.—An Act for the union of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the Government thereof, and for purposes connected therewith. (29th March, 1867.) [Title.]

GERMANY.—The Imperial Constitution. (18th January, 1871.) [Title.]

SWITZERLAND.—Federal Constitution of the Swiss Confederation (29th May, 1874.) [Title.]

§ 1. "An Act."

PARTS.—This Act may, for the purpose of analysis and classification, be considered as consisting of the following parts:—(1) Title, (2) Preamble, (3) Words of enacting authority, (4) The Covering Clauses 1 to 9, (5) The Constitution introduced by Clause 9, and divided into Chapters, Headings, Parts, and Sections, (6) The Schedule, (7) The Marginal Notes.

TITLE.—The title of a Statute forms no part of the law, and in strictness ought not to be taken into consideration at all. No more argument can be justly built upon the title prefixed in some editions of the Statutes than upon the marginal notes against the several sections—per Tindal, C.J., in delivering to the House of Lords the opinion of the consulted Judges. (Birtwistle v. Vardill, 1839, 7 Cl. and Finn., p. 929.)

The title of a statute is no part of the law—per Lord Mansfield, Rex v. Williams, 1 W. Bl. 95. Per Lord Hardwicke, Att.-Gen. v. Lord Weymouth, Ambl. 25. Per Pollock, C.B., Salkeld v. Johnson, 2 Exch. 283, Digest of English Case Law, Vol. XIII., p. 1881.

There is no authority for saying that the title of a statute may be used where there is any ambiguity in the statute. (Coomber v. Berks Justices, 9 Q.B.D. 33. Id.)

The title cannot be resorted to for the purpose of construing the provisions of the Act. (Hunter v. Nockolds, 19 L.J. Ch. 177. Id.)

"The title of a statute does not go for much in construing it, but I do not know that it is to be absolutely disregarded. The title of Lord Campbell's Act, 9 and 10 Vic. c. 93, was certainly referred to as not without significance in the Court of Queen's Bench in Blake v. Midland Ry. Co., 18 Q.B. 93." (Per Wills, J., in Kenrick v. Lawrence, 25 Q.B.D. 99. Id.)

If there is in the provisions of an Act anything admitting of a doubt, the title of the Act is a matter proper to be considered in the interpretation of the Act. (Shaw v. Ruddin, 9 Ir. C.L.R. 214. Id.)

The enacting part of an Act is not to be controlled by the title or recitals unless the enacting part is ambiguous, and then the title and recitals may be referred to for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the legislature. (Bentley v. Rotherham Local Board; 4 Ch. D. 588. Id.)

HEADINGS.—The headings of a portion of a statute may be referred to in order to determine the sense of any doubtful expressions in sections ranged under it. (Hammer-smith and City Railway Co. v. Brand, L.R. 4 H.L. 171, 203; but see—per Lord Cairns, id. p. 217. Eastern Counties Rail. Co. v. Marriage, 9 H.L. Ca. 32. Union Steamship Co. of N.Z. v. Melbourne Harbour Trust, 9 App. Ca. 365.)

MARGINAL NOTES.—The marginal notes of the Act and the Constitution are copious and systematic; yet the bulk of authority would seem to show that they form no portion of the law. In Claydon v. Green, L.R. 3 C.P. 511, Mr. Justice Willes said:—

"Something has been said about the marginal note in section 4 of 9 Geo. IV. c. 61. I wish to say a word upon that subject. It appears from Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. I. p. 183, that formerly, at one stage of the Bill in Parliament it was ordered to be engrossed upon one or more rolls of parchment. That practice seems to have continued down to the session of 1849, when it was discontinued, without, however, any statute being passed to warrant it (see May's Parliamentary Practice, 3rd ed., 382). Since that time, the only record of the proceedings of Parliament—the important proceedings of the highest tribunal of the Kingdom—is to be found in the copy printed by the Queen's printer. But I desire to record my conviction that this change in the mode of recording them cannot affect the rule which treated the title of the Act, the marginal notes, and the punctuation, not as forming part of the Act, but merely as temporanea expositio. The Act, when passed, must be looked at just as if it were still entered upon a roll, which it may be again if Parliament should be pleased so to order; in which case it would be without these appendages, which, though useful as a guide to a hasty inquirer, ought not to be relied upon in construing an Act of Parliament."

Some doubts were thrown on the opinion of Mr. Justice Willes, expressed in 1868, by a contrary view taken and acted upon in 1876 by Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, who, in the case of re Venour's Settled Estates, 2 Ch. D. 525, said:—"This view is borne out by the marginal note, and I may mention that the marginal notes of Acts now appear on the rolls of Parliament, and consequently form part of the Acts, and in fact are so clearly so that I have known them to be the subject of motion and amendment in Parliament." In the case of Attorney-General v. Great Eastern R. Co., 1879, 11 Ch. D. 449, the Master of the Rolls gave expression to the same view. When this case came before the Court of Appeal, consisting of James, Bramwell, Baggallay, L.JJ., he was overruled, and the law was finally settled that marginal notes form no legal part of a statute. Per James, L.J.: "What authority has the Master of the Rolls for saying that the courts do look at the marginal notes?" Per Bramwell, L.J.: "What would happen if the marginal notes differed from the section, which is a possibility, as is shown in section 112 of this Act? Does the marginal note repeal the section, or does the section repeal the marginal note?" Per Baggallay, L.J.: "I never knew an amendment set down or discussed upon the marginal note to a clause. The House of Commons never has anything to do with the amendment of the marginal note."

PUNCTUATION.—The punctuation is no part of an Act of Parliament. In the case of Barrow v. Wadkin, 24 Beav. 327, it was held that certain words in an Act were to be read "aliens' duties, customs, and impositions," not as they were printed, "aliens, duties, customs, and impositions."

Preamble.

Whereas² the people³ of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania, humbly relying on the blessing of Almighty God⁴, have agreed⁵ to unite in one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth⁶ under the Crown⁷ of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland⁸, and under the Constitution⁹ hereby established¹⁰ :

And whereas it is expedient to provide for the admission into the Commonwealth of other Australasian Colonies and possessions of the Queen :

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty¹¹, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual¹² and Temporal¹³, and Commons¹⁴, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same¹⁵, as follows :—

DECLARATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.—We therefore the representatives of the United States of America in general Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of our intentions, do in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies solemnly publish and declare that these united colonies are and of right ought to be free and independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is and ought to be totally dissolved . . . and for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour. (4th July, 1776.)

ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION.—And whereas it hath pleased the great Governor of the World to incline the hearts of the Legislatures we respectively represent in Congress, to approve of and to authorize us to ratify the said articles of confederation and perpetual union, know ye, that we the undersigned delegates, by virtue of the power and authority to us given for that purpose, do by these presents in the name and in behalf of our respective constituents fully and entirely ratify and confirm each and every of the said Articles of Confederation and perpetual union and all and singular the matters and things therein contained. (9th July, 1778; ratified, 1781.)

UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.—We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America. (Preamble, went into operation 4th March 1789.)

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT.—Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. And whereas such a union would conduce to the welfare of the Provinces and promote the interests of the British Empire. And whereas on the establishment of the union by authority of Parliament it is expedient not only that the Constitution of the Legislative authority in the Dominion be provided for, but also that the nature of the Executive Government therein be declared. And whereas it is expedient that provision be made for the eventual admission into the union of other parts of British North America. (Preamble, 29th March, 1867.)

CONSTITUTION OF THE GERMAN EMPIRE.—The Imperial Constitution for the protection of the territory of the Confederation and of the laws of the same as well as for the promotion of the welfare of the German people. (Preamble, 18th January, 1871.)

CONSTITUTION OF SWITZERLAND.—In the name of Almighty God. The Swiss Confederation, desiring to confirm the alliance of the Confederates, to maintain and to promote the unity, strength and honour of the Swiss nation. . . . The purpose of the Confederation is to secure the independence of the country against foreign nations, to maintain peace and order within, to protect the liberty and the rights of the Confederates and to foster their common welfare. (Preamble and Art. 2, 29th May, 1874.)

HISTORICAL NOTE.—The preamble of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“Whereas the Australasian colonies of [here name the colonies which have adopted the Constitution] have by [here describe the mode by which the assent of the colonies has been expressed] agreed to unite in one Federal Commonwealth under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and under the Constitution hereby established: And whereas it is expedient to make provision for the admission into the Commonwealth of other Australasian colonies and possessions of Her Majesty.”

Under the Enabling Acts by which the Convention of 1897-8 was constituted, the mode by which the assent of the colonies was to be expressed—namely, by the vote of the people—was already determined; and accordingly the first recital in the preamble as drawn at Adelaide was as follows:—

“Whereas the people of [here name the colonies which have adopted the Constitution] have agreed to form one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and under the Constitution hereby established.”

In Committee, at Mr. Deakin's suggestion, the word “form” was omitted and “unite in” substituted. Several largely-signed petitions had been received praying that there should be some recognition of God in the Constitution; and Mr. Glynn moved to insert the words “invoking Divine Providence.” The Convention, however, felt some doubt as to the propriety of introducing at that stage any religious formula into the Constitution, and the amendment was negatived by 17 votes to 11. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 1183-9.) During the statutory adjournment, all the Legislative Chambers, with one exception, suggested the insertion of some recognition of a Divine Being. The Legislatures of New South Wales and South Australia, and the Legislative Council of Western Australia, suggested the words “acknowledging Almighty God as the Supreme Ruler of the Universe.” The Legislature of Victoria suggested “in reliance upon the blessing of Almighty God.” The House of Assembly of Tasmania suggested "duly acknowledging Almighty God as the Supreme Ruler of the Universe and the source of all true Government" The Legislative Assembly of Western Australia suggested "grateful to Almighty God for their freedom, and in order to secure and perpetuate its blessings." Numerous petitions were received to a similar effect; and at the Melbourne session a proposal by Mr. Glynn to insert the words "humbly relying on the blessing of Almighty God" was agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Melb., 1732-41.)

In the Bill as introduced in the Imperial Parliament, the names of the five colonies which had accepted the Bill were inserted in the blank left for that purpose. The words "under the Constitution hereby established" were omitted, owing to the contention of the Delegates that the alterations then proposed by the Imperial Government would make this recital inaccurate; but in Committee they were afterwards restored (see Historical Introduction, pp. 230, 238, 242, 249, supra).

§ 2. "Whereas."

The proper function of a preamble is to explain and recite certain facts which are necessary to be explained and recited, before the enactments contained in an Act of Parliament can be understood. A preamble may be used for other reasons: to limit the scope of certain expressions or to explain facts or introduce definitions. (Lord Thring, Practical Legislation, p. 36.) The preamble has been said to be a good means to find out the intention of a statute, and, as it were, a key to the understanding of it. It usually states, or professes to state, the general object and meaning of the Legislature in passing the measure. Hence it may be legitimately consulted for the purpose of solving an ambiguity or fixing the connotation of words which may possibly have more than one meaning, or determining the scope or limiting the effect of the Act, whenever the enacting parts are, in any of these respects, open to doubt. But the preamble cannot either restrict or extend the legislative words, when the language is plain and not open to doubt, either as to its meaning or its scope. (Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes [1875], pp. 35-45.)

In the case of Overseers of West Ham v. Iles (1883), 8 App. Cas. p. 388, Lord Blackburn said: "My Lords, in this case the whole question turns upon the construction of sect. 19 of 59 Geo. III. c. 12. I quite agree with the argument which has been addressed to your Lordships, that in construing an Act of Parliament, where the intention of the Legislature is declared by the preamble, we are to give effect to that preamble to this extent, namely, that it shows us what the Legislature are intending; and if the words of enactment have a meaning which does not go beyond that preamble, or which may come up to the preamble, in either case we prefer that meaning to one showing an intention of the Legislature which would not answer the purposes of the preamble, or which would go beyond them. To that extent only is the preamble material."

Although the enacting words of a statute are not necessarily to be limited or controlled by the words of the preamble, but in many instances go beyond it, yet, on a sound construction of every Act of Parliament, the words in the enacting part must be confined to that which is the plain object and general intention of the Legislature in passing the Act; and the preamble affords a good clue to discover what that object was. (Per Lord Tenterden, C.J., in Halton v. Cove, 1 B. and Ad. 538; Salkeld v. Johnson, 2 Exch. 283; per Kelly, C.B., in Winn v. Mossman, L.R. 4 Ex. 300; cited, Broom's Legal Maxims, 5th ed. p. 572.) "The only rule for the construction of Acts of Parliament is that they should be construed according to the intent of the Parliament which passed the Act. If the words of the statute are in themselves precise and unambiguous, then no more can be necessary than to expound the words in their natural and ordinary sense. The words themselves alone do in such case best declare the intention of the lawgiver. But if any doubt arises from the terms employed by the Legislature, it has always been held a safe means of collecting the intention to call in aid the ground and cause of making the statute, and to have recourse to the preamble, which according to Chief Justice Dyer (Plowd. 369) is a key to open the minds of the makers of the Act and the mischiefs which they intended to redress." (Per Tindal, C.J., delivering the opinion of the Judges in the Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Cl. and Fin. 143; per Buller, J., in R. v. Robinson, 2 East P.C. 1113; cited R. v. Johnson, 29 St. Tr. 303; Broom's Legal Maxims, 5th ed. 573.)

It is a general rule, in the construction of statutes, that the preamble may extend, but cannot restrain, the effect of an enacting clause. (Kearns v. Cordwainers' Co., 28 L.J. C.P. 285; D.E.C.L. xiii. p. 1882.)

We ought not to restrict a section in an Act of Parliament by the preamble or general purview of the Act where the section is not inconsistent with the spirit of the Act. (Sutton v. Sutton, 22 Ch. D. 521. Id.)

The preamble of an Act of Parliament is proper to explain the general body of it. (Copeman v. Gallant, 1 P. Wms. 317. Id.)

If the enacting part of a statute will bear only one interpretation, the preamble shall not confine it; but if it is doubtful, the preamble may be applied to throw light upon it. (Mason v. Armitage, 13 Ves. 36. Id.)

In construing an Act of Parliament, or any other instrument, the court is at liberty to regard the state of the law at the time, and the facts which the preamble or recitals of the Act of instrument prove to have been the existing circumstances at the time of its preparation. (Attorney-General v. Powis, 2 Eq. R. 566. Id. 1883.)

The preamble of an Act of Parliament, though it may assist ambiguous words, cannot control a clear and express enactment. (Lees v. Summersgill, 17 Ves. 508. Id.)

But it may serve to give a definite and qualified meaning to indefinite and general terms. (Emanuel v. Constable, 3 Russ. 436, overruling Lees v. Summersgill. Id.)

In construing Acts, the court must take into consideration not only the language of the preamble, or any particular clause, but of the whole Act; and if, in some of the enacting clauses, expressions are to be found of more extensive import than in others, or than in the preamble, the Court will give effect to those more extensive expressions, if, upon a view of the whole Act, it appears to have been the intention of the Legislature that they should have effect. (Doe d. Bywater v. Brandling, 6 L.J. (o.s.) K.B. 162. Id.)

The effect of the preamble of a repealed Act was considered in Harding v. Williams, 1880, 14 Ch. Div. 197. The effect of a preamble to a particular section of an Act was considered in ex parte Gorely, re Barker, 34 L.J. (B.) 1.

§ 3. "The People."

The opening words of the preamble proclaim that the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia is founded on the will of the people whom it is designed to unite and govern. Although it proceeds from the people, it is clothed with the form of law by an Act of the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, the Supreme Sovereign Legislature of the British Empire. The legislative supremacy of the British Parliament is, according to Dicey and all other modern jurists, the keystone of the law of the British Constitution. John Austin holds (Jurisprudence, vol. I. pp. 231-253) that the sovereign power is vested in the King, the House of Lords, and the House of Commons or electors. Referring to Austin's definition, Dicey points out that the word "sovereignty" is sometimes employed in a political rather than in a strictly legal sense. That body is politically sovereign or supreme in a State, the will of which is ultimately obeyed by the citizens of the State. In this sense of the word the electors of Great Britain may be said to be, together with the Crown and the Lords, or perhaps in strict accuracy, independently of the King and the Peers, to be the body in which the political sovereignty is vested. (Dicey, Law of the Constitution, p. 67.)

SOVEREIGNTY OF THE PEOPLE.—In the United States the political as well as the legal sovereignty of the people has been generally recognized ever since the Declaration of Independence. John Wilson, one of the framers of the American Constitution, in addressing the Pennsylvania State Convention in exposition and defence of that instrument said:—

"When I had the honour of speaking formerly on the subject I stated in as concise a manner as possible the leading ideas that occurred to me to ascertain where the supreme and sovereign power resides. It has not been, nor I presume will be denied that somewhere there is, and of necessity must be, a supreme absolute and uncontrollable authority. This I believe may justly be termed the sovereign power; for, from that gentleman's (Mr. Findlay's) account of the matter it cannot be sovereign unless it is supreme; for, says he, a subordinate sovereignty is no sovereignty at all. I had the honour of observing that if the question was asked where the supreme power resided, different answers would be given by different writers. I mentioned that Blackstone would tell you that in Britain it is lodged in the British Parliament; and I believe there is no writer on this subject on the other side of the Atlantic but supposed it to be vested in that body. I stated further that if the question was asked of some politician who had not considered the subject with sufficient accuracy, where the supreme power resided in our Government, he would answer that it was vested in the State Constitutions. This opinion approaches near the truth, but does not reach it, for the truth is the supreme absolute and uncontrollable authority remains with the people. I mentioned also that the practical recognition of this truth was reserved for the honour of this country. I recollect no Constitution founded on this principle; but we have witnessed the improvement and enjoy the happiness of seeing it carried into practice. The great and penetrating mind of Locke seems to be the only one that pointed towards even the theory of this great truth." (Elliot's Debates on the Federal Constitution, vol. ii., pp. 455, 456.) Cited, Roger Foster's Comment. on the Const. (1895), I., p. 107.

The Constitution of the United States was not ordained and established by the States, but, as the preamble declares, by "the people of the United States." It was competent for the people to invest the general government with all the powers which they might deem proper and necessary; to extend or restrain these powers, according to their own good pleasure, and to give them a paramount and supreme authority. (Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. 304-324; Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 455. Noted in Baker, Annot. Const. (1891), p. 1.)

The Government of the American Union is a Government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them. Its powers are granted by them and are to be exercised on them and for their benefit. (Per Marshall, C.J., McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316. Id.)

The expressions "the people of the United States" and "citizens" are synonymous and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body which according to American institutions, forms the sovereignty, holds the power and conducts the Government through its representatives. The members of that body are called the "sovereign people," and every citizen is one of this people and a constituent member of the sovereignty. (Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 393. Id.)

AFFIRMATIONS OF THE PREAMBLE.—It will be noticed that the preamble to this Constitution contains no less than eight separate and distinct affirmations or declarations.

- (i.) The agreement of the people of Australia.
- (ii.) Their reliance on the blessing of Almighty God.
- (iii.) The purpose to unite.
- (iv.) The character of the Union—indissoluble.
- (v.) The form of the Union—a Federal Commonwealth.
- (vi.) The dependence of the Union—under the Crown.
- (vii.) The government of the Union—under the Constitution.
- (viii.) The expediency of provision for admission of other Colonies as States.

Of the above eight declaratory parts of the preamble only four, viz., the third, fifth, seventh, and eighth, find legislative expression in identifiable clauses to be found in the body of the Act. The remaining four have, therefore, to be regarded as promulgating principles, ideas, or sentiments operating, at the time of the formation of the instrument, in the minds of its framers, and by them imparted to and approved by the people to whom it was submitted. These principles may hereafter become of supreme interest and importance in guiding the development of the Constitution under the influence of Federal Statesmen and Federal Electors. They may also be of valuable service and potent effect in the Courts of the Commonwealth, aiding in the interpretation of words and phrases which may now appear comparatively clear, but which, in time to come, may be obscured by the raising of unexpected issues and by the conflict of newly evolved opinions. It may be asked, why are four at least of these momentous declarations to be found only in the preamble, and why have they no corresponding counterparts in the corpus of the Act? The answer is obvious. First as to the agreement of the people; that is the recital of a historical fact, and it could not therefore be reduced to the form in which a section of an Act of Parliament is generally cast, viz., that of a command coupled with a sanction. Then, again, their reliance on the Divine blessing is another recital of fact, incidental to the primary affirmation, and introduced in a participial sentence for the purpose of avoiding the suspicion of ostentation and irreverence; there would, indeed, have been not only a technical difficulty, but an absolute impropriety in attempting to frame a clause designed to give legislative recognition of the Deity. The indissolubility of the Federal Commonwealth is affirmed as a principle: the effect of that affirmation will be discussed at a later stage. The declaration that the Union is under the Crown is appropriate and fundamental; this also will be discussed at a later stage.

§ 4. "Humbly Relying on the Blessing of Almighty God."

This appeal to the Deity was inserted in the Constitution at the suggestion of most of the Colonial Legislative Chambers, and in response to numerous and largely signed petitions received from the people of every colony represented in the Federal Convention. When the expression was first formulated, towards the close of the session held in Adelaide, it was thought advisable to postpone the final determination of a proposition so delicate and significant until a later stage, in order to give time and opportunity for further consideration and for the additional manifestation of public opinion and sentiment. In the interval between the Adelaide and Sydney sessions of the Convention, the Legislative Councils and Legislative Assemblies of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Western Australia, and the House of Assembly of Tasmania, resolved to recommend to the Convention the insertion in the preamble of appropriate words acknowledging and invoking the blessing of the Supreme Being. During the session held in Sydney, as well as in the last session held in Melbourne, supplementary petitions were received in favour of insertion of words of the foregoing import. A few petitions were also received in opposition to the proposal. Finally the words were inserted in the preamble without a division, but not without protest from several members of the Convention. In justification of the insertion of the words stress was laid on the great demonstration of public opinion in their favour, as expressed in the recommendations of the Legislative bodies and in the petitions presented. It was also pointed out that such an allusion was not without precedent in other notable instruments of Government, such as the American Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, and the Swiss Constitution. The views for and against are fully expressed in the following extracts:—

"The foundations of our national edifice are being laid in times of peace; the invisible hand of Providence is in the tracing of our plans. Should we not, at the very inception of our great work, give some outward recognition of the Divine guidance that we feel? This spirit of reverence for the Unseen pervades all the relations of our civil life. It is felt in the forms in our Courts of Justice, in the language of our statutes, in the oath that binds the Sovereign to the observance of our liberties, in the recognition of the Sabbath; in the rubrics of our guilds and social orders, in the anthem, through which on every public occasion we invoke a blessing on our executive head; in our domestic observances, in the offices of courtesy at our meetings and partings, and in the time-honoured motto of the nation. Says Burke: 'We know, and, what is better, we feel inwardly that religion is the basis of civil society.' The ancients, who in the edifices of the mind and marble have left us such noble exemplars for our guidance, invoked, under a sense of its all-pervading power, the direction of the Divine mind. Pagans though they were, and as yet but seeing dimly, they felt that the breath of a Divine Being, 'that pure breath of life, that spirit of man,' which God inspired— as Milton says— was the life of their establishments. It is of this that Cicero speaks when he writes of that great elemental law at the back of all human ordinances, that eternal principle which governs the entire universe, wisely commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong, and which he calls the mind of God. Right through the ages we find this universal sense of Divine inspiration— this feeling that a wisdom beyond that of man shapes the destiny of states; that the institutions of men are but the imperfect instruments of a Divine and beneficent energy, helping their higher aims. Should not we, sir, grant the prayer of the many petitions that have been presented to us, by recognizing at the opening of our great future our dependence upon God? Should we not fix in our Constitution the elements of reverence and strength, by expressing our share of the universal sense that a Divine idea animates all our higher objects, and that the guiding hand of Providence leads our wanderings towards the dawn? In doing so we will be but acting on what a great statesman called 'the uniformly considered sense of mankind.' It was from a consciousness of the moral anarchy of the world's unguided course that all races of man saw in their various gradations of light the vision of an eternal Justice behind the veil of things whose intimations kept down the rebellious hearts of earth's children. It was this that made them consecrate their national purposes to God; that their hands might grow strong and their minds be illuminated by the grace of that power Divine through which alone, as Plato says, the poet sings—

‘ We give like children, and the Almighty plan
Controls the forward children of weak man.’

Under a sense of this great truth, expressed some thousand years ago, I ask you to grant the prayer of these petitions: to grant it in a hope that the Justice we wish to execute may be rendered certain, in our work, and our union abiding and fruitful by the blessing of the Supreme Being.”—Mr. P. M. Glynn, Conv. Deb., Adel., 1897, p. 1185-6.

‘ I say frankly that I should have no objection to the insertion of words of this kind in the preamble, if I felt that in the Constitution we had a sufficient safeguard against the passing of religious laws by the Commonwealth. I shall, I hope, afterwards have an opportunity, upon the reconsideration of the measure, to bring before the Convention a clause modified to meet some criticisms which have been made on this point, and if I succeed in getting this clause passed it will provide this safeguard. I shall have an opportunity then of explaining how exceedingly important it is to have some such safeguard. There is no time for me now to go into an elaborate history of this question so far as the United States of America are concerned. I have investigated it with a great deal of care, and I can give the result of my investigations to honourable members, who, I hope, will not believe that I would mislead them if I could help doing so with regard to the effect of what has taken place there. Because they had no words in the preamble of the Constitution of the United States to the effect of those which the honourable member (Mr. Glynn) wishes to insert, Congress was unable to pass certain legislation in the direction of enforcing religion. There was a struggle for about thirty years to have some words of religious import inserted in the preamble. That struggle failed; but in 1892 it was decided by the Supreme Court that the people of the United States were a Christian people. . . . That decision was given in March or February, and four months afterwards it was enacted by Congress that the Chicago Exhibition should be closed upon Sundays, simply upon the ground that Sunday was a Christian day. The argument was that among a Christian nation you should enforce Christian observances. . . . There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States of America, even indirectly, suggesting a law of this sort. No doubt the State of Illinois could have passed such a law, because it has all its rights reserved. But there was nothing in the Constitution enabling the Congress to pass a law for the closing of the Exhibition on Sunday. As soon as ever those parties who had been working for the purpose of getting Sunday legalized throughout the United States found that decision given in February, 1892, that ‘ this is a Christian nation,’ they followed it up quickly, and within four months there was a law passed for the closing of the Exhibition on Sunday. . . . It has been in force for five and a half or six years, and it was struggled against, as my honourable friend will know. There was a strong monetary interest against it, but I will say frankly that I was not aware that it has been held to be constitutional. I understand though that there has been no dispute among the legal men in that country as to its being constitutional. Honourable members will hardly realize how far the inferential powers have been extended in America. I should have thought it obvious, and I think Mr. Wise will agree with me that the Congress had no power to pass a law of that sort. . . . I should have thought that it was not in the scope of Congress to pass a law, no matter how righteous, to close the Exhibition on Sunday, but I find, on looking to a number of decisions in the United States, that it has been held again and again that, because of certain expressions, words, and phrases used in the Constitution, inferential powers are conferred upon the Congress that go beyond any dreams we have at present. I know that a great many people have been got to sign petitions in favour of inserting such religious words in the preamble of this Bill by men who knew the course of the struggle in the United States, but who have not told the people what the course of that struggle is, and what the motive for these words is. I think the people of Australia ought to have been told frankly when they were asked to sign these petitions what the history in the United States has been on the subject, and the motive with which these words have been proposed. I think the people in Australia are as reverential as any people on the face of this earth, so I will make no opposition to the insertion of seemly and suitable words, provided that it is made perfectly clear in the substantive part of the Constitution that we are not conferring on the Commonwealth a power to pass religious laws. I want to leave that as a reserved power to the State, as it is now. Let the States have the power. I will not interfere with the individual States in the power they have, but I want to make it clear that in inserting these religious words in the preamble of the Bill we are not by inference giving a power to impose on the Federation of Australis any religious laws."—Mr. H. B. Higgins, Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1734-5.

The case referred to by Mr. Higgins was Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U.S., p. 457. It came before the Supreme Court of the United States on error from a United States circuit court. The question involved was the construction and effect of the federal statute of 26th February, 1885, prohibiting the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under agreement to perform labour in the United States. (23 Stat. 332 c. 164.) The Church of the Holy Trinity was duly incorporated as a religious society under the laws of the State of New York. E. Walpole Warren was, prior to September, 1887, an alien residing in England. In that month the Church made a contract with him, by which he was to remove to the city of New York and enter into its service as rector and pastor, which Warren accordingly did. It was claimed by the United States that this contract, on the part of the Church, was forbidden by the federal Act, and an action was commenced to recover the penalty prescribed by that Act. The Circuit Court held that the contract was within the prohibition of the statute, and rendered judgment accordingly. (36 Fed. Rep. 303.) The Church appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the single question presented was, whether the Circuit Court had erred in giving that decision. The decision of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice Brewer on 29th February, 1892. The Court was of opinion that the act of the Corporation was within the letter of the prohibition; for the relation of rector to his church was one of service, and implied labour on the one side with compensation on the other. Further, as noticed by the Circuit Judge in his opinion, the 5th section, which made specific exceptions, among them being professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, and domestic servants, strengthened the idea that every other kind of labour and service was intended to be reached by the first section. While there was great force in that reasoning, the Court did not think that Congress intended to denounce, with penalties, a transaction like that in the present case. It was a familiar rule, that a thing might be within the letter of a statute, and yet not be within the statute, because not within the spirit, nor within the intention of its makers. The Court therefore found that the whole of the Act, the evil which was intended to be remedied, the circumstances surrounding the appeal to Congress, the reports of the Committee of each House, all concurred in affirming that the intent of Congress was simply to stay the influx of cheap unskilled labour.

"It was never suggested that we had in this country a surplus of brain toilers, and least of all, that the market for the services of Christian ministers was depressed by foreign competition. Those were matters to which the attention of Congress, or of the people, was not directed. So far, then, as the evil which was sought to be remedied interprets the statute, it also guides to an exclusion of this contract from the penalties of the Act. . . . But beyond all these matters, no purpose of action against religion can be imputed to any legislation, state or national; because, this is a religious people. This is historically true. From the discovery of this continent to the present hour, there is a single voice making this affirmation. The Commission to Christopher Columbus, prior to his sail westward, is from 'Ferdinand and Isabella, by the Grace of God, King and Queen of Castile, &c.,' and recites that it is hoped that by God's assistance some of the continents and islands in the ocean will be discovered, &c. . . . The first colonial grant, that made to Sir Walter Raleigh, in 1584, was from 'Elizabeth by the grace of God, of England, France, and Ireland, Queen. Defender of the Faith,' &c.; and the grant, authorizing him to enact statutes for the government of the proposed colony, provides that 'they be not against the true Christian faith now professed in the Church of England.' Coming nearer to the present time, The Declaration of Independence recognizes the presence of the Divine in human affairs, in these words: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.' 'We therefore, the Representatives of the United States of America in general Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the Name and by the authority of the Good People of these colonies solemnly publish and declare,' &c., 'and for the support of the Declaration, with a firm reliance on the Protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes, and our sacred Honour.' On examination of the Constitutions of the various States we find in them a constant recognition of religious obligations. . . . It is the duty of the Court, under those circumstances, to say that, however broad the language of the statute may be, the Act, although within the letter, is not within the intention of the legislature, and cannot be within the statute." (Per Mr. Justice Brewer, Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U. S. 457.)

On 25th April, 1890, Congress passed an Act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, by holding in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, an International Exposition of arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mine, and sea. A Commission was constituted for carrying out the enterprise, and preliminary arrangements were made. This Act was passed by Congress in the exercise of its power to regulate and promote inter-state and foreign commerce. On 5th August, 1892, Congress passed an Act (ch. 381, 1892) in furtherance of the first-mentioned Act. It recited that it was enacted "For the purpose of aiding in defraying the cost of completing in a suitable manner the work of preparation for inaugurating the World's Columbian Exposition." It then proceeded to provide that there should be coined, at the mints, five million half-dollar silver pieces, to be known as Columbian half-dollars. It next went on to make other provisions and arrangements for the holding of the Exposition. Then came section 4, as follows :--

"That it is hereby declared that all appropriations herein made for, or pertaining to, the World's Columbian Exposition are made upon the condition that the said Exposition shall not be opened to the public on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and if the said appropriations be accepted by the corporation of the State of Illinois, known as the World's Columbian Exposition, upon that condition, it shall be, and is hereby, made the duty of the World's Columbian Commission, created by the Act of Congress of April twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and ninety, to make such rules or modification of the rules of same corporation as shall require the closing of the Exposition on the said first day of the week commonly called Sunday."

The amending Act, like the principal Act, was passed by Congress in the exercise of its power over trade and commerce. In the debates which took place in Congress during the passage of the amending Bill no reference appears to have been made to any religious aspect of the proposed closing of the Exposition on Sundays, or to the case of the Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States.

These words make distinct and emphatic reference to the consensus of the people, arrived at through the procedure, in its various successive stages, prescribed by the substantially similar Enabling Acts adopted by the Legislatures of the concurring colonies. In four of the colonies Acts were passed enabling the people to take part in the framing and acceptance or rejection of a Federal Constitution for Australia. Through those Acts the people agreed, first, to send representatives to a Federal Convention charged with the duty of framing for Australia a Federal Constitution under the Crown in the form of a Bill for enactment by the Imperial Parliament; and, secondly, they agreed to pronounce their judgment upon the Constitution at a referendum, which in each colony was arranged to follow the Convention. In all the colonies the Constitution was eventually referred to the people. At this referendum each voter was enabled to vote by ballot "Yes" or "No" on the question asked in the ballot paper, "Are you in favour of the proposed Federal Constitution?" In this manner there was in four colonies a popular initiative and finally in all the colonies a popular ratification of the Constitution, which is thus legally the work, as it will be for all time the heritage, of the Australian people. This democratic method of establishing a new form of government may be contrasted with the circumstances and conditions under which other Federal Constitutions became law.

UNITED STATES.—"It was well said by John Quincy Adams that the Constitution was 'extorted from the grinding necessity of a reluctant nation.' It was accepted by a small majority as the only alternative to disruption and anarchy. Its ratification was the success of the men who were interested in the security of property, the maintenance of order, and the enforcement of obligations against those who desired communism, lawlessness, and repudiation. It was a conflict between the cities and backwoods, between the mountains and plains. And the opposition was led by those cliques and families who had learned to control for their private interests the State patronage of which the new Government must necessarily deprive them. . . . Two States refused to agree until after it had gone into successful operation, and the rest threatened severe retaliation in order to compel their coalition. Five of the other nine ratified with expressions of disapproval of its terms and a demand for subsequent amendments. In but three was it adopted without a struggle. In several, success was only obtained by the application of force, threats, or stratagem. In Connecticut, they silenced with tar and feathers an anti-federalist delegate who tried to talk out the Convention. A majority of the New Hampshire delegates were determined or instructed to vote against ratification, and at the first session the federalists considered a vote for an adjournment of three months as a victory. At the second, while some of its opponents were 'detained' at dinner, the Constitution was ratified by a snap vote taken at sharp one o'clock. The Legislature of Pennsylvania obtained a quorum to call the State Convention by the unwilling presence of two members dragged to the meeting by a mob who prevented their leaving the house. In the State of New York, a majority of the Convention was anti-federal, and victory was won by the threat of Hamilton, that in case of defeat New York, Kings, and Westchester would ratify the Constitution as an independent State, and leave the northern counties alone unprotected from foreign enemies without any outlet for their commerce to the sea. The charge was believed, if not proved, that the federalists prevented the circulation of the newspapers of the opposition with the mails. And in Pennsylvania and Maryland they suppressed, by purchase and boycott, the reports of the debates in the State Conventions." (Foster's Comment. on the Constit. I. p. 5.)

CANADA.—"Delegates, comprising the leading men of both parties, were appointed by the Governors of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island at the instance of the several Legislatures. They met and drew up a scheme which, having been submitted to the Legislatures, was afterwards carried to London; there finally settled with the Colonial Office, and embodied by the Imperial Parliament in the British North America Act, which forms the instrument of confederation. The consent of the Canadian Legislature was freely and fairly given by a large majority. That of the Legislature of New Brunswick was only obtained by heavy pressure, the Colonial Office assisting, and after strong resistance, an election having taken place at which every one of the delegates had been rejected by the people. That of the Legislature of Nova Scotia was drawn from it, in defiance of the declared wishes of the people and its breach of recent pledges by vigorous use of personal influence with the members. Mr. Howe, the patriot leader of the Province, still held out and went to England, threatening recourse to violence if his people were not set free from the bondage into which, by the perfidy of their representatives, they had been betrayed. But he was gained over by the promise of office, and those who in England had listened to his patriot thunders, and had moved in response to his appeal, heard with surprise that the orator had taken his seat in a Federationist Administration. Prince Edward Island bolted outright, though high terms were offered her by the delegates, and at the time could not be brought back, though she came in some years afterwards, mollified by the boon of a local railway, for the construction of which the Dominion paid. In effect, Confederation was carried by the Canadian Parliament, led by the politicians of British and French Canada, whose first object was to escape from their deadlock, with the help of the Home Government, and of the Colonial Governors acting under its direction. The debate in the Canadian Parliament fills a volume of one thousand and thirty-two pages. A good deal of it is mere assertion and counter assertion as to the probable effects of the measure, political, military, and commercial. One speaker gives a long essay on the history of federation, but without much historical discrimination. Almost the only speech which has interest for a student of political science is that of Mr. Dunkin, who, while he is an extreme and one-sided opponent of the measure, tries at all events to forecast the workings of the projected Constitution, and thus takes us to the heart of the question, whether his forecast is right or wrong. Those who will be at the trouble of toiling through the volume, however, will, it is believed, see plainly enough that whoever may lay claim to the parentage of confederation—and upon this momentous question there has been much controversy—its real parent was Deadlock. Legally of course Confederation was the act of the Imperial Parliament, which had full power to legislate for dependencies. But there was nothing morally to prevent the submission of the plan to the people any more than there was to prevent a vote of the Colonial Legislatures on the project. The framers can hardly have failed to see how much the Constitution would gain in sacredness by being the act of the whole community. They must have known what was the source of the veneration with which the American Constitution is regarded by the people of the United States. The natural inference is that the politicians were not sure that they had the people with them. They were sure that in some of the provinces they had it not." (Canada and the Canadian Question, by Goldwin Smith, pp. 141-3.)

§ 6. "To Unite in One Indissoluble Federal Commonwealth."

All the words included in this expression, except "Indissoluble," occur in the covering clauses of the Imperial Act, and they will be duly noted in the order in which they appear there. "Indissoluble" is found in the preamble only and therefore demands a detailed notice at this stage. A brief allusion to the presence of the word in the preamble and its absence from the body of the Act has already been made (see note § 3, "Affirmations of the preamble"), but it is now necessary to enter upon a more extended discussion and explanation of the principle of indissolubility.

NULLIFICATION AND SECESSION.—The omission from the Constitution of the United States of an express declaration of the permanence and indestructibility of the Union led to the promulgation of the disastrous doctrines of nullification and secession, which were not finally exploded until the Civil War of 1862-4 forever terminated the controversy. The Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions, drafted by Jefferson (1798), and adopted by the Legislatures of those States, in protest against the Alien and Sedition Laws passed by the Federal Congress, contained the germ of the fatal and insidious contention that the Union was merely a compact among the States; that the States severally had the right to resist any breach of the compact, and to pronounce that a Legislative Act of the Federal Congress in excess of its powers, and encroaching on the rights of the States, was a nullity to be followed, if necessary, by resistance, revolution, and bloodshed.

This political heresy was afterwards (1828-33) elaborated by Hayne and Calhoun, both in their debates with Daniel Webster, and in a series of addresses formulating their views of the relations which the States and the general Government bore to each other. In October, 1832, a State Convention was held in South Carolina, at which it was declared and ordained by the people of the State that the several Acts of Congress purporting to impose duties on the importation of foreign commodities were unauthorized by the Constitution of the United States, and were, therefore, utterly null and void. This was the first serious experiment in nullification by any State. The State Legislature of South Carolina followed up the ordinances of the State Convention by passing several Acts intended to give effect to the declaration of nullification, by authorizing the citizens of the State to refuse to obey the Federal law which had been declared null and void. The President of the Republic, General Jackson, issued a proclamation to the people of South Carolina, requiring them to obey the Federal law, and he followed up his proclamation by calling out the Federal troops. Hayne, the Governor of the State, responded by mustering and drilling 20,000 volunteers. Jackson is said to have sent a private message to Calhoun threatening that he would hang him higher than Haman if nullification were not abandoned. An armed conflict between the State and the Union was only averted by a compromise, according to which Congress passed a new tariff law redressing some of the grievances complained of; and the controversy for the time was terminated.

Each side, says Foster (Constitution, I. p. 154), claimed a victory. Calhoun's policy had been successful, and the result encouraged his successors when they put to the test their claim to the right of secession from the Union. The contest was resumed in a more dangerous shape on 20th December, 1860, when a Convention of the people of South Carolina was held, at which an ordinance of secession was adopted in the following terms:—

"An ordinance to dissolve the union between the State of South Carolina and other States united with her under the compact entitled 'The Constitution of the United States of America.' We the people of the State of South Carolina in Convention assembled do declare and ordain and it is hereby declared and ordained that the Ordinance adopted by us in Convention on the 23rd of May, 1788, whereby the Constitution of the United States was ratified, and also all other Acts and part of Acts of the Federal Constitution, are hereby repealed, and the Union now subsisting between South Carolina and other States under the name of the United States of America is hereby dissolved."

This ordinance of secession was followed up by a declaration of independence, which alleged that the Union was dissolved, and that South Carolina had resumed her position amongst the nations of the world as a free, sovereign, and independent State. The example of South Carolina was afterwards followed by the States of Mississippi, Florida, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Texas. A Congress of seceding States was held at Montgomery, Alabama, at which a provisional Constitution was adopted and a provisional Government was formed. The Confederate Constitution was in many respects similar to that of the United States. In April, 1861, the provisional Government was called upon to give orders relating to Fort Sumter, a fortification still held by the United States, but situated within the territory of one of the Confederate States; the militia of South Carolina were directed to attack the fort, and the Civil war began. Four other States, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee and Arkansas, then seceded from the Union and joined the Confederacy. During the progress of the Civil war the Provisional Constitution was for a considerable time unaltered, but in February, 1862, a formal instrument of Government was adopted, which contained a few deviations from the Constitution of the United States.

"The trial of the wager of battle lasted more than five years. The dispute as to the construction of the Constitution was too mighty to be decided in a Court of Justice. The South had appealed to the final argument: in imitation of the Gallic Brennus, she had thrown her sword into the scale. To her surprise the North, less timid than the Romans, followed her example, and the weapon of the latter proved the heavier. The result determined the character of the Constitution for all time and compelled the conquered to consent to amendments which eradicated the evil (slavery) that had been the cause of the fraternal discord. No amendment which disclaimed the right of secession was written into the great Charter; pen and ink were not needed to express what had been stamped upon it by blood and iron." (Foster, Comment. on the Const. I., p. 185.)

The war was declared ended in August, 1866. Although the Federal Constitution was not amended by the insertion of a new clause explicitly stating that the Union was a permanent form of Government, several State Constitutions, including those of seven of the rebellious States, were amended by the introduction of provisions expressly repudiating the right of secession. In the case of the rebellious States, no doubt, the amendment was carried through the pressure and coercion of the victorious army of the North; but it was also adopted in several new States, where no such influence prevailed.

It was at a fearful cost that the principle was thus, once and for all, placed beyond the region of doubt that the United States form a perpetual union of indestructible States. This view received direct judicial sanction in the leading case of Texas v. White, 7 Wall. 700, which came before the Supreme Court in 1868. The question raised in that case was whether the State of Texas, by framing in Constitutional Convention the ordinance of secession, and by passing through its legislature Acts to give effect to such ordinance, ceased to be a State of the Union, and whether its citizens ceased to be citizens of the United States.

"The union of the States never was a purely artificial and arbitrary relation. . . . It received definite form and character and sanction by the Articles of Confederation. By these the Union was solemnly declared to be 'perpetual.' And when these Articles were found to be inadequate to the exigencies of the country the Constitution was ordained to form a more perfect union. It is difficult to convey the idea of indissoluble unity more clearly than by these words. What can be indissoluble if a perpetual union, made more perfect, is not? But the perpetuity and indissolubility of the Union by no means implies the loss of distinct and individual existence or of the right of self-government by the States. . . . It may be not unreasonably said that the preservation of the States and the maintenance of their governments are as much within the design and care of the Constitution as the preservation of the Union; that the Constitution in all its provisions looks to an indestructible union composed of indestructible States. When, therefore, Texas became one of the United States she entered into an indissoluble relation. . . . There was no place for reconsideration or revocation except through revolution or through the consent of the States. Considered therefore as transactions under the Constitution the ordinance of secession adopted by the Convention and ratified by a majority of the citizens of Texas was absolutely null and utterly without operation in law. The obligations of the State as a member of the Union and of every citizen of the State as a citizen of the United States remained perfect and unimpaired. The State did not cease to be a State nor her citizens to be citizens of the Union." (Per Chase, C.J., in Texas v. White, 7 Wall. 700.) Boyd's Const. Cases, p. 555.

The triumphant Federalists in the United States did not propose any amendment of the Constitution to remove doubts on the question raised by lawyers and revolutionary publicists. They denied that there was any doubt as to the perpetual duration of the Union. To propose an amendment declaring it indissoluble, after it had been so settled by the sword, would have been equal to an admission that such a doubt existed.

CANADA.—The Constitution of Canada does not contain any clause declaring the perpetuity or indissolubility of the Dominion. That Constitution is embodied in an Imperial Act, and, save with respect to certain matters of detail not affecting the fundamental features of the scheme, it can only be altered by the Imperial Parliament. No general power to amend the Constitution has been granted to the Parliament and people of Canada. Should they require to modify any constitutional provision, not within the jurisdiction of the Dominion, an application has to be made to the Imperial Parliament to effect the required legislation. Consequently, the Dominion is absolutely indissoluble so far as the Parliament and people of Canada are concerned. The Imperial Parliament, which created it, could at any time dissolve it. No clause in the Imperial Act declaring the Dominion indissoluble could have interfered with or limited the supreme sovereign power by which the Dominion was created. Nothing is more certain than that "a Parliament cannot so bind its successors, by the terms of any statute, as to limit the discretion of a future Parliament, and thereby disable the Legislature from entire freedom of action at any future time, when it might be needful to invoke the interposition of Parliament to legislate for the public welfare." (Todd, Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies, 2nd ed. p. 243.)

These considerations explain the circumstance that the Canadian Constitution contains no reference to the durability, or otherwise, of the Dominion. They do not account for the fact that, whilst the indissolubility of the Commonwealth is not affirmed by any clause in the Imperial Act, it is recited as an accepted principle in the preamble. Why was it placed in the preamble? The only reason which can be suggested, is that the Australian Parliament and people have a general power to amend the Constitution, and it may have been considered wise and prudent that, coupled with a right so great and important, there should be a reminder, placed in the fore-front of the deed of political partnership between the federating colonies, that the union, sealed by Imperial Parliamentary sanction, was intended by the contracting parties to be a lasting one, and that no alteration should be suggested or attempted inconsistent with the continuity of the Commonwealth as an integral part of the British Empire.

This phrase occurs in the preamble, and is not repeated, either in the clauses creating the Commonwealth or in the Constitution itself. It corresponds with similar words found in the preamble of the British North America Act (supra) and in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. It is a concrete and unequivocal acknowledgment of a principle which pervades the whole scheme of Government; harmony with the British Constitution and loyalty to the Queen as the visible central authority uniting the British Empire with its multitudinous peoples and its complex divisions of political power. It has been introduced rather out of an abundance of caution, than from any consideration that its omission might suggest a doubt or from any present idea of actual necessity.

Some years ago a few ardent but irresponsible advocates of Australian federation indulged in predictions that the time would inevitably come when Australia would separate from the mother country and become an independent Republic. Those ill-considered utterances caused, at the time, strong expressions of disapproval throughout the colonies, which effectually prevented the repetition of such suggestions, as being beyond the arena of serious contemplation and debate. Throughout the political campaign which preceded the election of the Federal Convention, not a solitary public writer or speaker seriously discussed the possibility, much less the probability, of separation.

Hence the words, "Under the Crown," have been inserted in the preamble to the Constitution, not as a protest against any growing sentiment adverse to the British connection, but partly to harmonize it with the Canadian precedent and partly because there was no reason for departure from the precedent of 1891.

In explanation of the appearance of the words in the preamble and their non-repetition in any of the enacting clauses or sections, it may be mentioned that though the words, "Under the Crown," are introduced in the shape of a recital of an apparently accepted and indisputable fact that the people have so agreed, and not in the shape of a command, coupled with a sanction, yet the origin of the Commonwealth and its form of government shows :—

1. That it has been established by the concurrence of the Queen.
2. That the Queen is an essential part of the Federal Parliament.
3. That the Queen is the head of the Federal Executive.
4. That the Queen is to be represented in the Commonwealth by a Governor-General.

These provisions are stronger than any formal affirmation in the preamble, as evidences and guarantees that the Commonwealth is an integral part of the Empire presided over by the wearer of the Triple Crown of England, Ireland, and Scotland—which, let us hope, it will continue to be so as long as that Empire endures. Although to some extent they are surplusage, as involving a recapitulation of what is otherwise provided in the Constitution, the words, "Under the Crown," standing as they do in the preamble to the Imperial Act, may hereafter be of service in answering arguments in favour of amending the Constitution by repealing the provisions above referred to. Strictly speaking, such amendments might be proposed, in the manner provided by the Constitution; they are not in terms prohibited by the Constitution. Should they be proposed, however, strong arguments against their constitutionality, and even their legality, would be available in the words of the preamble. It might be contended with great force that such amendments would be repugnant to the preamble; that they would at least involve a breach of one of the cardinal understandings or conventions of the Constitution, and, indeed, the argument might go so far as to assert that they would be ultra vires of the Constitution, as being destructive of the scheme of Union under the Crown contemplated in the preamble.

On the other hand, it would be urged that section 128 of the Constitution defines the procedure by which, and the limits within which, the Constitution may be altered; that the only limitation on the power of alteration is the one indicated at the end of the section, viz.:—That no alteration diminishing the proportionate representation of any State in either House of the Parliament or the minimum representation of a State in the House of Representatives, or altering the limits of a State, shall become law, unless the majority of the electors voting in that State affirm the proposed amendments. That is the only thing like an exception to, or a restriction on, the general power of amendment specified in the Constitution, and it might afford ground for the contention that according to the rule of construction, expressio unius exclusio alterius, no other limitation was intended. It might also be submitted that an alteration not contrary to any express provision in the covering clauses would be quite legal even though it were inconsistent with the preamble, and even though it were contrary to the obvious intentions of the plan of Government therein contemplated. It might be added that the preamble could not be utilized to cut down the general power to amend, and that if there were any inconsistency between an affirmation in the preamble and the power to amend, conferred by the Constitution, the enacting words must prevail.

To this the opponents of such amendments might rejoin by drawing attention to the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865 (28 and 29 Vic. c. 63), passed to remove doubts as to the validity of colonial laws; section 2 of which provides that any colonial law, repugnant to the provisions of any Act of Parliament extending to the Colony to which such law may relate, shall, to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be absolutely void and inoperative. An amendment of the Constitution of the Commonwealth would of course be a colonial law within the meaning of this section.

Probably such a question would not be so far developed by legislative action as to assume a form capable of being disussed in the Federal High Court. Even if any amendment, to the effect under consideration, were carried by an absolute majority in both Houses of the Federal Parliament—even if it were approved of by a majority of the electors and a majority of the States—it would still have to be reserved for the Royal assent. It is not likely that such assent would be given without the authority of the Imperial Parliament. If that Parliament, which created the Commonwealth and the Constitution of the Commonwealth, consented to a form of legislative and executive government which ignored the Crown, no trouble would arise. It is not likely that such consent would either be asked for or given, except in a combination of circumstances and a revolution of ideas and sympathies of which we can now form no possible conception.

§ 8. “United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.”

The composite nature of the United Kingdom created by the union of the Crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, presents interesting points of comparison and contrast with the form of federal union established by the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia. The United Kingdom is ruled by a single sovereign Parliament; but the identity of the component parts is by no means wholly lost, as will appear from a brief reference to the Acts of Union.

UNION OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.—Although the Crowns of England and Scotland were united upon the accession of James VI. of Scotland to the English throne, under the title of James I., in 1603, the two countries continued separate and distinct kingdoms, subject to the administration of two different executives and to the legislation of two independent Parliaments, for over one hundred years. The Union of the two kingdoms was, for many years, projected and discussed before the proposal assumed a tangible shape. During the reigns of Charles II. and James II., Commissioners were appointed in England to negotiate with Commissioners similarly appointed in Scotland in order to settle the terms of the Union, but no agreement was then arrived at. The realization of the manifest destiny of England and Scotland was reserved for the reign of Queen Anne.

By the Act of 1 Anne c. 8 (1702), authority was given for the appointment of a Commission representing England to meet a similar Commission representing Scotland to settle the Articles for the Union of the two kingdoms. The Commissioners met at Whitehall on 16th April, 1706, and they completed their labours and signed the treaty of Union on 22nd July following. The Treaty consisted of 25 Articles, of which the leading provisions were as follows:—

The Union.—That on 1st May, 1707, and for ever afterwards, the kingdoms of England and Scotland should be united into one kingdom by the name of Great Britain; that the succession to the throne of Great Britain should be vested in the Princess Sophia and her heirs according to the Act of Settlement passed by the English Parliament for that purpose; that there should be one Parliament for the whole kingdom.

Rights of Subjects.—That all the subjects should enjoy the same rights, immunities and privileges; have the same allowances, encouragements and drawbacks, and be under the same regulations and restrictions as to trade and commerce.

Trade and Finance.—That Scotland should not be charged with temporary duties on certain commodities; that the sum of £398,103 should be granted to Scotland as equivalent for such parts of the customs and excise charged upon that kingdom in consequence of the union, as would be applicable to the payment of the debts of England, according to the proportions which the customs and excise of Scotland bore to those of England; that as the revenues of Scotland should increase, a fair equivalent should be allowed for such proportion of the said increase as should be applicable to payment of the debts of England; that the sums to be thus paid should be employed in reducing the coin of Scotland to the standard and value of the English coin, in paying off the capital, stock and interest due to the proprietors of the African Company which should immediately be dissolved, in discharging all the public debts of the Kingdom of Scotland, in promoting and encouraging manufactures and fisheries under the direction of Commissioners to be appointed by Her Majesty and accountable to the Parliament of Great Britain.

Public Laws.—That laws relating to public right, policy, and civil government should be alike throughout the whole kingdom, and that no alteration should be made in laws which concerned private right except for the evident benefit of the people of Scotland.

Judicial System.—The Court of Session and all other courts of judicature in Scotland should remain as constituted, with all authority and privileges as before the union, subject only to the power of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

Local and Municipal.—All heritable offices, superiorities, heritable jurisdictions, offices for life, and jurisdictions for life, should remain the same as rights and properties as then enjoyed by the laws of Scotland. The rights and privileges of the royal boroughs in Scotland were to remain unaltered.

Representation in Imperial Parliament.—Scotland should be represented in Parliament by sixteen peers elected from Parliament to Parliament, and forty-five commoners to be elected in a manner to be settled by the Parliament of Scotland before its dissolution. All peers of Scotland and the successors to their honours and dignities should from and after the union take rank and precedence next and immediately after the English peers of the like orders and degrees at the time of the union, and before all English peers of the like orders and degrees as should be created after the union; they should be tried as peers of Great Britain, and enjoy all the privileges of peers of England except that of sitting in the House of Lords and the privileges depending thereon, and particularly the right of sitting upon the trials of peers.

The Crown.—The crown, sceptre and sword of state, the records of Parliaments, and all other records, rolls and registers whatsoever, should still remain as they were in Scotland.

Existing Laws.—All laws and statutes in either kingdom inconsistent with these terms of union should cease and be declared void by the Parliaments of the two kingdoms. The standard of weights and measures should be reduced to that of England. The laws relating to trades, customs and excise should be the same in England and Scotland; all other laws in Scotland to remain in force until altered by the Parliament of Great Britain.

Religion.—The establishment of the Presbyterian religion was guaranteed in Scotland, with a proviso that it should not at all concern the established religion of England; each religion was in its respective country to maintain its acknowledged ascendancy. It was further provided that every professor of a Scottish University should acknowledge, profess and subscribe to the 'Confessions of Faith;' these provisions relating to religion were asserted to be fundamental and essential conditions of the union in all time coming.

In the Scottish Parliament, October, 1706, every article in the treaty was bitterly resisted, but eventually it was carried by an overwhelming majority of votes, with but few alterations of any consequence; in fact the only additions made to the articles in the Scottish Parliament related to some trivial bounty on oats, which were then grown largely in Scotland; to regulations relating to salted meats and salted fish, and to the encouragement of the herring industry. In the final session of the Scottish Parliament an Act was passed to regulate the election of 16 peers and 45 commoners to represent Scotland in the British Parliament. On the 25th March, 1707, the Scottish Parliament rose never to reassemble.

On 28th January, 1707, the English Parliament met and was informed by the Queen that the Articles of Treaty with some slight modifications had been adopted by the Scottish Parliament. The terms of the treaty were fiercely resented in some quarters. High Churchmen denounced the establishment of two religions; others protested against the financial part of the arrangement. However, a Bill ratifying the treaty was passed by the English Parliament, amid vehement protests from a few, but without serious opposition. The result of the ratification of the treaty by the two Parliaments was the establishment of the one Kingdom of Great Britain in place of the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland. The Parliament of England and the Parliament of Scotland both ceased to exist, and the Parliament of Great Britain took their place. (6 Anne c. 11.)

“No change ever took place under more violent or general opposition, none in which more evils and calamities were prognosticated. The Scotch believed that their trade would be destroyed, their nation oppressed, and their country altogether ruined through the overwhelming influence of England. But if we look at the condition of Scotland now—at the increase of its population, the increase of its wealth and comfort, the growth of its towns, the extension of its trade and manufactures—there is scarcely anything so striking in the history of the world as the wonderful advance of Scotland since and in consequence of the union. If we look at the vast numbers of Scotch who have settled in England and in all the colonies, at the numbers who have located themselves in eminent places in the literature, law, and government of England, how wonderful is the contrast betwixt the outcry against the union and the results! But to all parts of the Empire the union has been scarcely less beneficial by the peace, unity, and strength which it has conferred, and by the infusion of Scotch enterprise, industry, and perseverance into the texture of the English character. What Defoe says of the treaty is undoubtedly true. It is one of the greatest measures and most ably-framed which ever distinguished any reign or country. ‘I shall not,’ says that great writer, ‘descend to encomiums on the persons of these treaters, for I am not about to write a panegyric here, but an impartial and unbiassed history of fact, but since the gentlemen have been illtreated, especially in Scotland—charged with strange things, and exposed in print by some who had nothing but their aversion of the treaty to move them to maltreat them, I must be allowed on all occasions to do them justice in the process of this story. And I must own that generally speaking, they were persons of the greatest probity, the best characters, and the stoutest adherents to the true interests of their country: so their abilities will appear in every step taken in so great a work; the bringing it to so good a conclusion and that in so little time, the rendering it in so concise a form and so fixing it that when all the obstruction imaginable was made to it afterwards in the Parliament of Scotland, the mountains of objections that first aroused the world proved such mole-hills, were so easily removed, raised so much noise, and amounted to so little in substance that, after all was granted that could in reason be demanded, the amendments were so few and of so little weight, that there was not one thing material enough to obtain a negative in the English Parliament.’” (Cassell’s Hist. of Eng., IV., p. 225.)

By the Reform Act of 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 45) the number of Scotch members in the House of Commons was increased to 53 in all, and by the Reform Act of 1867 (30 and 31 Vic. c. 102) that number was increased to 60, whilst by the redistribution of seats in 1885 (48 Vic. c. 3) Scotland was allotted 12 additional seats, making in all 72 members.

UNION OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.—In the reign of Henry II. (1172-3) Ireland became a Dominion or Lordship of the King of England, who was styled ‘Domivus Hiberniæ.’ Since then the Crown has been continuously represented in Ireland by an Administrative Official under the varying names of Chief Governor, Justiciary, Lord Deputy and Lord Lieutenant. The Lordship of Ireland was eventually converted into a kingdom, and in 1542 the King of England became King of Ireland; that title was conferred on him by an Irish Act, 33 Henry VIII, Ir. c. 1., and was recognized by an English Act, 35 Henry VIII. c. 3. From that period the Crown of Ireland became inseparably annexed to the Crown of England.

Ireland may be deemed to have had legislative assemblies or councils similar to those in England, based on the principle of elective representation, from the year 1295. Those assemblies or councils gradually developed into a Parliament, composed, according to the English model, of a House of Lords and a House of Commons. There were, however, several serious limitations on the authority of the Irish Parliament; (1) internal restraints in the shape of the Irish Privy Council, and restrictive regulations self-imposed by the Irish Parliament, under the dominating influences of the executive; and (2) external restraints in the competing authority of the English Parliament. In 10 Hen. VII. (1495) an Act was passed by the Irish Parliament called "Poyning's Law;" taking its name from Sir Edward Poyning, the Chief Governor. This law provided that no Parliament should be convened in Ireland until the causes and considerations thereof, and all such measures as were proposed to be introduced and all such Acts as were proposed to be passed, were previously certified by both Houses to the King, and the King's license for the holding of the Parliament was issued; and only such business as was previously approved of by the King could be introduced into the Parliament and dealt with by it when it was assembled. This greatly contracted the authority of the Irish Parliament, and, in time, nothing was left to it but the power to reject without the power to initiate or amend Bills.

In addition to this internal limitation, the Irish Parliament was restrained, in its legislative action, by a claim put forward by the English Parliament that it had a concurrent, if not a paramount, jurisdiction over, and right to legislate for, Ireland; it being contended that the authority of the Irish Parliament was not exclusive but secondary and subordinate. In the reigns of Charles II., William III., and Anne, several statutes were passed in England expressly binding Ireland, such as the Navigation Act, the Woollen Act, and the Tobacco Act. Despite protests, the English Parliament continued to legislate for Ireland. Especially in the matter of foreign trade, the Parliament of England, and afterwards the Parliament of Great Britain, claimed the right to legislate for the whole of the British Isles, and at length the Act of 6 Geo. I. c. 5 (1719) was passed, declaring that Ireland was a subordinate kingdom, and that the Parliament of Great Britain had full power to bind the people of Ireland. In 1782, however, the legislative independence of the Irish Parliament was restored by three statutes. (1) By 22 Geo. III. c. 53 (1782), the Act of 6 Geo. I. c. 5 was repealed. (2) By 23 Geo. III. c. 28 (1783), the right of the Irish people to be bound only by the Acts of the Irish Parliament was affirmed in these words:—"The right claimed by the people of Ireland to be bound only by laws enacted by His Majesty and the Parliament of that kingdom in all cases whatsoever, and to have all actions and suits instituted in that kingdom decided in His Majesty's courts there finally and without appeal from thence, is established and ascertained for ever." (3) By 21 and 22 Geo. III. Ir. c. 47 (1781), the Crown assented to a modification of Poyning's Law, and thus freed the Irish Parliament from its self-imposed restraints, and from the control of the Privy Council.

After 1782, as before, the Irish Parliament had no control of the Executive, which was vested in the Lord-Lieutenant and his Chief Secretary, who were nominated by the British Government. The King, as King of Great Britain, acted on the advice of his Ministers; as King of Ireland, on the advice of the Irish Executive. The views and interests of England might seriously differ from those of Ireland on grave questions, such as peace and war, trade and commerce. The Irish Parliament, however, whilst it had no voice in such great issues, could not be forced to raise men or money to carry on a war. A conspicuous defect of such a complicated distribution of sovereign power was that it was unaccompanied by any provisions for the settlement of deadlocks or for reconciling differences that might arise between the two kingdoms.

The circumstances that led up to the passage of the Act of Union necessarily belong to the political history of Ireland. By the Irish Act, 40 Geo. III. Ir. c. 38, and by the British Act, 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 67 (1800) the Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland became united into one Kingdom under the name of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The Parliaments of Great Britain and of Ireland became merged in one Imperial Parliament of the United Kingdom. Some of the chief Articles of this great statute, condensed from Tomlins' Law Dictionary, may be reproduced:--

The Union.—The kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland shall after 1st January, 1801, and for ever, be united into one kingdom, by the name of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.—Art. I.

The Crown.—The succession to the Crown of the United Kingdom shall continue limited and settled in the same manner as the succession to the Crown of Great Britain and Ireland stands limited and settled according to the existing laws, and to the Terms of Union between Great Britain and Scotland.—Art. II.

The Executive.—The Act of Union made no alteration in the Constitution of the Irish Executive, which still consists of a Lord Lieutenant, assisted by the Privy Council of Ireland.—Art. II.

Parliament.—The United Kingdom to be represented in one Parliament. Four Lords Spiritual of Ireland, by rotation of Sessions, viz.—One of the four Archbishops, and three of the eighteen bishops, and 28 Lords Temporal of Ireland (elected for life, by the Peers of Ireland), shall sit in the House of Lords of the Parliament of the United Kingdom; and in the House of Commons, 100 Commoners; two for each of the 32 counties in Ireland; two for Dublin; two for Cork; one for Trinity College, Dublin; and one for each of the 31 most considerable cities, towns, and boroughs.—Arts. III.-IV.

Ecclesiastical.—The Churches of England and Ireland shall be united into one Protestant Episcopal Church to be called “The United Church of England and Ireland,” according to the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church of England. The Church of Scotland to remain as under the Union of that Kingdom.—Art. V.

Commerce.—The subjects of Great Britain and Ireland shall be entitled to the same privileges, and be on the same footing as to encouragements and bounties on the like articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country respectively, and generally in respect of trade and navigation in the ports and places in the United Kingdom, and its dependencies; and in all foreign treaties Irish subjects shall be put on the same footing as subjects of Great Britain. All prohibitions and bounties on the export of articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country to the other, shall cease. All articles, the growth, produce or manufacture of either country (not enumerated and subjected by the Act to specific duties) shall be imported into each country from the other free of duty, except countervailing duties. For 20 years from the Union certain articles were subjected to specified duties.

National Debt.—By Article VII. it was provided that the charge of the separate national debt of either country before the Union should continue to be separately defrayed by the respective countries.—Art. VII.

Existing Laws.—All laws in force at the time of the Union, and all courts, civil and ecclesiastical, within the respective kingdoms, shall remain as established, subject to future alterations by the United Parliament. All writs of error and appeals (determinable in the House of Lords of either kingdom) shall be decided by the House of Lords of the United Kingdom. The Instance Court of Admiralty in Ireland shall continue, with appeals to the delegates in Chancery there.—Art. VII.

§ 9. “Under the Constitution.”

The words, “Under the Constitution,” imply substantial subjection. The Commonwealth is a political community, carved out of the British empire and endowed through its Constitution with a defined quota of self-governing powers. Those powers are delegated by and derived from the British Parliament, and they are to be held, enjoyed, and exercised by the people of the Commonwealth in the manner prescribed by the grant, subject—(1) to the supreme British Sovereignty (under the Crown), and (2) to the Constitution of the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth is consequently under a double subjection. It is subject in the first place to the British Parliament, which, as the ultimate sovereign authority of the Empire, has the legal power to legislate for the Commonwealth as a part of the Empire, and even to amend or repeal the Constitution of the Commonwealth. The grant of a Constitution to any dependency of the Empire is, however, a practical guarantee that no Imperial legislation conflicting with such grant will be passed except at the express request and with the concurrence of the dependency.

On a few subjects of specially Imperial concern, and as to which uniformity of regulation is specially important, the Imperial Parliament still occasionally legislates for all the Queen's Dominions; see for instance the Copyright Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vic. c. 45); parts of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vic. c. 60) and the Privy Council Acts. Such legislation when expressly extended to the Colonies will be as binding on the Parliament and people of the Commonwealth as is the Constitution itself. (See Lefroy, Leg. Power in Canada, p. 208.) In the second place, it is under a real subjection to the Constitution, as a living central force, continuously in action, keeping the ruling organs of the federated community within the respective spheres mapped out by the Constitution, and checking invasions and encroachments beyond the limits of those spheres. Not only the Federal Government, but the Governments of the States, will be under the Federal Constitution to the extent to which the Constitution limits their powers, and to the extent to which the power of amendment may be exercised. The Constitution will therefore be the supreme law of the land binding the people of the Commonwealth, the Federal Parliament, and all the governing agencies and instruments of the Commonwealth to the extent expressed.

§ 10. "Hereby Established."

The Commonwealth is not established and the Constitution does not take effect until the date specified in the Queen's proclamation issued under Clauses 3 and 4. This proclamation was required to be issued within one year after the passing of the Act of the Imperial Parliament.

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty,¹¹ by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual¹² and Temporal,¹³ and Commons,¹⁴ in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same,¹⁵ as follows:—

UNITED STATES.—We the People of the United States, . . . do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America. [Preamble.]

CANADA.—Be it therefore enacted and declared by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:— [Preamble.]

GERMANY.—His Majesty, the King of Prussia, in the name of the North German Confederation, His Majesty the King of Bavaria, His Majesty the King of Wurtenburg, His Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Baden, and His Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Hesse and by Rhine for those parts of the Grand Duchy of Hesse which are situated south of the Main, conclude an eternal alliance. . . . This Confederation shall bear the name of the German Empire, and shall have the following Constitution:— [Preamble.]

SWITZERLAND.—In the name of Almighty God. The Swiss Confederation, . . . has adopted the Federal Constitution following:— [Preamble.]

§ 11. "By the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty."

The enacting words, showing the Authority by which the Commonwealth is created, are in the form in which Acts of Parliament have been framed from a remote period of English history. According to the theory of the Constitution the Queen is the source of law, the Queen makes new laws, the Queen alters or repeals old laws, subject only to the condition that this supreme power must be exercised in Parliament and not otherwise. Every Act of Parliament bears on its face the stamp and evidence of its royal authority. It springs from the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty. It is in the Crown, and not in Parliament, that legislative authority is, according to Constitutional theory, directly vested. Parliament is the body assigned by law to advise the Crown in matters of legislation, and the Crown could not legally legislate without the advice and consent of Parliament. "It is, however, constitutionally and theoretically true that the legislative function resides in Queen Victoria no less than it resided in William the Conqueror. The conditions and limitations under which that power is exercisable have indeed been profoundly modified." (Hearn's Government of England, p. 51.) Several stages in the history of the Royal legislative function, and in the mode of its initiation and its exercise, may be summarized:—

LEGISLATION BY THE KING IN COUNCIL.—In the earliest periods of English history of which we have any authentic records, we find that both the subjects of legislation and the mode of dealing with them rested entirely with the King and his Council of immediate advisers and great men; the King presiding at the Council in person, preparing and presenting the matters for consideration, and sharing in the deliberations of the Council. From time immemorial the Crown has always been assisted by a consultative or advisory body under the fluctuating names of "The Michel Synoth," or Great Council; "The Michel Gemot," or Great Meeting; "The Witena Gemot," or Meeting of Wise Men. In Latin it was variously styled the Commune Concilium Regni; the Magnum Concilium; and the Curia Regis Magna. Long before the Norman conquest all matters of public importance were debated and settled by the King in the Great Council of the realm. (Freeman's Growth of the English Constitution, pp. 40 and 53.)

This practice seems to have been universal among the Northern nations, and particularly among the Teutonic tribes, in whose primitive institutions, as described by Tacitus, there can be discerned the germs which afterwards expanded into the elaborate mechanism of representative and parliamentary government. In the very earliest accounts of these tribes we find the community generally ruled by a chief or prince with the advice and consent of the assembled nobles and people. This system was afterwards carried by the Germans into all the countries of Europe which they over-ran upon the dissolution of the Roman Empire. (Tomlin's British Law, vol. II. [Parliament]; Hearn's Government of England, p. 416.) So early as the reigns of Ina, King of the West Saxons; Offa, King of the Mercians; Ethelbert, King of Kent, instances occur of the meeting of such a Council "to consider the affairs of the kingdom and to advise the king to make new laws as well as to mend old ones."

After the union of the several realms of the Heptarchy, King Alfred ordained for a perpetual usage, that these Councils should meet twice in the year, or oftener, if need be, to treat of the government of the people; "how they should keep themselves from sin, should live in quiet, and should receive right." Our succeeding Saxon and Danish monarchs frequently held councils of this sort, as appears from their respective codes of laws; the title whereof usually speak them to be enacted, either by the King with the advice of his Witena-gemot, or wise men, or by these sages with advice of the King, or lastly, by both together. There is also no doubt but that these great councils were occasionally held under the first princes of the Norman line. Glanvil, who wrote in the reign of Henry II., speaking of a particular amount of an amercement in the Sheriff's Court, says, "It had never yet been ascertained by the General Assizes or Assemblies, but was left to the custom of particular counties." (Glanvil, b. 9, c. 10.) Here the general assizes are spoken of as a meeting well known, and its statutes or decisions are put in a manifest contradistinction to custom, or the common law.—Tomlin's B. L. vol. II. (Parl.).

LEGISLATION BY THE KING ON PETITION.—The "Great Council," whose concurrence in legislation was thus required, was the historical original of the House of Lords. Long after the sole right of the Commons to grant supplies to the Crown was established, there was no recognition of their right to be consulted in matters of general legislation. The "power of the purse," however, enabled them to claim legislation for the redress of grievances; and in 1309, early in the reign of Edward II., we find them granting a subsidy "upon this condition, that the King should take advice and grant redress upon certain articles, in which their grievances were set forth." Thirteen years later their right to concur in all legislation was affirmed. The Act of 15 Edward II. (1322) contains a clause which is said to be the first formal recognition of our present legislative system, viz., "the matters which are to be established for the estate of our Lord the King and of His Heirs and for the estate of the realm and of the people, shall be treated, accorded and established in Parliaments by our Lord the King and by the assent of prelates, earls and barons, and the commonalty of the realm, according as it hath been heretofore accustomed." (Taswell-Langmead, p. 269.) Almost all the Acts passed during the reign of Edward III. (1327-1377) express in some shape the concurrence of the Lords and of the Commons. At the same time they were the laws of the King, made by the King, at the request of or on the petition of the people or communities of the people with the assent of the Lords "for the common benefit of the people of the realm." (Hearn's Gov. of Eng. 54.)

LEGISLATION BY THE KING, ON BILL PRESENTED BY PARLIAMENT.—The third period marks the transition from legislation preceded by petition, to the modern form of legislation by Bill, presented to the Crown by Parliament. The Commons, disappointed at the frequent neglect of their petitions, and equally aggrieved by the frequent passage of laws, not according to the terms of their petitions, adopted a new expedient; they submitted for the Royal assent "a petition containing in itself the form of a bill." This instrument, which contained the precise provisions that they desired, was the identical document on which the Royal fiat was placed. No room was thus left for fraud or misunderstanding. But an unforeseen and remarkable consequence followed. It became difficult, if not altogether impossible, for the Crown to amend the petition thus presented. When a request was made in so precise a form, nothing remained but either to assent to it or to reject it as a whole. Hence, although a few exceptions occur in the reign of Edward IV., the practice was established, at all events before the accession of the Tudors, that the Royal assent should be given to or withheld from the precise advice tendered to the King by his Parliament. (Hearn's Gov. of Eng. p. 59.)

One of the oldest Acts in which this expression occurs is the Statute of 4 Hen. IV. (1402), which begins—"To the honour of God and Holy Church, and for the common wealth and profit of all the realm of England, our Lord the King, by the assent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and at the special instance and request of the Commons, assembled at the Parliament holden at Westminster the morrow after the feast of St. Michael, the fourth year of his reign, hath ordained and established certain statutes and ordinances by the manner as followeth." (Stat. Rev. Ed., 1870, Vol. I., p. 272.) This form was used in all the Acts of Henry IV. It was followed in the Acts of Henry V., and with few exceptions it became the regular method of referring to the ecclesiastical element in the House of Lords. This reference to "Lords Spiritual" has led to the impression, in the minds of a large number of writers, that they constitute one of three estates of the realm. That is not so. The Lords Spiritual, in reality, form a component part of the House of Lords, which is, as a whole, only one of the estates. Another equally incorrect assumption, frequently met with, is that the Crown represents one of the three estates.

THE THREE ESTATES.—Among most of the nations of Western Europe, it was in the early and middle ages customary to consider a political community as divided into three orders or estates. In England it was generally held during a part of that period that the nobility, the clergy, and the commons, constituted the three states of which the Parliamentary Assembly was composed. The Crown shared in the sovereignty with the Parliamentary body, but it was not an estate.

THE CLERGY AS AN ESTATE.—When William the Conqueror assumed the Government of England, he changed the spiritual tenure of Frankalmoign or free alms under which the bishops, mitred abbots, and other Spiritual Lords held their land, in Saxon times, into feudal tenure by barony. This tenure subjected the ecclesiastical estate to civil charges, pecuniary claims, assessments and aids from which they were before exempt. The inferior clergy and owners of religious houses, however, continued to hold their lands on Frankalmoign, and thus free from liability to feudal burdens and taxation. As an incident of their right to the enjoyment of a succession to their baronies and of their consequent liability to feudal obligations, the bishops and abbots were summoned to attend the sittings of the King's Great Council (Magnum Concilium), which afterwards developed into the House of Lords, and they have ever since been allowed the privilege of membership of that order under the name, finally recognized, of the "Lords Spiritual." The Lords Spiritual, however, never constituted an estate or assembly of the clergy as a whole. The parochial clergy and owners of religious houses being legally exempt from taxation, and protected by law as well as by the sanctity of their order, the King could not tax them without their consent. An expedient was therefore adopted for the purpose of obtaining their consent. A special assembly, or convocation, was organized in which the mass of the clergy could be officially represented by men of their own class, and of their own selection, charged with the duty of deciding the manner and measure of their taxation in aid of the King's revenue.

In the "Model Parliament" of 1295 (23 Edw. I.) the clergy were for the first time represented as one of the three estates in a really national Legislature. In the Parliamentary writ of summons served on every bishop, requiring his attendance in the King's Great Council, he was "premonished" to cause the Dean of his Cathedral Church and the Archdeacon of his Diocese in person, and the chapter and the parish clergy of the Diocese, by their proctors, to attend the Parliament and there take part in the deliberations of the assembly of the clergy. This command to the bishops, usually known from its initial word as the "Premunientes Clause," was first issued in 1295; it was uniformly issued after 1354, and it was generally obeyed by the formal election of proctors until the Reformation (Hen. VIII. 1509-1547). (Hearn's Gov. of Eng. p. 432.)

The inferior clergy, however, though always summoned under the writ of premonientes, seldom attended. They preferred to keep aloof from secular legislation, and to tax themselves in their own Convocation. In the 14th century their attendance ceased altogether; though in Convocation they still formed a Legislative Council, by whose advice and consent alone, without that of the growing Commons, Edward III. and Richard II. passed laws, on ecclesiastical matters, to bind the laity. At last, in 1664, without any special legislative enactment, the practice of special ecclesiastical taxation ceased, and the lower clergy merged in the general body of the Commons. (Hallam, Middle Ages, III., 137; Taswell-Langmead, p. 250.) Thus the clergy ceased to be an estate of the realm, and now there are only two estates, namely, the Lords and the Commons, forming one Parliament in which the clergy are represented in common with the rest of the nation.

At common law the clergy were not qualified to vote at elections for the House of Commons, nor were they qualified to be elected members of that House; the reason being that they were of a distinct and separate estate, and that one estate could not take part in the political deliberations of another. By the Acts of 10 Anne c. 31, and 18 Geo. II. c. 18, clergymen who are not members of the House of Lords have been conceded the right to vote; and by 33 and 34 Vic. c. 91 (1870) clergymen may, by deed, renounce their clerical capacity and become qualified for election as members of the House of Commons and other public bodies.

§ 13. "And Temporal."

The Lords Temporal consist of all the peers of the realm, by whatever title of nobility distinguished. Bishops are not peers; they, with the peers, form the Lords of Parliament or the House of Lords as an integrated legislative chamber. The origin of this body has been traced to the Great Council (Magnum Concilium), consisting of the nobles, tenants-in-chief, principal landowners and prelates, known before the Norman conquest as "Witena-gemot," and after that event as the "Curia Regis," which assembled to advise the King in matters of legislation and administration. The peerage of the present day is the descendant of the old Great Council of the King. (Hearn's Gov. of Eng. p. 144.)

The House of Lords now consists of members who hold their seats either—(1) by hereditary right, (2) by the creation of the reigning sovereign, (3) by virtue of their office, such as English Bishops, (4) by election for life, such as Irish peers, of whom there are twenty-eight, (5) by election for the duration of a Parliament, such as the Scotch representative peers, of whom there are sixteen. In 1830, the number of peers on the roll of Parliament was 401; in 1899, the number had increased to 591; about two-thirds of the hereditary peerages at present in existence were created during the present century. (Statesmen's Year Book, 1900, p. 7.)

§ 14. "And Commons."

ORIGIN.—It would be difficult to condense into a brief note an adequate summary of the beginnings of that great and renowned parliamentary assembly whose name is thus officially given in the Imperial Act. The House of Commons was originally the legislative chamber in which were represented, not the common people of England, nor the English churls, nor the English plebeians, as those expressions are generally understood, but the various communities (Communitates) of the Kingdom. Communitates meant aggregations of persons residing in the same neighbourhood, entitled to the enjoyment of common rights, subject to common duties and burdens, having common interests; groups of population organized and localized; assemblages of persons liable to the same feudal obligations, and occupying the same relation to the King. Foremost in numerical strength among these Communitates were—(1) the communities of the counties, which included the knights of the shires, formerly the lesser barons and lesser Crown vassals; and (2) the communities of the cities, towns and boroughs, including the citizens and burgesses thereof. According to the theory of the Constitution, even in the middle ages, the maxim prevailed that "what touched all should be approved by all;" that no change should be made in a law affecting any class, order or community, and certainly that no tax could be imposed, without the consent of the group of persons immediately concerned. Hence the knights of the shires, when they became differentiated from the greater barons, who were summoned in person by special writ to attend the Magnum Concilium, began to meet, either in person or through their delegates, in an assembly of their own, to vote aids to the Crown and petition for redress of grievances. Similarly, the cities and boroughs, being called upon by the King to grant aids and subsidies, sent delegates to represent them and to do their business in a gathering of their own.

The growth of these two middle classes, and their gradual representation for the discharge of public functions, was at times actually encouraged by the Crown in order to facilitate the collection of revenue or to counterbalance the increasing influence of the barons and prelates; at other times the popular tendency was supported by the leaders of the nobility, in order to gain support in their contests against the Crown.

ELECTION AND REPRESENTATION.—"The ideas of election and representation, both separately and in combination, had been familiar to the nation, in its legal and fiscal system, long before they were applied to the Constitution of the National Parliament. The English Kingship was always in theory, and to a great extent in practice, elective. The bishops and abbots were supposed to be elected by the clergy, of whom they were the representatives. In the local courts of the hundred and the shire, the reeve and four men attended as representatives from each township; and the twelve assessors of the sheriff represented the judicial opinion of the whole shire." (Taswell-Langmead, p. 229.) It must be remembered that the national Government was a mere skeleton, whilst county government was highly organized; so that the extension of the representative system to the Parliament meant the centralization of popular institutions.

The Great Council was not a representative, but a constituent body. All the King's immediate tenants—both the greater barons and the lesser barons, or knights—had a right to attend. This right is expressly recognized by Magna Charta, by which the King promised, when calling a Council for the granting of extraordinary feudal aids, to summon all tenants-in-chief—the greater barons (lay and spiritual) individually, and the others by writs addressed to the sheriff. This difference in the mode of summons—which had existed for some time previously—marks the inferior position of the lesser barons, or knights. As a matter of fact, owing to the difficulty of attendance, their right gradually became more formal than real; until the Great Council became practically an assembly of the greater barons. (Taswell-Langmead, p. 226.)

The financial necessities of the Crown, however, required that the knights should attend, in person or by deputy; and the representative system already existing in the counties was naturally resorted to for this purpose. The first instance of the extension of the representative system to the National Council was at the Council of St. Albans, in 1213, which was attended not only by the bishops and barons, but also by the reeve and four men from each township on the royal demesne. Four instances of county representation, by writs directing the sheriff of each county to send to the Council a certain number of "discreet knights of the shire," occur before Simon de Montfort's famous Parliament of 1265. (Taswell-Langmead, pp. 230-5.)

The knights of the shire, however, representing as they did the landed gentry, were only a portion of the commonalty. The towns had already risen to wealth, liberty, and importance; and the representation of the prosperous and progressive class of burghers was necessary as a basis for really popular institutions.

To Simon de Montfort, in the reign of Henry III., belongs the glory of taking a step which led to the systematic representation of the boroughs as well as the counties. In December, 1264, he laid the foundations of the House of Commons, by issuing writs directing the sheriffs to return not only two knights from each shire, but also two citizens from each city, and two burgesses from each borough. (Hearn's Govt. of Eng., p. 48.) This famous Parliament met at London on 20th January, 1265, to deal not merely with the granting of supplies, but with the business of the nation generally. (Gneist, Eng. Const., p. 270.)

At the battle of Evesham, which took place shortly afterwards, Simon de Montfort was killed by the Royalist troops, and the party of the barons was broken up, but the precedents established during his triumphant career were never obliterated. During this period the county freeholders were, for the first time, associated with the mercantile and trading community, in a body which was destined within less than 100 years to become organized in strength and individuality, and to assume its position as the popular chamber in a national Parliamentary system. The precedent of 1265, although it was not regularly followed for many years afterwards, distinctly foreshadows the dawning outlines of the House of Commons.

There was a transition period of 30 years before Edward I.'s "Model Parliament" in 1295, in which the three estates were represented, and which sat and voted in three bodies—the knights sitting with the greater barons, and the clergy and burgesses sitting separately. The last great stage in the evolution of the House of Commons was the gradual detachment of the knights from the greater barons, their union with the burgesses, and the consequent division of Parliament into two Houses; the House of Lords being the aristocratic and official chamber, and the House of Commons the representative chamber, consisting, as it does to this day, of representatives of the shires and representatives of the boroughs. The exact date of this development is uncertain, but it was certainly complete in the year 1347. (Taswell-Langmead, p. 262.) During the long reign of Edward III. (1327-77) the power of the Commons was consolidated, and they succeeded in establishing the three great principles that taxation without the consent of Parliament is illegal, that the concurrence of both Houses is necessary for legislation, and that the Commons have a right to inquire into abuses of administration. Two events, in particular, occurred which marked the complete consolidation of the once separate communities, by their representation in a united House, as well as by the assimilation and unity of the taxpayers in the counties, cities, and towns; one was in 51 Edw. III. (1378), the appointment of a permanent Speaker, Sir Thomas Hungerford; and the other was the imposition of a poll-tax on every adult person in the kingdom, except beggars. (Hearn's Gov. of Eng. 432; Gneist, Eng. Parl., 171.)

THE STATUTE OF GLOUCESTER.—The Act 9 Hen. IV. (1407) contains the first authoritative recognition and delimitation of the several functions of the King, Lords and Commons, and establishes the principle that the parliamentary bodies may deliberate apart from the King. "It shall be lawful for the Lords to treat among themselves, in the absence of the King, respecting the state of the Realm, and about the necessary means to help. And in like manner it shall be lawful for the Commons to advise among themselves in respect of the before-mentioned state, and means, &c. Saving always that the Lords, on their part, shall not report to the King any matter resolved on by the Commons, and assented to by the Lords, before the Lords and Commons have come to one opinion and concurrence in such matter, and then in the wonted way and form, to wit, through the mouth of the Speaker." (Gneist, Eng. Parl., p. 172.)

QUALIFICATION OF ELECTORS.—Laws relating to the qualification of electors are first met with during the reigns of Henry IV. and Henry VI. At first the deputies from the counties were nominated or appointed at general public meetings, held in connection with the County Courts, presided over and conducted by sheriffs, appointed by the King, and attended by all free men, or at least all freeholders. Proposals were put to these gatherings and carried by the assent and acclamation of those present, "termed the bystanders." This custom is said to have been a survival of the ancient method of doing public business, followed in those antique German assemblies described by Tacitus, in which the people of the community expressed by "acclamation" their approval of propositions submitted by their leaders. There is historical evidence that during the reigns of Edward I. and Edward II. all the freeholders of the counties, without regard to the tenure or value of their lands, were accustomed to vote at such meetings. The writs were directed to the sheriffs to hold the elections in "full county," when all the freeholders were in duty bound to attend.

By 7 Hen. IV. c. 15 (1405), a uniform and general franchise for the county was distinctly recognised; "all persons present at the County Court, as well as suitors duly summoned for any cause or otherwise," were required to attend to take part in a choice of members, and to contribute towards the wages of the chosen representatives, fixed at 4s. per day.

The first contraction of the county franchise is found in 8 Hen. VI. c. 7 (1429), which provided "that in future only freeholders of 40s. income shall take part in the elections." Shortly afterwards, by 10 Hen. VI. c. 2, it was provided that only 40s. freeholders "within the county" should be entitled to vote at county elections. By 23 Hen. VI. c. 14, it was enacted "that only notable knights and notable esquires and gentlemen of the county are to be elected, who might become knights (consequently possessed of £20 income from land), but not any yeomen thereunder." The reasons for these restrictive laws were thus stated in one of the above statutes: "that elections of the delegates have of late been made from among too large a number of people living in the same county, most of them having small fortunes, but fancying that each had the like right to vote as the knights and esquires, which may easily occasion murder and rebellion, strife and dispute, between the gentlemen and the rest of the people, if measures be not speedily taken to improve this state of things." (Gneist, Eng. Parl., p. 176.)

Those limitations in the county franchise lasted down to the Reform Act 2 and 3 Wm. IV. c. 45 (1832). With respect to the franchise for cities, towns, and boroughs, some difference of opinion exists, and the subject is somewhat obscured by the absence of definite legislative provisions. The right to take part in elections in these communities seems to have depended upon charters, writs, customs, and municipal constitutions, in force in the respective places which had the right of returning members. It is believed by competent authorities that the old members for cities, towns, and boroughs were chosen by the free inhabitants and householders of those localities who were liable to borough rates (scot and lot). On the other hand Lord Holt was of opinion that only those were burgesses who held that description of freehold known as "burgage tenure," the original tenure under which freeholds in town, "formerly parts of the ancient demesne of the Crown," were held; under this system the right of voting was annexed to some existing tenement or house or to some spot of ground upon which a house had stood in ancient times. But it seems that, whatever was the original qualification, the control of elections in cities and towns eventually fell into the hands of Municipal Corporations, or wealthy landowners; hence the origin of so-called "rotten boroughs." The question as to who were, or ought to be, electors in boroughs, frequently became the subject of debates in the House of Commons. In 22 Ja. I. a resolution was passed to the effect that, where there was no charter or custom to the contrary, the election in boroughs was to be made by all the householders, and not by the freeholders only. The defects, abuses and anomalies were not attacked until most of them were swept away by the Reform Act, 1832.

By the Reform Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Wm. IV. c. 45), important changes were made, both in the qualifications of electors and in the delimitation of constituencies. "The number of English county constituencies was increased from 52 to 82; 56 boroughs, containing a population of less than 2,000 each, were totally disfranchised, and 31 other boroughs, of less than 4,000 each, were required to send one representative instead of two. On the other hand, 22 new boroughs acquired the right to return two members, and 24 to return one member. In Scotland the town members were increased from 13 to 23—making 53 in all; while the Irish representatives were increased from 100 to 103. The next great change in the constituency of the House of Commons was made by the Reform Act of 1867-68 (30 and 31 Vic. c. 102). By this Act England and Wales were allotted 493 members, and Scotland 60, while the number for Ireland remained unaltered, and household suffrage was conferred on boroughs in England and Scotland. A still greater reform was effected by the Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 Vic. c. 3), and the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vic. c. 23). The former introduced a 'service franchise,' extending to householders and lodgers in counties the suffrages which in 1867 had been conferred upon householders and lodgers in boroughs, and placed the three Kingdoms on a footing of equality as regards electoral qualifications; while the latter made a new division of the United Kingdom into county and borough constituencies, and raised the total number of members to 670, England receiving 6 new members, and Scotland 12." (Statesmen's Year Book, 1900, p. 7.)

§ 15. "And by the Authority of the Same."

These words clearly show that, although on the face of the Act the Queen figures as the chief legislator, the Auctoritas by which the Constitution has been created is blended and conjoined in the Queen in Parliament. This is the modern practice in connection with the political organization of colonies and in the grant to them of the institutions of self-government. In the early stages of English and British colonization, the Crown, without parliamentary sanction, expressed or implied, but in the exercise of its admitted prerogative, was accustomed to grant to newly settled, ceded, or conquered provinces, Patents and Charters, containing directly or indirectly authority to establish local Legislative Assemblies endowed with the power to pass laws for the peace, order and good government of such countries:—

"On obtaining a country, or colony, the Crown has sometimes thought fit, by particular express provisions under the Great Seal, to create and form the several parts of the Constitution of a new Government; and at other times has only granted general powers to the Governor to frame such a Constitution, as he should think fit, with the advice of a Council, consisting of a certain number of the most competent inhabitants, subject to the approbation or disallowance of the Crown. In most instances there are three departments forming the colonial government, each of which deserves attention. 1st. The governor, who derives power from, and is substantially a mere servant or deputy of, the Crown, appointed by commission under the Great Seal. The criterion for his rules of conduct are the king's instructions, under the sign-manual. 2nd. The colonial councils, which derive their authority, both executive and legislative, from the king's instructions to the governor. 3rd. The representative assemblies chosen by certain classes of the colonial inhabitants. The right of granting this assembly is vested exclusively in the Crown, subject to after regulations by the local legislatures." (Petersdorff, Vol. v. p. 543.)

The constitutional right of the Crown, in exercise of its prerogatives, to grant Constitutions to colonies, has been recognized in a series of judicial decisions, some of which may be here cited in illustration of the system that once prevailed, under which the English, and afterwards the British, Parliament enjoyed no share in the organization and management of colonial settlements. The case of Kielley v. Carson (1842), 4 Moore's Privy Council 63, 7 Jurist 137, turned on the nature and constitution of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland, established in 1832 by virtue of a commission under the sign-manual of King William IV., appointing Sir Thomas Cochrane Governor of the colony, and authorizing him to convoke a Legislative Assembly; and on the question whether such Assembly had been granted power, or possessed inherent power, to commit a person to gaol for contempt, in attempting to interfere with one of its members out of doors. Baron Parke (Lord Wensleydale), delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee, said :—

"To such a colony there is no doubt that the settlers from the mother-country carried with them such portion of its common and statute law as was applicable to their new situation, and also the rights and immunities of British subjects. Their descendants have on the one hand the same laws and the same rights, unless they have been altered by Parliament; and, on the other hand, the Crown possesses the same prerogative and the same powers of government that it does over its other subjects; nor has it been disputed in the argument before us, and therefore we consider it as conceded, that the sovereign had not merely the right of appointing such magistrates and establishing such corporations and courts of justice as he might do by the common law at home, but also that of creating a local Legislative Assembly, with authority subordinate to that of Parliament, but supreme within the limits of the colony, for the government of its inhabitants. This latter power was exercised by the Crown in favour of the inhabitants of Newfoundland in the year 1832, by a commission under the Great Seal, with accompanying instructions from the Secretary of State for the Colonial Department; and the whole question resolves itself into this, whether this power of adjudication upon and committing for a contempt was by virtue of the commission and the instructions legally given to the new Legislative Assembly of Newfoundland; for, under these alone can it have any existence, there being no usage or custom to support the exercise of any power whatever. In order to determine that question, we must first consider whether the Crown did in this case invest the local legislature with such privilege. If it did, a further question would arise, whether it had a power to do so by law. If that power was incident as an essential attribute to a Legislative Assembly of a dependency of the British Crown, the concession on both sides, that the Crown had a right to establish such an assembly, puts an end to the case. But if it is not a legal incident, then it was not conferred on the Colonial Assembly unless the Crown had authority to give such a power, and actually did give it. Their Lordships give no opinion upon the important question whether, in a settled country such as Newfoundland, the Crown could, by its prerogative, besides creating the Legislative Assembly, expressly bestow upon it an authority not incidental to it of committing for a contempt an authority materially interfering with the liberty of the subject, and much liable to abuse. They do not enter upon that question, because they are of opinion, upon the construction of the commission, and of its accompanying document, that no such authority was meant to be communicated to the Legislative Assembly of Newfoundland; and if it did not pass as an incident by the creation of such a body, it was not granted at all." (7 Jurist, p. 139.)

In the case of Phillips v. Eyre (1870), L.R. 6 Q.B., p. 1, the plaintiff sued a former Governor of Jamaica to recover damages for assault and false imprisonment, alleged to have been directed by the defendant after the proclamation of martial law during the suppression of rebellion in the Island. The defendant pleaded an indemnity, under an Act passed by the Legislature of Jamaica, and assented to by himself on behalf of the Crown, after the rebellion was over, legalizing every act done by the Governor in arresting the rebellion by force of arms. The Legislature of Jamaica, at that time, consisted of a Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly, established not by an Imperial Act, but by a Commission under the Great Seal accompanied by royal instructions. The case turned on the power of the Crown to create such a Legislature in a settled colony. In delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, Mr. Justice Willes said :—

“Doubts were suggested in this Court upon what was taken for granted in the argument and judgment in the Court below, namely, the power of the Crown to create a Legislative Assembly in a settled colony. Assuming, but by no means affirming that, as contended for by counsel for the plaintiff, the colony in question, though originally conquered from the Spaniards, is now to be deemed a settled as distinguished from a conquered or ceded one, we consider these doubts as to the power of the Crown and of the local Legislature to be unfounded. There is even greater reason for holding sacred the prerogative of the Crown to constitute a local Legislature in the case of a settled colony, where the inhabitants are entitled to be governed by English law, than in that of a conquered colony, where it is only by grace of the Crown that the privilege of self-government is allowed; though where once allowed it cannot be recalled. In colonies distant from the mother country to which writs to return members to the Imperial Parliament do not run, it is essential, both for the due government of the country in dealing with matters best understood upon the spot, and with emergencies which do not admit of delay, and also for giving subjects there resident the benefit of a voice, by their representatives, in the councils by which they are taxed and governed, that the Crown should have the power of creating a local Parliament. Accordingly, it is certain that the Crown has, in numerous instances, granted charters under which Houses of Assembly and Legislative Councils have been established for the government of colonies, whether conquered or settled, and that such Councils and Assemblies have, from time to time, made laws suited to the ‘emergencies of the colony,’ which, of course, include all measures necessary for the conservation of peace, order, and allegiance therein. In effect, the inhabitants have been allowed to reserve the power of self-government, through their representatives in the colony subject to the approval of the Crown and the control of the Imperial Legislature. This opinion was reflected upon in the argument, but it is in accordance with just principles of government, with the law laid down by the text-writers, including Mr. Justice Blackstone; and it has now been drawn into doubt for the first time. We are satisfied that it is sound law, and that a confirmed act of the local Legislature lawfully constituted, whether in a settled or conquered colony, has, as to matters within its competence and the limits of its jurisdiction, the operation and force of sovereign legislation, though subject to be controlled by the Imperial Parliament.” (Per Willes, J., Phillips v. Eyre, L.R., 1 Q.B., p. 1.)

“The first important deviation from this rule was in the case of the colony of Quebec, which by statute of 1774 received an improved form of local government. The precedent was followed, in the year 1791, by Mr. Pitt’s famous Canada Act, which constituted the two provinces of Quebec and Ontario. It has been declared by high authority that the reason for the introduction of Parliamentary action into the government of Canada was the desire to concede to the Roman Catholic colonists certain rights inconsistent with the severe Conformity statutes then existing, and with which the Crown had no power to dispense. But the application of the principle about the same time to the government of India, and, soon after, to Australian affairs, make it more probable that the change was really due to the growing extensions of Parliamentary influence over all departments of State. Be this as it may, the practice of the present century has been, whilst leaving to conquered acquisitions as much as possible their previous forms of government, to confer local Constitutions by Act of Parliament upon possessions acquired by settlement. The course of proceeding has been fairly uniform. First, there has been a purely despotic government, when the colony has been ruled as a military position by a Governor and a handful of officials appointed by the Home Government. Then there has been a Constitution, with a Legislative Council, partly appointed by the Governor and partly elective. Of this Council the Crown officials have always formed part, but the executive has been unassailable by the Legislature, and responsible only to the Colonial Office; possessions in these two stages being technically known as ‘Crown Colonies.’ In the third stage, there have generally been two Houses of Legislature, both elective, or one elective and one nominee, and the executive has consisted of officials chosen for their Parliamentary position, and liable to dismissal, like ministers in England, in consequence of an adverse vote of Legislature. This is the era of ‘Responsible Government.’” (Jenks’ Gov. of Victoria, pp. 10-11.)

Short Title.

1. This Act¹⁶ may be cited as the Commonwealth¹⁷ of Australia Constitution¹⁸ Act.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 1 of the draft Bill framed by the Sydney Convention of 1891, and usually known as “The Commonwealth Bill of 1891,” declared that “This Act shall be cited as The Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia.” In Committee, Mr. James Munro proposed “Federated States” in lieu of “Commonwealth.” On a division, however, “Commonwealth” was retained by 26 votes to 13. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 550-7.)

At the Adelaide Session of the Convention of 1897, the clause as framed in 1891 was adopted verbatim. In Committee, Mr. Symon proposed to omit the words “Commonwealth of,” leaving simply “Australia;” but this was negatived. Mr. Walker proposed to substitute “Australasia” for “Australia,” but this also was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 616-9.) At the Sydney Session, a suggestion by the Legislative Council of New South Wales, to substitute “Dominion” for “Commonwealth” was negatived. An amendment by Mr. Barton, to omit “The Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia,” and substitute “The Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act,” was agreed to, in order to distinguish between the Act as a whole and the Constitution embodied in the Act. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 224-5.)

OUTLINES OF THE ACT.—This Act, to constitute the Commonwealth, consists of nine clauses, to each of which is annexed a marginal note. The marginal notes, as already observed, do not form parts of the Act; they are provided merely as brief summaries. In these commentaries, the notes, printed, in the authorized edition of the Act, at the sides or against the Clauses and Sections, will be found placed at the head of or immediately over each Clause or Section. Clause 1 gives the short title of the Act; Clause 2 declares that it binds the Crown and extends to the Queen’s successors; Clause 3 provides that the Queen may issue a proclamation appointing a day when the people of the federating colonies shall be united in a Federal Commonwealth; Clause 4 specifies when the Commonwealth is to be deemed legally established; Clause 5 provides for the legal operation of the Act and of the laws of the Commonwealth; Clause 6 defines “Commonwealth,” “States,” and “Original State;” Clause 7 repeals the Federal Council Act, 1885; Clause 8 applies the “Colonial Boundaries Act, 1895,” to the Commonwealth; Clause 9 contains the Constitution of the Commonwealth.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TERM.—The term “Commonwealth,” to designate the Australian colonies, united in a Federal Constitution, was first proposed by the Constitutional Committee of the Federal Convention held in Sydney in 1891. The suggestion emanated from Sir Henry Parkes, then Premier of New South Wales, and the convener of the Convention, in which it was eventually adopted, on a division, by a substantial majority of votes. The same name was accepted by the Federal Convention of 1897-8. In both Conventions other names were submitted for consideration, such as “United Australia,” “Federated Australia,” “The Australian Dominion,” “The Federated States of Australia,” &c., but the name Commonwealth was generally accepted, the only objections raised to it being that it was suggestive of republicanism, owing to its association with the Commonwealth of England, under Oliver Cromwell’s Protectorate.

According to the derivation of the term from “common” and “weal,” or “wealth” it signified common well-being or common good. From that radical connotation it came to mean the body politic, or the whole people of a state. Then it became synonymous with state, realm, community, republic, nation; whilst some authorities have described it as synonymous with league, alliance, coalition, confederacy, and confederation. Webster says "a Commonwealth is a State consisting of a certain number of men united by compact, or tacit agreement under one form of government and one system of laws. It is applied more appropriately to governments which are considered free or popular, but rarely or improperly to absolute governments. Strictly, it means a government in which the general welfare is regarded rather than the welfare of any particular class." (Webster's Internat. Dictionary.) In this Act the word is used to describe the new political community created by the union of the people and of the colonies of Australia. Although it is capable of conveying the idea of a nation, like the American Commonwealth, it does not, in its application to Australia, aspire to convey that meaning except in a restricted and potential sense. At the same time it is distinctly intended to signify that the newly-organized political society, forming a conspicuously integral part of the British empire, is entitled to a more dignified status and recognition in the international arena than that assigned to the most distinguished of the colonies or to the most powerful of the provinces out of which it has been constructed.

Numerous passages occur in the works of Shakespeare and one in the New Testament illustrative of the early use of the word in the general sense of a state or community, irrespective of any special form of government, monarchical or republican. Thus we find:—

JESSICA . . . and he says, you are no good member of the commonwealth.—
"Merchant of Venice," Act III. Sc. V.

PRINCESS.—Here comes a member of the commonwealth.—"Love's Labour Lost," Act IV. Sc. I.

SICINIUS.—Your Coriolanus, sir, is not much missed,
But with his friends: the commonwealth doth stand
And so would do were he more angry at it.—"Coriolanus," Act IV.
Sc. VI.

ARCHE.—Let us on,
And publish the occasion of our arms,
The commonwealth is sick of their own choice.—"King Henry IV."
(Part II.), Act I. Sc. III.

CANT.—Hear him debate of commonwealth affairs,
You would say it hath been all in all his study.—"King Henry V.,"
Act I. Sc. I.

KING HENRY.—Uncles of Gloster and of Winchester
The special watchmen of our English weal.—"King Henry VI."
(Part I.), Act III. Sc. I.

KING HENRY.—Believe me, lords, my tender years can tell
Civil dissension is a viperous worm,
That gnaws the bowels of the commonwealth.—Idem.

3RD SERV.—And ere that we will suffer such a prince,
So kind a father of the common-weal,
To be disgraced by an inkhorn mate,
We, and our wives and children, all will fight,
And have our bodies slaughtered by the foe.—Idem.

APEM.—If thou couldst please me with speaking to me, thou mightest have hit upon it here: the Commonwealth of Athens is become a forest of beasts.—"Timon of Athens," Act IV. Sc. III.

That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world.—Eph. ii. xii.

The word commonwealth was used and applied in the same general sense by numerous other English writers in the 16th and 17th centuries. Lord Bacon, in his classical essay on the "Advancement of Learning" (1597), used the word in the sense in which it was employed by Shakespeare:—"And therefore Aristotle noteth well,

‘that the nature of every thing is best seen in his smallest portions.’ And for that cause he inquireth the nature of a commonwealth, first in the family, and the simple conjugations of man and wife, parent and child, master and servant, which are in every cottage. Even so likewise the nature of this great city of the world, and the policy thereof, must be first sought in mean concordances and small portions.” (Bacon’s Moral and Historical Works [Ward, Lock, and Co.], p. 57.) “Notwithstanding, for the more public part of government, which is laws, I think good to note only one deficiency: which is, that all those which have written of laws, have written either as philosophers, or as lawyers, and none as statesmen. As for the philosophers, they make imaginary laws for imaginary commonwealths, and their discourses are as the stars which give little light, because they are so high.” (Id., p. 147.) In Rawley’s original preface to Bacon’s unfinished work, “The New Atlantis,” it is stated “His lordship thought also in this present fable to have composed a frame of laws, or the best state, or mould of a commonwealth.” (Ward, Lock, and Co.’s Edition, p. 297.)

During the same period the kings and queens of England frequently used the word in their addresses to Parliament. James I. described himself as “the great servant of the Commonwealth.” (G. B. Barton’s Notes to the Draft Bill, 1891)

The term commonwealth came into special prominence during the revolutionary period of English history, between the execution of Charles I. in 1649 and the Restoration of 1660. On 19th March, 1649, Oliver Cromwell’s Parliament established a republican form of government, in the following Ordinance:—“Be it declared and enacted by this Parliament and by the authority of the same that the people of England, and of all the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, are and shall be and are hereby constituted, made, established, and confirmed to be a Commonwealth or Free State, and shall from henceforth be governed as a Commonwealth and a Free State by the supreme authority of this nation, the representatives of the people in parliament, and by such as they shall constitute officers and ministers under them for the good of the people and without any king or House of Lords.” Even during the existence of Cromwell’s Protectorate, philosophical writers continued to use the expression in its primary general sense; thus Hobbes in his “Leviathan,” published in 1651, wrote:—“And because the sovereignty is either in one man, or in an assembly of more than one, it is manifest there can be but three kinds of Commonwealth. When the representatives of the people is one man, then is the Commonwealth a monarchy; when an assembly of all that will come together, then it is a democracy, or popular Commonwealth; when an assembly of a part only, then it is called an aristocracy.” (Molesworth’s Ed. of Hobbes’ Works, Vol. III., p. 171.)

John Harrington, in his treatise on Political Government, entitled “The Commonwealth of Oceana,” and dedicated to the Lord Protector, used the term as an appropriate description of an Ideal State, not necessarily a republic. After Oliver Cromwell’s death, John Milton, seeing that his system of Government was likely to be imperilled by the weak administration of Richard Cromwell, and believing that his advice might arrest the threatened reaction towards monarchy, published, in the early part of 1660, several treatises, including one on “A Ready and Easy Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth,” in which he employed the word in a republican sense. “A Free Commonwealth, without single person or House of Lords, is by far the best government, if it can be had. Now is the opportunity, now the very season, wherein we may obtain a free Commonwealth, and establish it for ever in the land, without difficulty or much delay.” (Cited Barton’s Notes to the Draft Bill, 1891, p. 11.) “But the inevitable 29th May, 1660, came and Charles II. was restored.” (Milton’s Works, Gall and Inglis’ Ed., p. 12.)

After the Restoration, the term commonwealth became for a time unpalatable to the bulk of English society, as it was supposed to imply a republican form of government. In his work on Civil Government, published after the Restoration, John Locke, the philosopher, ignored the association of the word with Cromwell's republic and used it in its primitive sense as understood by Shakespeare, Bacon, Hobbes, and Harrington. "By the same Act, therefore, whereby any one unites his person, which was before free, to any Commonwealth, by the same he unites his possessions, which were before free, to it also; and they become, both of person and possessions, subject to the government and dominion of that Commonwealth, as long as it hath a being." (Cited Barton's Notes on the Draft Bill, 1891, p. 10.)

The name Commonwealth has since been frequently applied to the States of the American union. The Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania (1776) framed in popular Convention, begins thus:—"We the Representatives of the free men of Pennsylvania . . . do . . . ordain, declare, and establish the following declaration of rights and frame of government to be the Constitution of this Commonwealth." The preambles of the Constitutions of the States of Vermont (1779) and Massachusetts (1780) are in the same form. Dr. Burgess, in his important work on "Political Science and Constitutional Law," published 1890, habitually describes the so-called American "States" as "commonwealths," and he similarly designates the so-called German "states" (Vol. I., pp. 201-10). On the other hand, some writers have used the name as applicable to and descriptive of the United States as a union of States. Dr. Bryce's well-known work on the American Constitution is entitled the "American Commonwealth," and in one passage he describes the union as "a Commonwealth of Commonwealths." (Bryce, American Commonwealth, 1st ed., Vol. I., p. 12.)

DEFINITION.—A Constitution is a general law for the government of a political community, unamendable and unrepealable, except in the manner and on compliance with the conditions prescribed by the authority which created it. It deals with the sovereign power of Government and the various forms, organs, and agencies through which that power is brought into action and the relations, interdependence, and co-operation of those forms, organs, and agencies, in the performance of the work of government.

A GENERAL LAW.—First, then, a Constitution is a general law or a collection of laws, capable of effective enforcement and binding on every member of the community, including the members of the Government in their private capacities. It is a law which should be couched in wide and general terms, avoiding minute specifications and details and thus leaving room for "unpredictable emergencies," and possible and desirable developments. In the history of a Constitution there grow in association with it, and springing from its generalities, certain customs and practices, which cannot be exactly termed laws, strictly so called. These customs and practices generally relate to matters which, by the letter of the Constitution, are left to the discretion of some member or branch of the sovereign body. In time, owing to political influences and considerations, these discretionary powers are exercised in a certain manner; and hence arise what have been described as the "understandings and conventions" of the Constitution, distinguishable from the positive law of the Constitution. The essence of a law is its capacity of being executed; it implies the existence of a force able to command obedience and to punish disobedience. As such, a law is clearly contrasted with a mere understanding, or a practice, which is capable of variation and modification, according to the changing conditions and requirements of human society. A Constitution is also different from a social compact between the members of the society which it concerns; if it were a mere compact it could be repudiated and violated at the caprice of any faction or group within the society. It differs equally from a treaty or league between separate and independent states, terminable at the will of any of those states.

GOVERNMENT.—Secondly, the law of the Constitution relates to the exercise of that sovereign power of Government which in every independent political community, occupying a defined territory, is vested either in a sovereign monarch or in a sovereign body, and which in a subordinate political community exercising delegated sovereign powers is vested in subordinate persons or bodies (see § 21, "Sovereignty"). Even an absolute monarch must ordinarily exercise his sovereign prerogatives according to certain well-understood rules and formal requisites, recognized by his predecessors and recommended by his counsellors. These rules and formalities, if compiled and classified, would compose the rudimentary "understandings and conventions" of a monarchical constitution. When the functions of government are divided among the members of a body, there must be some more specific rules appropriating certain classes of work to particular members of the governing body, determining the mode of appointment and succession of those members—such as Chief Magistrate, Legislators, and Judges—and the manner in which harmonious action may be maintained in the combined execution of the sovereign power. These rules would, if compiled and similarly classified, compose a more complex constitution, and so the greater the division, sub-division, and multiplication of governing agencies, and the greater the distribution of power, the more complex and elaborate a constitution becomes. Supreme governing power, as well as subordinate or delegated governing power, analyzed and classified, may be resolved into three departments or divisions—(1) The making and promulgation of laws prescribing the functions of governing agencies and regulating the legal rights and duties of the people within the jurisdiction of the government; (2) the administration of laws; and (3) the interpretation and determination of laws in cases where doubts arise as to their meaning or intention. In simple societies these three functions may be blended in one person, or one body, but in all maturely developed States they become differentiated, and divided amongst separate persons or separate bodies composing the sovereign authority as a whole. Hence arises the well-known tripartite division of government into the Legislative Department, the Executive Department, and the Judiciary Department. All constitutions which have been reduced to and expressed in the shape of written instruments, such as those of the United States, Belgium, France, Germany, and Switzerland, recognize this principle of division and distribution of power. The same distribution, indeed, is also observed in the British system of government, the Constitution of which, although it has not been reduced to the form of a single document or Act of Parliament, is as capable of being gathered from numerous Charters, Bills, Proclamations, Statutes, legal decisions, and official documents, extending from the time of King Alfred down to the reign of Queen Victoria, as the Constitutions of the countries referred to, which have been, in fact, largely constructed according to the British model.

At the time when the American Constitution was framed, Montesquieu was the great oracle of political philosophy, and he drew special attention to the tripartite division of political power as existing in England. "Contrasting the private as well as the public liberties of Englishmen with the despotism of continental Europe, he took the Constitution of England as his model, and ascribed its merits to the division of legislative, executive, and judicial functions, which he discovered in it, and to the system of checks and balances whereby its equilibrium seemed to be preserved: no general principle of politics laid such a hold on the constitution-makers and statesmen of America as the dogma that the separation of these three functions is essential to freedom." (Bryce's Amer. Comm., vol. I., p. 26.) This tripartite classification does not necessarily imply that each of the three departments of government is independent of the others. Each of the three is endowed with a defined share in the work of government, but they are all parts of one governing machine and are exercising fractions of the aggregate of sovereign power; each acts within its respective legal sphere, but, to some extent, one may check and balance the other. Thus the legislature may exercise more or less control over the Executive. The Executive may advise, lead, or for a time moderate the action of the legislature, as is done in the British system, through the agency of the Cabinet. In every well-designed Constitution the Judiciary, once appointed, is almost absolutely independent of the influence of either the Executive or the Legislature; but the primary appointment of the Judges generally rests with the Executive, and for gross misconduct in office they may be removed by the Executive: in some Constitutions they may be removed by the Executive at the request of the Legislature without any particular cause assigned.

RIGHTS, PRIVILEGES, AND IMMUNITIES.—A Constitution not only deals with this partition and delimitation of governing powers, with the mode in which those powers are exercised, and with the structure of the governing organs; it generally enumerates certain cardinal rules, principles, and maxims which are intended to be the indiciae of public policy that should guide or bind the Executive the Legislature, and the Judiciary Departments. Thus Magna Charta, the Petition of Rights, and the Bill of Rights, contain declarations of rights, privileges, and immunities, which are said to be the inalienable birthright and heritage of every British subject, protecting his liberty from unlawful impairment and his property from spoliation. These declarations undoubtedly bind the British Executive and the British Judiciary; they may guide but cannot bind the British Parliament, which may amend or repeal them at any time. A similar declaration of rights has been inserted in the Federal Constitution of the United States. In a supreme constitution of a federal character, dealing as it does with a general government and with provincial governments, with States as well as with individuals, provisions are necessarily inserted for the preservation not only of individual rights, but of what are known as "State Rights," against invasion and encroachment on the part of the general government, and for the preservation of "National Rights" against invasion and encroachment on the part of the States. In the American Constitution, as in the Constitution of the Commonwealth, these declarations bind alike the Executive, the Judiciary, and the Legislature, of each State, as well as those of the general government.

A FUNDAMENTAL LAW.—Next, the word Constitution connotes the idea of a fundamental law—a law of higher sanctity, and perhaps of greater efficacy and authority, than ordinary legislation. In all modern written Constitutions there is a tendency to establish the fundamental character of the instrument upon a firm legal basis by making the process of constitutional amendment more difficult and more complex than the process of ordinary legislation, and thus to affirm the principle that every alteration in the fundamental law is an act so solemn and momentous that it requires compliance with special formalities intended to prevent hasty and ill-advised changes, to ensure the fullest deliberation, to guard against surprises, and to protect the rights and interests of all classes of the community. A Constitution which thus makes the process of its own amendment more difficult than the process of ordinary legislation is what Professor Dicey calls a "rigid" Constitution. The degree of rigidity may vary widely; it may consist in the requirement of unusual majorities in the Legislature, or of ratification in a certain way by conventions, or by the electors, or it may involve other and more complicated processes. And even in an absolutely flexible Constitution such as that of Great Britain, where the most fundamental law can legally be altered or repealed as easily as the most trivial, the reverence for constitutional usage invests the laws which form the main fabric of the Constitution with a sanctity which makes the flexibility less absolute, in practice, than it seems.

In a unitarian or consolidated Constitution, like that of Great Britain, organic changes may be effected with greater facility and safety than in a federal Constitution such as that of the United States. In a consolidated State there may therefore be one supreme Legislature, having absolute and final jurisdiction over all matters, including the Constitution itself. But a federal Constitution deals with the conflicting views and interests of a community which is composed of a number of States, united under a general form of Government, each State having a local Constitution and local governing organs, as well as local rights guaranteed by the supreme Constitution. In such a system a power of amendment is usually placed not in the legislatures of the several States nor solely in the central legislature of the federal community, but in some body, more or less complex, which represents both the nation and the States.

In the case of the British Constitution, and its unitarian form of government, the British Parliament is a supreme or sovereign legislature, and could, at any time, amend or repeal any part of the Constitution, of which it is partly, if not wholly, the author and creator, including the Bill of Rights. The Federal Congress of the United States, however, is not a supreme or sovereign legislature, but is only a legislature subordinate to the supreme Constitution created by the people of the United States and exercising limited and specific powers assigned to it by that supreme Constitution. Congress cannot amend that Constitution in any way whatsoever. Majorities of two-thirds in both the Senate and the House of Representatives may suggest an amendment; but it would not become law until it were ratified by majorities of the federal electors in three-fourths of the States acting through their several legislatures or conventions. This is one of the fundamental differences between a unitarian Constitution and a Constitution of a federal character. As a practical illustration of the foregoing definition and exposition of a Constitution, the following outlines of two typical Constitutions, one Federal, the other Unitarian, are submitted:—

OUTLINES OF THE BRITISH CONSTITUTION.

PART I.

SOVEREIGNTY.—Legally vested in the British Parliament—i.e., Queen, Lords, and Commons—with a strong tendency to recognize the people represented by a majority of the electors as the body in which the ultimate political sovereignty resides; to be gathered from various Charters, Patents, Writs, Ordinances, Statutes, Acts, Proclamations, legal decisions, and established customs.

PART II.

GOVERNMENT.—Powers exercised by one set of Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Departments:—

- (1) The Executive Department.—Presided over by the Queen, acting for the most part on the advice of Ministers of State responsible to Parliament. (The Queen's title—Act of Settlement, 12 and 13 Wm. III. c. 2.)
- (2) The Legislative Department.—Power vested theoretically in the Queen, acting on the advice and with the consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and the Commons; practically in the Queen in Parliament. The Queen—Her part in the convening, proroguing, dissolving Parliament; in recommending legislation; her right to assent to or disallow Bills passed by the Lords and Commons. The Lords Spiritual and Temporal—The House of Lords, composed of (1) hereditary Peers, (2) Elective Peers, i.e., those who represent the peerage of Ireland and Scotland, and (3) peers of office, such as Bishops of the Church of England. Power of the House of Lords theoretically equal to that of the Commons with certain exceptions, such as control of the Executive and the alteration of Money Bills. Title of the House of Lords, immemorial customs, charters, writs, and Acts of Parliament. The House of Commons—Composed of Representatives elected by the people according to electoral laws passed from time to time. Power of the House of Commons in the initiation of legislation unrestricted, except for the constitutional principle that it may not originate a grant of money or a tax except upon receipt of a message from the Crown recommending the same. Control of Ministers. Title of the House of Commons—charters, writs, recognized and ratified by Acts of Parliament.

- (3) Judicial Department.—Power vested in the Queen, but exercised by Judges appointed by the Crown during good behaviour, but subject to be removed on an Address from both Houses of Parliament. Jurisdiction—to interpret the common law and the law of Parliament, but not to question validity of the latter. Security of tenure—Act of Settlement, 12 and 13 Wm. III. c. 2, and subsequent legislation.

PART III.

RIGHTS, PRIVILEGES, AND IMMUNITIES.—Contained in numerous charters, confirmations of charters, and Acts of Parliament assented to by the Crown from the earliest period of English history, including Magna Charta (1215); the Petition of Rights (1627), 3 Char. I. c. 1; the Habeas Corpus Act (1640), 16 Char. I. c. 10; the Bill of Rights (1688), 1 Wm. and Mary c. 2; and the Act of Settlement (1700), 12 and 13 Wm. III. c. 2. The Bill of Rights is of special interest as declaring that certain recited rights are “the true ancient and indubitable rights and liberties of the people to be firmly and strictly holden and observed in all times to come.”

PART IV.

COLONIES.—The Acts 18 Geo. III., c. 12, and 28 and 29 Vic. c. 63, are the charters of Colonial Independence. By the first it is promised that the British Parliament will not impose any duty, tax, or assessment whatever, payable in any part of His Majesty's colonies, provinces, plantations, in North America or in the West Indies. The latter Act is known as the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, and provides that no colonial law shall be deemed to be void or inoperative on the ground of repugnancy to the law of England, unless it is repugnant to the provisions of an Imperial Act specially applicable to the colony in which such colonial law was passed.

PART V.

AMENDMENT.—No limitation upon the power of the British Parliament to alter the Constitution; it may legally be amended by the ordinary process of Legislation; but the House of Lords—the last stronghold of resistance to constitutional innovation—is under no constitutional obligation to yield to any demand of the House of Commons until the voice of that House has been confirmed by its constituents at a general election.

OUTLINES OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

PART I.

SOVEREIGNTY.—Legally vested in the electors of the States, organized within the Constitution as the amending power.

PART II.

GOVERNMENT.—Two co-ordinate sets of governing organs, national and State, acting within the spheres marked out for them by the Constitution. Each set of organs is independent of the other, but both are subject to the common sovereignty:

- (a) National Government.—Can only act within the sphere of powers granted to it by the Constitution.

(1) National Executive Department.—Power vested in the President, chosen under the Constitution by the electors of the States. Some executive acts require assent of Senate.

(2) National Legislative Department.—Power vested in Congress; House of Representatives elected by people of States in proportion to population; Senate consisting of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature of the State. President has a veto, which may be overridden by a two-thirds majority of each House.

CONSPECTUS OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

SOVEREIGN PEOPLE.

The electors of three-fourths of the States acting through their respective Legislatures or Conventions.

CONSTITUTION
UNITED STATES.

Act to extend to the Queen's Successors.

2. The provisions of this Act referring to the Queen¹⁹ shall extend to Her Majesty's heirs and successors²⁰ in the sovereignty²¹ of the United Kingdom.

CANADA.—The provisions of this Act referring to Her Majesty the Queen extend also to the Heirs and Successors of Her Majesty, Kings and Queens of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.—British North America Act, 1867, sec. 2.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—The clause as originally drawn in the Sydney Convention, 1891, was taken verbatim from the Canadian clause, supra. In Committee, on Mr. Rutledge's suggestion, the words "in the sovereignty" were substituted for "Kings and Queens." (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], p. 557.) As drawn at the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause ran:—"This Act shall bind the Crown and the Executive officers of the Commonwealth, and its provisions referring to Her Majesty the Queen shall extend," &c. Mr. Higgins moved the omission of the words "and the Executive officers of the Commonwealth," and this was agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 619-20.) At the Sydney session, there was a short discussion on the words "This Act shall bind the Crown." (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 225-7.) At the Melbourne session, verbal amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

In England, the Crown Law officers recommended the omission of the words "This Act shall bind the Crown" (Parl. Paper, May, 1900, p. 19). In the Bill as introduced into the Imperial Parliament this course was adopted, and the clause was worded "The provisions of this Act, and of the Constitution set forth in the schedule to this Act," etc.—

the Constitution being then placed as a "schedule" to the Bill. When the original form of clause 9 was restored in Committee, and the word "schedule" omitted, the words in italics became inapplicable; and before the third reading they were omitted.

§ 19. "Referring to the Queen."

REFERENCES TO THE QUEEN.—The direct references to the Queen in the Act and Constitution (elsewhere than in the enacting words) are as follows:—

Preamble (admission of other possessions of the Queen). Clause 3 (Queen may proclaim Commonwealth, &c.). Clause 5 (Queen's ships of war). Section 1 (Queen in Federal Parliament). Section 2 (Governor-General appointed by the Queen). Section 34 (subject of the Queen). Section 44 (Queen's Ministers for Commonwealth or State—officers or members of Queen's navy or army). Sections 57-60 (Queen's assent to Bills). Section 61 (Executive power vested in Queen). Section 64 (Queen's Ministers of State). Section 66 (salaries of Ministers). Sections 73-4 (Appeals to Queen-in-Council). Section 117 (subject of the Queen). Section 122 (territories). Section 126 (Deputy Governor-General). Section 128 (Queen's assent to constitutional amendments). Schedule (oath of allegiance).

Besides references to "the Queen," there are references to "the Crown" (e.g., in the Preamble and sec. 44)—a term which in English law is usually used as an impersonal or abstract description of the occupant of the throne—commonly called the sovereign—whether King or Queen. Sometimes it is used in a wider and more popular sense as representing the majesty and sovereignty of the nation (see note on "Sovereignty," § 21).

CROWN NOT BOUND UNLESS NAMED.—It is a recognized canon in the construction of Statute law that in any case where the Crown would be ousted of an existing prerogative, it is not bound, affected, or reached unless named therein either expressly or by necessary implication. It is presumed that the legislature does not intend to deprive the Crown of any right of property unless it expresses that intention in explicit terms or makes the inference irresistible. (Maxwell on Statutes, p. 186; Broom's Legal Maxims [6th ed.], p. 68.) In conformity with this principle it has been held that the compulsory clauses of Acts authorizing land to be taken for railway purposes would not apply to a Crown property, because they were not made so applicable in express terms or by necessary inference; that, it being a prerogative of the Crown not to pay tolls or rates or other burthens on property, the Poor Act of 43 Elizabeth, authorizing the imposition of poor rates on every inhabitant or occupier of property in the parish, did not apply to the Crown or to its direct or immediate servants whose occupation is for the purposes of the Crown; re Cuckfield Board, 24 L.J. Ch. 533; Mersey Docks v. Cameron, 11 H.L. Cas. 443. Numerous Acts of Parliament have at various times abolished the writ of certiorari, but they have been held not to apply to the Crown, which still had its remedy by the prerogative writ. Where a local Act imposed wharfage dues, for the repairs and maintenance of a harbour, on certain articles, including stones, and, without expressly binding the Crown to make such payments, exempted it from liability in respect of coals imported for the use of the royal packets and from a toll over a bridge, the court refused to infer from the exemptions an intention to charge the Crown in respect of any other goods. (Weymouth v. Nugent, 34 L.J., M.C. 81.)

The rights of the Crown are not barred by any Statute of Limitations, unless it is expressly named therein; and this rule extends to cases where the right of the Crown is merely nominal. (Reg. v. Bayley, 4 Ir. Eq. R. 142.) Quere, whether, when an Act of Parliament transfers jurisdiction from one court to another, or grants an extension of the jurisdiction of an existing court, it is necessary, in order to make the Act binding on the Crown, that the Crown should be named therein. (London Corporation v. Att.-Gen., 1 H.L. Cas. 440; Dig. of Eng., Case Law v., p. 7-S.)

The Crown not being bound by the Statutes of Bankruptcy, the protection of a bankrupt from an extort is limited to actual attendance upon the commissioners, upon the common-law privilege of a witness or party, not extending through the intervals of adjournment by the statute. (Ex parte Temple, 2 Ves. and B. 391; Craufurd v. Att.-

Gen., 7 Price, 2.) The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, sec. 150, enacting that, save as therein provided, the provisions of that Act relating to the priorities of debts, the effect of a composition or scheme of arrangement, and the effect of a discharge, shall bind the Crown, does not by virtue of the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10, operate as an incorporation, in the Companies Act, 1862, of a similar provision so as, in a winding-up, to bar the Crown of its prerogative of priority of payment over all creditors. (Re Oriental Bank Corporation, 28 Ch. D. 643; Dig. of Eng. Case Law v. p. 8.)

The Crown, though not bound by 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 55, s. 31, and 3 and 4 Vic., c. 105, s. 20, which give to creditors by judgment or recognizance a right to have a receiver appointed on petition, may take advantage of the Acts, but is not bound by the restrictions imposed on that right by 12 and 13 Vic., c. 95, s. 10. (Reg. v. Cruise, 2 Ir. Ch. R. 65.) The Statute of Frauds does not bind the Crown, but takes place only between party and party, for the king is not named. Lord Hardwicke, however, doubted this doctrine. (Addington v. Cann, 3 Atk. 154.) Crown property, as well as property devoted to or made subservient to the Queen's government, is exempt from poor rates, but property held upon trust to create or to improve docks and harbours in seaport towns, though having a public character, and though devoted to public purposes, is nevertheless subject to be rated to the relief of the poor. (Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Adamson, 4 Macq. H.L. 931; Dig. of Eng. Case Law v. p. 8.)

The Crown is bound by the two codes of Lower Canada; in the liquidation of a bank it can claim no priority of payment over the other creditors except what is allowed by these codes. (Exchange Bank of Canada v. Regina, 11 App. Cas. 157.)

The Victorian Crown Liability and Remedies Act, 1865 (28 Vic. No. 241), does not affect the prerogatives of the Crown when suing in England. (Re Oriental Bank Corporation, 28 Ch. D. 643.)

It was to prevent the operation of this maxim—that the Crown is not bound by a statute unless named therein—that the Convention inserted the words “This Act shall bind the Crown.” Compare the phrase “This Act shall be binding on the Crown” (Imperial) Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vic. c. 63, sec. 30). This was objected to by the Imperial Crown Law officers as possibly affecting not only the prerogative right of the Queen-in-Council to hear appeals, but also a wide range of other prerogatives; and the words were consequently omitted (see Historical Note).

Notwithstanding the omission of these words, there are many provisions of the Constitution which affect the Crown by express reference or by necessary implication. Not only the words “the Queen,” “the Crown,” “the Governor-General,” but also the words “the Commonwealth,” and “a State,” occurring frequently throughout the Constitution, are references to the Crown which may affect the prerogative to a considerable extent. It is therefore advisable to discuss the nature of the prerogative, and the chief ways in which it may be affected by the Constitution.

PREROGATIVES.—These are the residuary fractions and remnants of the sovereign power which, unimpaired by legislation and revolution, remain vested in the Crown. They are the products and survivals of the Common Law and are not the creatures of statutes. Statute law tends gradually to invade and diminish the domain of prerogative. Among the examples of prerogatives the following may be enumerated:—

- (1.) The exercise of the ordinary Executive authority by the Crown, through Ministers of State; subject to certain legal and customary restraints such as the control of the House of Commons by virtue of its power to refuse supplies.
- (2.) Dissolution and Prorogation of Parliament.
- (3.) The administration of Justice in the name of the Crown, through judges and counsel appointed by the Crown.
- (4.) The pardon of offenders.
- (5.) Command of the Army and Navy.
- (6.) Foreign affairs; peace and war.
- (7.) Accrediting and receiving Ambassadors.
- (8.) Entering into treaties with foreign nations.
- (9.) Recognition of foreign States.
- (10.) Appropriating prizes of war.

- (11.) Sharing legislation ; right to veto.
- (12.) Allegiance ; right of the Crown to the allegiance and service of its subjects.
- (13.) Ecclesiastical authority with respect to the Church of England.
- (14.) Control over titles, honours, precedence, franchises, &c., coining money, superintendence over infants, lunatics, and idiots.
- (15.) Special remedies against the subject, such as intrusion, quo warranto, distress, escheat, extent.
- (16.) Lordship of the soil.

A number of these prerogatives have become obsolete through desuetude, although they have never been swept away by Act of Parliament. Others of them have been cut down and reduced to matters of form, or denuded of most of their former vigour and activity.

PREROGATIVES LIMITED BY THE CONSTITUTION.—In the course of these Notes attention will be drawn to clauses and sections which apparently contract the prerogatives of the Crown ; foremost amongst them may be here generally indicated four of special importance :—

- (1.) Section 1 of the Constitution, providing that the legislative power shall be vested in a Federal Parliament consisting of the Queen, the Senate, and the House of Representatives.
- (2.) Section 59, restricting the period within which the Queen may disallow laws assented to by the Governor-General.
- (3.) Section 62, creating an Executive Council to advise the Governor-General as the Queen's Representative.
- (4.) Section 74, limiting the right of appeal to the Queen in Council.

PREROGATIVES CONFIRMED BY THE CONSTITUTION.—Certain well-known and long-established powers of the Crown instead of being negatived are confirmed by the Constitution, such as :—

- (1.) Section 5.—The Governor-General may convene, prorogue, and dissolve the Federal Parliament.
- (2.) Section 62.—The Governor-General may choose and summon members of the Executive Council to advise him.
- (3.) Section 64.—The Governor-General may appoint officers to administer such Departments of State as the Governor-General in Council may establish.
- (4.) Section 68.—The Governor-General shall be the Commander-in-Chief of the naval and military forces of the Commonwealth.

No doubt most or the whole of these and other powers vested in the Governor-General will, in accordance with what have been elsewhere referred to as the "Understandings and Conventions of the Constitutions," § 18, be exercised by the Queen's Representative in a Constitutional manner, that is, on the advice of responsible Ministers. (See § 271, "Executive Government.")

§ 20. "Her Majesty's Heirs and Successors."

The Succession to the Crown was, after the revolution of 1688, settled by the Bill of Rights, I. Wm. and Mary (2nd Sess.), c. 2. The throne being declared vacant by the abdication of James II., the Crown was settled on King William III., Prince of Orange, grandson of Charles I., and nephew and son-in-law of the deposed monarch, and on Queen Mary, eldest daughter of James II. and wife of William III., for their joint lives ; then on the survivor of them ; then on the issue of Queen Mary ; upon failure of such issue it was limited to Princess Anne of Denmark, King James' second daughter, and her issue ; and lastly, on the failure of that, to the issue of King William. Towards the end of King William's reign, when it became probable that neither he nor Princess

Anne would leave issue to inherit the Crown, it became necessary to make other legislative provision for the succession, which was done by 12 and 13 William III. c. 2, commonly known as the Act of Settlement (1702). The first section of this Act declared that, after his Majesty King William III. and the Princess Anne of Denmark, and in default of issue of the said Princess Anne and of his Majesty respectively, the Princess Sophia, Electress of Hanover, grand-daughter of King James I., should be next in succession to the Imperial Crown and dignity "of the said realm of England, France, and Ireland, with the dominions and territories thereunto belonging," and that after the decease of his Majesty William III. and her Royal Highness the Princess Anne, and in default of issue of the Princess Anne and of his Majesty respectively, the Crown and Regal Government of the "said Kingdom of England, France, and Ireland and of the dominions thereunto belonging, with the Royal State and dignity of the said realm and all honours, styles, titles, regalities, prerogatives, powers, jurisdictions, and authorities to the same belonging and appertaining, shall remain and continue to the said Most Excellent Princess Sophia and the heirs of her body being Protestants." The fourth and last section of the Act recites that "whereas the laws of England are the birthright of the people thereof, and all the Kings and Queens who shall ascend the throne of this realm ought to administer the government of the same according to the said laws, and all their officers and ministers ought to serve them respectively according to the same; the said Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons do therefore further humbly pray. That all the laws and statutes of this realm for securing the Established Religion, and the rights and liberties of the people thereof, and all other laws and statutes of the same now in force, may be ratified and confirmed; and the same are by his Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the said Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons and by the authority of the same ratified and confirmed accordingly."

Both William III., and Queen Anne after him, died without leaving issue; the Princess Sophia predeceased Queen Anne. The inheritance, therefore, descended to her son and heir, who became King George I. From him it descended to King George II., from whom it descended to George III.; then to George IV., who was succeeded by his brother, William IV.; and after him it descended to his niece Princess Victoria, our present Gracious Queen, daughter of Edward, Duke of Kent. (Stephen's Comment., vol. 2. p. 451.)

§ 21. "Sovereignty of the United Kingdom."

SOVEREIGNTY.—A clear conception of the meaning of "sovereignty" is the key to all political science. The relation of the Commonwealth to the Empire, and the relation of the Federal and State Governments of the Commonwealth to one another, can hardly be appreciated apart from a sound study of the principle of sovereignty. The speculations of such philosophers as Hobbes, Locke, and Rousseau, the learning of Blackstone and Bentham, the critical analysis of Austin, the historical researches of Maine, and the labours of such modern writers as Holland, Dicey, Leslie Stephen, Burgess, and many others, have all contributed, from many sides, to throw light on the central idea which the word sovereignty represents; and of recent years the interchange of thought between English and American writers, and a comparative study of their widely different institutions, has done much to clear away doubts and difficulties. In this work only a brief note can be devoted to this vast subject.

Before attempting any definition of sovereignty, it is advisable to call attention to the necessity of avoiding confusion between three distinct uses of the word:—(1) Legal sovereignty—as when we speak of the sovereignty of the British Parliament; (2) political sovereignty—as when we speak of the sovereignty of the people; (3) titular sovereignty—as when we speak of the sovereignty of the Queen. As the primary meaning of the word is the legal one, it is best to begin from that standpoint.

(1.) LEGAL SOVEREIGNTY.—Sovereignty, then, is an attribute, and the most essential attribute, of a State—that is, of an independent political community. It is defined by Burgess (Pol. Science, I. 52) as “original, absolute, unlimited, universal power over the individual subject and over all associations of subjects.” The legal sovereignty is that person, or determinate body of persons, which possesses, in a State, a power which in point of law is absolute and unlimited. Such a body is the British Parliament: such a body are the electors of the United States organized under the Constitutional provision for the amendment of the Constitution. Legally speaking, such a body of persons is the State itself; the State is the sovereign, and the sovereign is the State.

Corresponding to this view of legal sovereignty as power, we may define political sovereignty as the will which lies behind the power. Political sovereignty is thus also an attribute of the State; it is the corporate will—or what Rousseau called the “general will”—of the community. And from this definition of political sovereignty as the “general will” of the community, we may in turn deduce legal sovereignty as the legal expression, or embodiment, or manifestation, of that will.

Sovereignty, therefore, resides in the State, but it is principally manifested through the Government, its creature. Every competent organ of government, legislative, judicial, or executive—Parliaments, courts, constitutional assemblies, electorates in their legislative capacity, Kings, Presidents, Governors, Executive Councils—are organs through which the sovereign power is exercised. In one sense the aggregate of these bodies within a State, as exercising the sum-total of sovereign power, may be considered as depositaries of sovereignty; but in another and a truer sense sovereignty is located in the ultimate legislative organ—the supreme organic unity which in the last resort controls all the others.

Can sovereignty be legally limited? The above definitions negative the possibility; but they are not universally concurred in. The historical school point to communities in which no sovereign can be discovered; and Dicey (Law of the Constitution, p. 135) fails to see why it should be inconceivable that the framers of a Constitution should have deliberately omitted to provide means of altering it. Most writers, however, agree that sovereignty cannot be limited even by a direct prohibition in the fundamental instrument, but that such a prohibition is inconsistent with the very conception of a State, and must be disregarded. (See Burgess, Pol. Science, I. pp. 51-2; W. W. Willoughby, The Nature of the State, p. 214.)

True political science seems to point to the conclusion that sovereignty is incapable of legal limitation, either from without or within. A sovereign body cannot be legally controlled by another body, for then that which controls would be sovereign. Nor can it be legally controlled by a prohibition, express or implied, in a written document; for then the written document would be sovereign—though it can have neither will nor power. Either the organization which framed the Constitution can be legally convoked again—in which case it is the sovereign; or it cannot—in which case its prohibition, directed against the State, is without sanction and without effect.

As sovereignty is incapable of legal limitation from without, so it is unable to bind itself. With a sovereign there is no such thing as “irrevocable laws.” The sovereign power which makes a law can alter or repeal it. It is true that sometimes a sovereign body may pass a law and declare it to be so sacred and organic that it shall last for ever, such as the Act for the union of England and Scotland. Such a declaration of intention or policy would have great weight with, but could not legally bind, succeeding Parliaments. As a matter of fact that Act of Union has already been amended in certain particulars, which were originally declared to be fundamental and unchangeable conditions of the union. So the Act for the union of Great Britain and Ireland has been amended by the disestablishment of the Irish Church.

Influences on Sovereignty.—But although there can be no legal control or limitation of the sovereign authority, there are many practical and effective influences at work in every well-ordered society, which prevents the sovereign power from being exercised with unrestricted, reckless, and irresponsible omnipotence, and which tend to chasten and temper, if not curtail, the exercise of supreme authority, whether it be vested in an absolute monarch, or in a king in parliament, or in a complex body such as a three-fourth majority of the Legislatures of the United States. Among those influences some are internal, to be found in the character, organization, and historical antecedents of the sovereign person or body; but the most powerful are the external surroundings and circumstances which guide and direct the mode of calling into action the sovereign will, such as the right of petition for redress of grievances; the right of public criticism; the right of the public to combine and remonstrate against oppression and wrong-doing, and above all the knowledge possessed by sovereign rulers that if they persist, for any protracted period, in attempting to govern contrary to reason and justice, and contrary to the wishes, interests, and instincts of the bulk of their people, they will lose popular support, encounter popular resistance, and run the risk of rebellion and revolution; as actually happened in England during the reign of James II. These moderating forces, proceeding from the environments of a sovereign, or of a sovereign body, tend no doubt to reduce the dogma of unrestricted, uncontrolled sovereignty to a legal fiction. Legally the Sultan of Turkey could abolish Mohammedanism and introduce Christianity into his dominions, but he would not and dare not do so. Legally the Czar of Russia could revoke the edict for the emancipation of the serfs, but he would not and dare not do so. Legally the Queen in the British Parliament could tax the Colonies, as was done in the reign of George III., but they would not dream of such a policy, much less attempt it. Similarly, two-thirds of Congress could propose, and three-fourths of the legislatures of the States could ratify, a constitutional law re-establishing slavery in America. But the moral influences to which legal sovereignty is subject, emanating from considerations of expediency, justice, and humanity, would frown down and destroy any such proposals.

Formal Restraints.—Important among the internal restraints upon sovereignty are those which relate to the legal organization and structure of the sovereign body. Just as the sovereign body may be restrained by its moral character and environments, so it may be restrained by its legally determined structure or procedure. Thus there is a formal restraint on the sovereignty of the British Parliament in the necessity for the concurrence of Queen, Lords, and Commons. There is a formal, and most effectual, restraint on the sovereign amending power of the United States in the requirement of ratification by three-fourths of the States. There is a formal restraint on the quasi-sovereignty of the Commonwealth in the requirement of ratification by a majority of the people and also by a majority of the States—and also, in some cases, by every State affected. These formal restraints are, strictly speaking, restraints on the mode of exercise of sovereignty, not on the sovereignty itself. Nevertheless, they may attain any degree of stringency, from requiring the concurrence of special majorities, to requiring the complete unanimity of every member of a complex body. Thus the formal limitation may amount practically to an almost absolute prohibition of amendment; and the sovereign power may be, as the American sovereign is, “a despot hard to rouse,” “a monarch who slumbers and sleeps.” (Dicey, Law of the Constitution, p. 137; and see Sidgwick, Elements of Politics, Appendix.)

(2.) POLITICAL SOVEREIGNTY.—Political sovereignty has been incidentally defined in our discussion of legal sovereignty. As a legal conception, a sovereign is one whose commands, whether just or unjust, wise or unwise, politic or impolitic, the courts will enforce. With political sovereignty the courts have nothing to do. They cannot recognize the “general will” of the political sovereign, but only the manifestation of that will as declared by the legal sovereign.

“That body is ‘politically’ sovereign or supreme in a State the will of which is ultimately obeyed by the citizens of the State. In this sense of the word the electors of Great Britain may be said to be, together with the Crown and the Lords, or perhaps, in strict accuracy, independently of the King and the Peers, the body in which sovereign power is vested. For, as things now stand, the will of the electorate, and certainly of the electorate in combination with the Lords and the Crown, is sure ultimately to prevail on all subjects to be determined by the British Government. The matter indeed may be carried a little further, and we may assert that the arrangements of the Constitution are now such as to ensure that the will of the electors shall by regular and constitutional means always in the end assert itself as the predominant influence in the country. But this is a political, not a legal fact. The electors can in the long run always enforce their will. But the Courts will take no notice of the will of the electors." (Dicey's Law of the Constitution, p. 66.)

"Adopting the language of most of the writers who have treated of the British Constitution, I commonly suppose that the present parliament, or the parliament for the time being, is possessed of the sovereignty; or I commonly suppose that the King and the Lords, with the members of the Commons' house, form a tripartite body which is sovereign or supreme. But, speaking accurately, the members of the Commons' house are merely trustees for the body by which they are elected and appointed; and, consequently, the sovereignty always resides in the King and the Peers, with the electoral body of the Commons. That a trust is imposed by the party delegating, and that the party representing engages to discharge the trust, seems to be imported by the correlative expressions 'delegation' and 'representation.' It were absurd to suppose that the delegating empowers the representative party to defeat or abandon any of the purposes for which the latter is appointed; to suppose, for example, that the Commons empower their representatives in Parliament to relinquish their share in the sovereignty to the King and the Lords." (Austin's Jurisprudence, vol. I., p. 253.)

It is quite true, as Dicey, in another passage, points out, that no English judge ever conceded, or under the present Constitution could concede, that Parliament in any legal sense is a trustee for the electors. Equally, as a matter of law, some jurists have contended that the Queen is the supreme administrator and supreme legislator, acting by and with the advice of ministers in matters of administration, and by and with the advice and consent of Parliament in matters of legislation. That is true in theory and as a constitutional form. Legal fictions are useful and potent solvents in the transformation of ideas. The legal sovereignty of Parliament is undoubted; but the sovereignty of Parliament, a principle of transcendent force and importance which superseded the sovereignty of royalty, is in reality, if not in name, rapidly tending to become a fiction, like that of regal sovereignty, which for a time it supplanted; it is gradually giving way before the idea of the sovereignty of the electoral body, or the sovereignty of the people represented by the electors. At present the idea of political sovereignty is prominent. Men commonly speak to-day in the language of politics, rather than in the language of jurisprudence. And the tendency to confuse legal and political sovereignty is increased by the fact that in some countries—for instance, Switzerland, and even the United States—the two are to a great extent identical. Wherever the ultimate legal sovereign is not a representative, but a constituent body—wherever the people themselves enact the supreme law—the political sovereign and the legal sovereign are the same. For good or for evil, the movement in favour of the Referendum—which finds a place in this Constitution as a means for the alteration of the organic law—tends in this direction.

(3.) TITULAR SOVEREIGNTY.—"This term is used to designate the king, or queen, of the United Kingdom; often also in the phrase 'Our Sovereign Lord the King,' or 'Our Sovereign Lady the Queen,' in Acts of Parliament and proclamations. There is implied in it the theory that the king is the possessor of sovereignty, or the powers of supreme government, as a monarch, in the strictest sense of jurists and constitutional writers; and in that sense it has long ceased to be a correct designation. The king is neither 'sovereign' nor 'monarch,' but, this notwithstanding, he hardly is mentioned oftener by his appropriate title of 'king' than by those inappropriate and affected names." (Austin's Jurisprudence, Campbell's ed., Note, p. 242.)

DELEGATED SOVEREIGNTY.—In all the constitutional Acts passed by the British Parliament conferring the right of self-government on British colonies, it is expressed or implied that the sovereignty is vested in the Queen. This form of expression is in accordance with traditional theory and usage, and it has been continued as a matter of courtesy, notwithstanding the fact that the form is at variance with the reality and the substance; as elsewhere pointed out (Note, § 11) the Queen shares with the Houses of the British Parliament in the sovereignty of the British Empire. The office of legislation, like the judicial and executive functions of sovereignty, may be delegated by the sovereign principal to subordinate persons or bodies, such as colonial governors and colonial parliaments. Within the limits of their constitutional Acts and charters, such governors and parliaments may exercise all the ordinary authority of a sovereign, in the same way as the Queen in the British Parliament, subject only to the same moral checks and restraints which have been already enumerated. (Dicey, Law of the Constitution, p. 95.)

The constitutional Acts of the colonies of Great Britain are illustrations of this delegation of sovereign power. Most of these colonies possess Statutory Constitutions, conferring on their respective legislatures, together with the Queen, represented by a governor, authority to legislate for the peace, order, and welfare of the people within their respective territories. The Constitution of the Dominion of Canada is a conspicuous example of this delegation. The Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth is an even more notable instance of the same process. But colonies, dominions, or commonwealths, having such a system of government, substantially free and practically independent, are still subject to the original sovereign body, the Queen in the British Parliament. That power, though dormant, is not extinguished or abandoned by the delegation. There is merely an implied compact not to interfere with those communities as long as they govern themselves according to the terms of their respective Constitutions. (Markby's Elements of Law, pp. 3, 4, 20.)

Proclamation of Commonwealth.

3. It shall be lawful for the Queen, with the advice of the Privy Council²², to declare by Proclamation²⁴ that, on and after a day therein appointed²⁵, not being later than one year after the passing of this Act²³, the people of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania, and also, if Her Majesty is satisfied that the people of Western Australia have agreed thereto, of Western Australia, shall be united²⁶ in a Federal Commonwealth²⁷ under the name of the Commonwealth of Australia. But the Queen may, at any time after the Proclamation, appoint a Governor-General²⁸ for the Commonwealth.

CANADA.—It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, to declare by Proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being more than six months after the passing of this Act, the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick shall form and be one Dominion under the name of Canada; and on and after that day those three Provinces shall form and be one Dominion under that name accordingly.—B.N.A. Act, sec. 3.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 3 of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, to declare by Proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being later than six months after the passing of this Act, the colonies of [here name the Colonies which have adopted the Constitution] . . . shall be united in one Federal Commonwealth under the Constitution hereby established, and under the name of the Commonwealth of Australia; and on and after that day the said colonies shall be united in one Federal Commonwealth under that name.” (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], p. 557.)

At the Adelaide Session, the clause was introduced in the same form, except that it was provided that the colonies “shall be united in a Federal Constitution under the name of the Commonwealth of Australia, and on and after that day the Commonwealth shall be established under that name.” On the motion of Mr. Isaacs, the clause was amended to read that “the people of” the colonies should be united. A further amendment by

Mr. Isaacs that they should be united "by"—not "in"—a Federal Constitution, was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 620-1.) At the Sydney session, on Mr. O'Connor's motion, "one year" was substituted for "six months." (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 227-8.)

At the Melbourne session, a proposal by Mr. Symon, to omit "the Commonwealth of," was negatived by 21 votes to 19 (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1746-50); and after the second report the same amendment, again moved by Mr. Symon, was negatived by 25 votes to 18. Mr. Reid proposed to add words enabling the Queen, at any time after the proclamation, to appoint a Governor-General, who might, before the Commonwealth was established, summon members of the Federal Executive Council and appoint other necessary officers; but Mr. Barton thought this went too far, and suggested the words:—"The Queen may, at any time after the making of the proclamation, appoint a Governor-General for the Commonwealth." This was agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1920-2.) Drafting amendments were made after the fourth report.

In the Imperial Parliament, the names of the federating colonies were filled in, with the provision for including Western Australia in the Proclamation if the Queen were satisfied that the people of Western Australia had agreed to the Constitution. (See Historical Introduction, p. 242, supra.)

This body was originally one of the most important councils of the Crown, variously called the Concilium Regis, the Ordinary Council, the Continual Council, and the Secret or Privy Council (Privatum Concilium). It acquired the last-named designation during the reign of Henry VI. (1422-1461). It was a council of confidential advisers, who were in constant attendance upon the king and assisted him in the decision of all questions of public policy and in the administration of the business of the kingdom. It represented the unity of the executive government. It consisted of nobles and other eminent persons in whom the king had confidence. Sir Edward Coke described it as an honourable and revered assembly of the king (4 Institutes, 53). Lord Hale described it as the Concilium in concilio, referring to the fact that the members of that council, being peers, were also members of the Magnum Concilium for which, in consultation with the king, they prepared the business. It was foreshadowed in the reign of Henry III. and assumed a definite organization during the long period covered by the successive reigns of the three Edwards. It was one of the three groups into which the Magnum Concilium was originally divided and which afterwards became fused into the House of Lords. These groups were—(1) The Lords Spiritual; (2) the Lords Temporal; and (3) the official and bureaucratic element immediately associated with the king in the government of the realm. (Gneist, English Const., pp. 349-351.)

In the middle ages the number of members of the Privy Council was limited to about fifteen. During the reign of Henry IV. (1401) the Council was composed of nine peers, three bishops, six knights and one untitled person. During the reign of Charles II. (1660-1685) the number of members had so increased as to make the body unwieldy "and unfit for the secrecy and dispatch which are necessary in many great affairs." A plan of reconstruction proposed by Sir William Temple was adopted. According to this the number of Privy Councillors was restricted to thirty, of whom fifteen were to be ministers and principal officers of state, and the remaining fifteen included ten lords and five commoners chosen by the king. During the same reign the germ of the modern Cabinet appeared in the custom which then began of consulting only a select or confidential committee of the Council in reference to important parliamentary and executive business. After that reign the numerical strength of the Privy Council, notwithstanding Temple's plan, went on increasing. At the present time there is practically no limit to the number of persons who may be appointed members of the Council. There are now more than 200 Privy Councillors who may be classified as follows:—(1) Members of the Royal Family and noblemen of the highest rank ; (2) statesmen who hold or have held high political office ; (3) the Speaker and members of the diplomatic service who have attained the rank of ambassadors ; (4) great officers of state departments on their retirement after long and distinguished service ; (5) the Lord Chancellor and other judges of the superior courts ; (6) ecclesiastical dignitaries ; (7) the Commander-in-Chief and the Master-General of the Ordnances ; (8) colonial ministers who have rendered conspicuous service to the Empire. These eminent personages are styled collectively “The Lords and others of Her Majesty’s Most Honourable Privy Council,” and they are each entitled to be addressed as “The Right Honourable.” In modern practice this numerical and talented complexity of the Council has not been found inconvenient, as no Privy Councillors, except those occupying for the time being official positions, political or judicial, are summoned to advise the Crown, either in matters of state or in matters of law. (Stephen’s Comm., 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 467.)

THE POLITICAL COMMITTEE.—The true Privy Council of the present day, and the one referred to in the above clause, is the Cabinet. The Cabinet has been defined as the political committee of the Privy Council, especially organized for the purpose of advising the Crown, directing all public departments, and deciding all important questions of administration, subject only to the approval of the House of Commons. (Hearn’s Government of England, p. 197.)

THE JUDICIAL COMMITTEE.—In Colonial causes the Privy Council had, from time immemorial, both original and appellate jurisdiction.

“Whenever a question arises between two provinces out of the realm as concerning the extent of their charters and the like, the King in his Council exercises original jurisdiction therein, upon the principles of feudal sovereignty. And so, likewise, when any person claims an island or a province, in the nature of a feudal principality, by grant from the King or his ancestors, the determination of that right belongs to the sovereign in council ; as was the case of the Earl of Derby, with regard to the Isle of Man, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth ; and the Earl of Cardigan and others, as representatives of the Duke of Montague, with relation to the Island of St. Vincent, in 1764. And to the same supreme tribunal there is, besides, in causes of a certain amount, an appeal in the last resort from the sentence of every court of justice throughout the colonies and dependencies of the realm. Practically, however, all the judicial authority of the privy council is now exercised by a committee of privy councillors, called the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, who hear the allegations and proofs, and make their report to Her Majesty in council, by whom the judgment is finally given.” (Stephen’s Comm., 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 470-1.)

The statutory jurisdiction of the Privy Council was first regulated in 1833 by the Act 3 and 4 William IV. c. 41, passed for the better administration of justice in the judicial branch of the Council. Under that law the Judicial Committee of the Council was definitely constituted. This tribunal was composed of the Lord President for the time being of the Council, the Lord Chancellor, and such Privy Councillors as held or had held office as Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, Chief Justice or judge of the Court of Queen’s Bench or Common Pleas, Chief Baron or Baron of the Court of Exchequer, the Master of the Rolls, the Vice-Chancellor, the Judges of the Prerogative and Admiralty Courts, and the Chief Judge of the Court in Bankruptcy. This Act was amended and extended by 6 and 7 Vic. c. 38 (1843) ; 7 and 8 Vic. c. 69 (1844) ; 14 and 15 Vic. c. 83 (1851) ; 44 and 45 Vic. c. 3 (1881) ; 50 and 51 Vic. c. 70 (1887) ; which contain a variety of regulations prescribing the manner of conducting appeals from the colonies. At common law, since modified by statute, the Privy Council had jurisdiction to entertain appeals from the Lord Chancellor in matters of lunacy and idiocy, and in appeals from the ecclesiastical and maritime courts, and in matters of patent and copyright. See note, “Appeal to Queen in Council,” § 310, infra.

THE ERECTION OF THE COMMONWEALTH.—Three distinct stages in the erection of the Commonwealth are contemplated by this clause:—(1) The passing of the Imperial Act, (2) the issue of the Queen’s proclamation appointing a day within one year after the passing of the Act, (3) the day when the people of the concurring colonies are united. These events and successive stages are not chronologically narrated in the clause. It will be conducive to clearness to consider them in the order of time in which they occur.

§ 23. "The Passing of this Act."

Before the Act 33 Geo. III. c. 13 (1793) every Act in which no particular time of commencement was specified operated and took effect from the first day of that session of Parliament in which it was passed. (Panter v. Attorney-General, 6 Brown's Cases in Parliament, 486.) An Act which was to take effect from and after the passing of the Act operated by legal relation from the first day of the session. (Latless v. Holmes, 4 T.R. 660.) But now, by 33 Geo. III. c. 13, where the commencement of an Act is not provided for in the Act, the date endorsed on the Act, stating when it has passed and received the Royal assent, is the date of its commencement. The Royal assent may be given during the course of the session, in which the two Houses of Parliament concur in it, or at the end of the session. The practice is to endorse on the first page of the Act, immediately after the introductory title, the date of the Royal assent. The Royal assent to an Imperial Act is given by the Queen in person or by commission; if by commission it is only given to such bills as may be specified in the schedule thereto.

This Act received the Royal assent on 9th July, 1900, which day is therefore the date of "the passing of this Act." But, although that date marks the commencement of the Act, the Commonwealth is not established, nor does the Constitution take effect, until the Queen has made a proclamation under the Act and the day fixed by that proclamation for the establishment of the Commonwealth has arrived. The only immediate consequences of the passing of the Act were—(1) That the Queen in Council was empowered to issue a proclamation appointing a day, not later than one year after the passing of the Act for the establishment of the Commonwealth (see § 24, "Proclamation"), and (2) that the Parliaments of the several colonies might proceed to pass preliminary electoral laws and to make arrangements for the election of the first Federal Parliament. In the Canadian Constitution it is expressly provided that the "subsequent provisions" are not to commence or have effect until after the day appointed in the Queen's proclamation for the establishment of the union.

A royal proclamation is a formal announcement of an executive Act; such as a summons to or dissolution or prorogation of Parliament; a declaration of peace or war; an admonition to the people to keep the law or a notification of enforcement of the provisions of a statute, the operation of which is left to the discretion of the Queen in Council. The object of a royal proclamation is only to make known the existing law or declare its enforcement; it can neither make or unmake the law. (Ex p. Chavasse, re Grazebrook, 34 L. J. Bk., 17.) A proclamation is a resolution of the Queen in Council, which, as we have already seen, means the Cabinet. The document by which it is promulgated passes under the Great Seal. (Anson, Law and Custom of the Constitution, Vol. II., p. 45.) It is announced through the official Government Gazette.

The proclamation referred to in this clause is one which it is in the discretion of the Queen, acting on constitutional advice, to issue subject only to the condition that the date fixed therein must be not later than one year after the passing of the Act.

Where an Imperial Act of Parliament is expressed to come into operation on a particular day, it is construed as coming into operation immediately on the expiration of the previous day. Thus if the day appointed is the 1st January, the day begins at midnight, marking the end of 31st December. (Tomlinson v. Bullock, 4 Q.B.D. 230.) This principle will apply to the day appointed in the Queen's proclamation. An expression of time in an Imperial Act, in the case of Great Britain, means Greenwich mean time Definition of Time Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vic., c. 9); Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vic., c. 63). On the day appointed by the proclamation, the following events are declared to happen, viz. :—

- (1.) The people of the colonies are united.
- (2.) The Commonwealth is established.
- (3.) The Constitution takes effect.
- (4.) The electoral and other procedure laws passed by the Parliaments of the federating colonies between “the passing of the Act” and “the day appointed” come into operation.

§ 26. “The People . . . shall be United.”

The formative words in this clause are more forcible, striking, and significant than those of the corresponding parts of the Constitutions of the United States and of Canada; they indicate the fundamental principle of the whole plan of government, which is neither a loose confederacy nor a complete unification, but a union of the people considered as citizens of various communities whose individuality remains unimpaired, except to the extent to which they make transfers to the Commonwealth. In the Constitution of the United States a union of the people of the States is referred to in the preamble, and there only, in the form of a recital that the people have ordained and established the Constitution in order to form a more perfect union. In the body of the Constitution it is nowhere stated that the people of the States are or shall be united. This was one of the ambiguities of the American instrument which helped to give rise to the doctrine of nullification and secession, and, at last, to the Civil War. (See § 6, “Nullification and Secession.”)

In the Canadian Constitution nothing is said about the union of the people; it is provided that on the day appointed in the Queen’s proclamation “the provinces . . . shall form and be one Dominion;” the people are ignored; the corporate entities of the union alone are specified as its component parts. The individual human units, the vital forces, the population of the provinces, are not even remotely alluded to. The vagueness of one and the deficiency of the other Constitution have not been allowed to disfigure the design of the Constitution of the Commonwealth. The union of the people of the colonies is doubly asserted and assured; first in the preamble, where it is recited that “the people have agreed to unite,” and secondly in this clause, in which it is emphatically stated with mandatory force that on the day appointed they “shall be united.”

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.—The condition necessary for the establishment of Western Australia as an Original State—that the Queen should be “satisfied that the people of Western Australia have agreed thereto”—was fulfilled by the affirmative vote in that colony on the Constitution, followed by addresses to the Queen passed by both Houses of the West Australian Parliament. (See Historical Introduction, p. 250, supra.)

The word “federal” occurs fifteen times in the Act, exclusive of references to the Federal Council of Australasia Act, 1885 :—

- (1.) Federal Commonwealth, Preamble and Clause 3.
- (2.) Federal Parliament, sec. 1.
- (3.) Federal Executive Council, secs. 62, 63, 64.
- (4.) Federal Supreme Court, sec. 71.
- (5.) Federal Courts, sec. 71.
- (6.) Federal Court, secs. 73—ii.; 77—i. and ii.
- (7.) Federal Jurisdiction, secs. 71, 73—ii., 77—iii., and 79.

The Federal idea, therefore, pervades and largely dominates the structure of the newly-created community, its parliamentary executive and judiciary departments.

“Federal” generally means “having the attributes of a Federation.” By usage, however, the term Federal has acquired several distinct and separate meanings, and is capable of as many different applications. In this Act, for example, the term Federal is used first in the preamble, and next in clause 3, as qualitative of the Commonwealth, considered as a political community or state; in various sections of the Constitution it is employed as descriptive of the organs of the central government. This use, in an Act of Parliament, of one term in reference to two conceptions so entirely different as state and government, is illustrative of the evolution of ideas associated with Federalism. In the history of Federation the word seems to have passed through several distinct stages or phases, each characterized by a peculiar use and meaning. At the present time the several shades of thought which the word, according to usage and authority, is capable of connoting are often blended and confused. These meanings may be here roughly generalized as a preliminary to a separate analysis:—

- (1.) As descriptive of a union of States, linked together in one political system.
- (2.) As descriptive of the new State formed by such a union.
- (3.) As descriptive of a dual system of government, central and provincial.
- (4.) As descriptive of the central governing organs in such a dual system of government.

The first, and oldest, of these meanings directs attention emphatically to the preservation of the identity of the States; the second implies a division of sovereignty—a State composed of States; the third asserts that the duality is a matter of government, not of sovereignty; whilst the fourth asserts nothing, but is merely a convenient form of nomenclature.

(1.) A UNION OF STATES.—The primary and fundamental meaning of a federation from the Latin fedus, a league, a treaty, a compact; akin to fides, faith) is its capacity and intention to link together a number of co-equal societies or States, so as to form one common political system and to regulate and co-ordinate their relations to one another; in other words a Federation is a union of States, subject to the preservation of state identity and state individuality within defined limits. Such a union as that of the United States called into existence a central government to deal with the general affairs of the union, but there was some discussion and doubt among publicists whether, as its result, it established a new State. The phrase “federal union,” or the abstract noun “Federation,” described the bond of union between the “United States,” but was silent as to whether the States so united formed a single composite State. It was contended that the union fell short of the attributes of a perfect State; that the original sovereignty of the component States remained unimpaired except to the extent of the power transferred to the union—a doctrine which was the battle ground of parties in America for many years before the Civil War. This was the sense in which the word “federal” is used in the Federalist, and in the early constitutional history of the United States.

(2.) A FEDERAL STATE.—In a secondary sense, the word “federal” is applied to the composite state, or political community, formed by a federal union of States. It thus describes, not the bond of union between the federating States, but the new State resulting from that bond. It implies that the union has created a new State, without destroying the old States; that the duality is in the essence of the State itself, in that there is a divided sovereignty, and a double citizenship. This is the sense in which Freeman, Dicey, and Bryce speak of a “Federal State;” and it is the sense in which the phrase “a Federal Commonwealth” is used in this section and in the preamble. The word “Federation,” which was primarily synonymous with the abstract “federal union,” is now frequently used as synonym for the concrete “Federal State.”

(3.) A DUAL SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT.—In recent years it has been argued that the word “federal” is inappropriately and inexactly used when applied to a State or community ; that there is no such thing as a federal State ; that if there is a State at all it must be a national State ; that any political union short of the principal attribute of statchood and nationhood, viz : sovereignty, is a mere Confederacy ; and that "federal" can only be legitimately used as descriptive of the partition and distribution of powers which is peculiar to a federal system. Federal, it is said, is properly applied to denote a dual but co-ordinate system of government, under one Constitution and subject to a common sovereignty, in which one State employs two separate and largely independent governmental organizations in the work of government ; the whole governing system, central and general, as well as provincial and local, constituting the federal government ; the central and general government being one branch, and the provincial and local governments forming the other branch of the governing organization. (Burgess, Political Sci., I., p. 79 ; II., p. 18.) Hence, according to this view, the expression "Federal Government" means not the central and general government alone, not the provincial and local governments alone, but the governing system, central and general, as well as provincial and local, as parts of one whole government under one Constitution.

(4.) CENTRAL GOVERNMENT OF A DUAL SYSTEM.—The term "federal" is often used as descriptive of the organs of the central and general government, such as the Federal Parliament, the Federal Executive, and the Federal Supreme Court. In this sense the word is in common use in the United States as synonymous with national. This use of the word has no important bearing on federal history or theory.

FEDERAL AND CONFEDERATE.—But in whichever of the above meanings the adjective "federal" is used, in modern usage it is distinguishable from the adjective "confederate." "Federal" is used of a type of union, or government, or State, in which the general and local governments are co-ordinate within their respective spheres, and both act directly on the citizens. "Confederate" is applied to a type of union, or government, known as a confederacy, in which the central government is incomplete—usually having only legislative powers—and its laws and ordinances are directed to the States, not to the citizens. Such a union is little more than a league or treaty between independent States, and does not create a new State, nor even, in the complete sense of the word, a new government ; but merely provides a representative organization for the purpose of promulgating decrees and making requisitions upon the members of the league. It has no power to enforce its decrees or requisitions. This was the fundamental infirmity of the Confederacy of the United States which existed before the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

FEDERAL AND NATIONAL.—The word "national" is frequently used in contrast with the word "federal;" but the distinction between the two varies greatly according to the meaning in which the word "federal" is used. A discussion of the two words may be best introduced by a reference to American usage.

United States.—In the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, the resolutions adopted after full discussion showed that it was intended to prepare a national plan of union and a national plan of government. In order, however, to conciliate opposition and to avoid arousing the prejudices and fears of small States, the use of the word "national" was eschewed. The word "federal" occurs in several of the constitutional resolutions adopted by the Convention, and such expressions as "perfect union," "within this union," "laws of the union," "United States," are to be found in the Constitution ; yet strange to say the word "federal" does not appear in any part of the document, although it is generally recognized that that Constitution is the model of all modern federal governments.

From its adoption until the great Civil War, judicial, political and academical writers usually abstained from employing the word "national" and substituted for it "federal." (Foster's Commentaries, vol. I., p. 91.) Since the Civil War the expression "National Government" has come into general use in the United States. "We still ordinarily speak of federal practice in the federal courts. But as appears by the congressional resolution quoted at the beginning of this section, as well as in the debates in the Convention, the phrase 'federal' is not inconsistent with 'national.'" (Id., p. 92.)

Canada.—In the Preamble to the British North America Act, 1867, it is recited that the provinces have expressed their desire to be "federally united in one Dominion under the Crown." This is the only passage in that Constitution in which there is any express allusion to the Federal idea.

DIFFERENT MEANINGS.—The words "federal" and "national," therefore, may be used either as mutually exclusive, or as partially overlapping. The first meaning of "federal," given above, either excludes or at least ignores any national element in federalism; it was the sense in which the word was used by the authors of the Federalist and by early American writers before the truly national character of the American Union was fully recognized and avowed. In that sense, therefore, "federal" denotes the organic relation of the States to the Union; whilst a community is described as national in so far as its tendency is to unite individuals in one political State, and as its government exercises direct power over individuals.

On the other hand, the second and third meanings recognize a national element in federalism itself; they affirm a duality, either of sovereign power or of government, and recognize that national organization in matters of national concern is as much a part of federalism as provincial organization in matters of provincial concern. This is the more modern scope of the word, and accords not only with later English and American usage, but with current usage in Australia. In this sense, the word national, when used in contrast with federal, refers only to the extension of the national element into the provincial area. In order to make clear these distinct conceptions of the scope of federalism, we proceed to analyse the federal and national elements in the Constitution, according to both definitions; first adopting the primary meaning of federal as describing a linking together of States, and then adopting the newer meaning as describing a dual system of government.

(1.) FEDERAL AND NATIONAL ELEMENTS: PRIMARY SENSE.—Using "federal" in its primary sense, the general difference between the federal and national elements of the Constitution of the Commonwealth may be thus defined. Those provisions are federal which recognize the States as distinct but co-equal societies, uniting them as parts of, but not completely consolidated and absorbed in, the Commonwealth; which regard the people as inhabitants of States, separate and independent, within their respective spheres; which guarantee the preservation of State territory and State autonomy within defined limits; which undertake to protect every State against foreign invasion and domestic violence; which secure certain specific political rights to the States; which impose certain obligations and prohibitions on the States; and which require the assent of the States, considered as separate entities, to all the legislation of the Commonwealth. Those provisions are national which unite the people of the Commonwealth as individual units and constitute them members of a common political group, without reference to the State in which they reside; which secure to the residents of all the States equality of rights without disability or discrimination throughout the Commonwealth—or what in America is called a "common citizenship;" which regard the people as the principal source of supreme authority within the Commonwealth, requiring their representation in a special legislative chamber charged with certain dominant powers; and above all which provide that the laws of the Commonwealth shall operate directly upon, and demand personal obedience from, the people in their personal and private capacities, and which provide special tribunals maintained by the Commonwealth for the interpretation and enforcement of its laws.

The combined operation of the federal and national principles of the Constitution is illustrated in the manner in which it was prepared, viz., by a Convention in which the people of each colony were equally represented; and in the method by which it was afterwards submitted to the people of each colony for ratification or rejection. The Federal Convention was not a body composed of delegates elected by the people of Australia, as individuals, forming one entire community. The people of four colonies, voting as provincial citizens, elected their representatives to the Convention to take part in the framing of the Constitution. The people of six colonies, voting as provincial citizens, subsequently ratified the Constitution. On the other hand, there is, in part, a recognition of the national principle, by the Constitution being founded on the will of the people, and not on the mandate of the provincial legislatures. The manner in which the Constitution was submitted to the authority of the people is strongly suggestive of a consolidating and nationalizing tendency. (Wilson in the Pennsylvania Convention; Elliot's Debates, 2nd ed., vol. II., p. 461.) It is obvious that the colonial legislatures were not constitutionally entitled to surrender to the proposed Commonwealth part of the legislative powers vested in them by Imperial Acts, and that not even the Imperial Parliament would be disposed to revolutionize the Constitution of the Australian colonies, without being assured by the strongest possible evidence and the best available demonstration, that the people of those colonies had freely and voluntarily agreed to the reform and readjustment of the system under which they had lived so long.

There is, at the same time, a conspicuous recognition of the federal principle in the fact that the people of each colony voted for or against the Constitution as provincial voters, a majority being required in each colony to carry the Constitution in that colony. As, in the ratification of the Constitution of the United States, each State convention acted and claimed to act only for and in the name of the people of that State (Foster's Commentaries, vol. I., p. 95); so, in the ratification of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, there was an independent referendum in each colony, in order to ascertain and give legal voice to the will of the people of that colony, without regard to the will of the people of the other colonies. The Constitution was, therefore, not adopted by the people of the Commonwealth, that was to be, voting en masse or at large or in their aggregate capacity, but by the people of the future States voting in each State as inhabitants thereof. The Constitution was framed by a combined power exercised by the people of each colony; in the first instance through their representatives in the Convention, limited in their sanctions, and in the last resort by the people of each colony voting at the referendum held in each colony. Had the Constitution emanated from the people, regardless of their provincial distribution, and had the colonies been referred to and used merely as convenient electoral districts by which the public expression could be ascertained, the popular vote throughout the union would have been the only rule for its adoption. (Madison, in The Federalist, No. xxxix., pp. 237 and 238; Foster's Commentaries, vol. I., p. 106.) If a general vote had been accepted as the test, the Constitution would have been triumphantly adopted on 3rd June, 1898, when the voting was—

Majority	108,835

The vote of the people, however, was limited to the respective States in which they resided, and in some cases artificial statutory majorities were required, so that there was an expression of popular suffrage and State sanction united in the method in which the adoption of the Constitution was secured. (See the judgment of Mr. Justice McLean in Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Peters, 515-569; see also Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dallas, 199, Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dallas, 419.)

Federal Structure of the Commonwealth.—The Commonwealth as a political society has been created by the union of the States and the people thereof. That the States are united is proved by the words in clause 6, which provide that the States are "parts of the Commonwealth;" that they are welded into the very structure and essence of the Commonwealth; that they are inseparable from it and as enduring and indestructible as the Commonwealth itself; forming the buttress and support of the entire constitu tional fabric. This is a federal feature which peculiarly illustrates the original and primary meaning of the term, as importing a corporate union. The Commonwealth, however, is not constituted merely by a union of States; it is something more than that; it is also a union of people.

Federal Structure of the Parliament.—As the Commonwealth itself is partly federal and partly national in its structure, so also is its central legislative organ the Parliament. Each original State is equally represented in the Senate; the right of State representation is embedded in the Constitution and does not depend on inference or implication. The Senate derives its power from the States, as political and co-ordinate societies, represented according to the rule of equality. (Madison, in The Federalist, No. xxxix., pp. 237-8.) In this manner the States become interwoven and inwrought into the very essence and substance of the Commonwealth, constituting the corporate units of the partnership as distinguished from its personal units, the people. Thus the Commonwealth is buttressed by the States and vitalized by the people.

National Structure of the Parliament.—The House of Representatives is the national branch of the Federal Parliament, in which the people of the Commonwealth are represented in proportion to their numbers. This great Chamber will give direct expression and force to the national principle. As such, its operation and tendency will be in the direction of unification and consolidation of the people into one integrated whole, irrespective of State boundaries, State rights, or State interests. If there were only two chambers in which the people were represented in proportion to their numbers, this would undoubtedly have tended towards the establishment of a unified form of government, in which the States, as political entities, would have been absolutely unrecognized, and would have been liable, in the course of time, to effacement. The Convention was entrusted with no such duty; under the Enabling Acts, by which it was called into existence, its mandate was to draft a Constitution in which the federal, as well as the national elements, were recognized.

State Rights—Federal.—The sections which guarantee equal representation in the Senate and a minimum representation in the House of Representatives; which enable the Governors of States to issue writs for the election of Senators and to certify their election to the Governor-General; which require the Governor of a State concerned to be notified of vacancies in the Senate; which continue State Constitutions except so far as they are inconsistent with the Constitution of the Commonwealth and its laws; which continue the power of State Parliaments except to the extent to which it has been withdrawn from them or vested in the Commonwealth; which continue State laws in force until provisions inconsistent therewith are legally made by the Federal Parliament; which preserve to each State the right to have direct communication with the Queen on all State questions; are examples of State rights secured by provisions of a Federal character.

State Inhibitions—Federal.—Of a similarly Federal character, although imposing disabilities, instead of conferring rights, are various sections forbidding the States from granting bonuses and bounties for trade purposes after a certain time; from making railway rates which operate as preferences and discriminations; from raising or maintaining naval and military forces; and from coining money.

Nationalism in the Executive.—The Executive government created by the Swiss Constitution is a peculiar blend of the federal and national elements. In its mode of election by the Federal Assembly, composed of the National Council and Council of States, sitting and voting together in joint session, the Swiss executive is the choice of a blended body in which the majority of the nation is likely to predominate; but the restriction that not more than one member of the executive can be chosen from the same canton renders the executive largely federal in its composition and spirit. The executive of the United States is likewise partly federal and partly national in its formation. The immediate election of the President is vested in the people; but the people do not vote en masse, but in groups as States; votes are allotted to them in a compound ratio which considers them partly as distinct and co-equal societies, and partly as unequal members of the same society. In a certain event the election is made by that branch of the legislature which consists of the National representatives; but in so choosing the President the votes are taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; in this way they again act as so many distinct and co-equal bodies politic. It thus appears that the executive government of the United States is of a mixed character, presenting at least as many federal as national features. (Madison, in The Federalist, No. xxxix., pp. 237-8; Foster's Comm., I., p. 106.)

The Executive of the Commonwealth is, in the Constitution, styled a "Federal Executive." There is reason to believe that the word federal is there used in a sense approximating to "National," already explained as one of the several meanings of the term. In the appointment and composition of the executive of the Commonwealth no hard and fast rules are laid down. Nominally the ministers of the Commonwealth will be chosen and appointed by the Governor-General; but his choice will be, in practice, confined to those statesmen who are able to command the confidence and secure the support of the House of Representatives, and who at the same time will be able to maintain the harmony and co-operation of the two Houses in the work of carrying on the business of the country.

Nationalism in the Judicial System.—The Constitution is National so far as it makes the laws of the Commonwealth binding on the people, Courts and Judges of every State; so far as the High Court has jurisdiction (sec. 73—ii.) to hear and determine appeals from State courts on questions of State laws; so far as the High Court has original jurisdiction (sec. 75) in certain classes of matters; so far as the Parliament has power to make laws (sec. 76) conferring original jurisdiction on the High Court in certain other classes of matters; so far as the Federal Parliament has power (sec. 77 iii.) to nationalize State courts by investing them with Federal jurisdiction.

Federalism in the Judicial System.—The Constitution is federal so far as it preserves the operation of State laws, not inconsistent with Commonwealth laws; so far as the State courts have exclusively original and primary jurisdiction to entertain matters in which State laws are involved; so far as it provides that the trial, on indictment, of an offence against any law of the Commonwealth shall be held in the State where the offence was committed (sec. 80).

Amendment—Federal and National.—"If we try the Constitution by its last relation to the authority by which amendments are to be made, we find it neither wholly national nor wholly federal. Were it wholly national, the supreme and ultimate authority would reside in the majority of the people of the Union; and this authority would be competent at all times, like that of a majority of every national society, to alter or abolish its established government. Were it wholly federal, on the other hand, the concurrence of each State in the Union would be essential to every alteration that would be binding on all. The mode provided by the plan of the Convention is not founded on either of these principles. In requiring more than a majority, and particularly in computing the proportion by States, not by citizens, it departs from the national and advances towards the federal character; in rendering the concurrence of less than the whole number of States sufficient, it loses again the federal and partakes of the national character." (Madison, in The Federalist, No. xxxix., p. 237-8; Foster's Comm., I., p. 106.)

Composite Character of the Constitution.—In the primary sense of the word "federal," therefore, the Constitution of the Commonwealth is a remarkable compound of the federal and national elements. It is not wholly National, it is not wholly Federal, but a compound of both. In the sources from which the ordinary powers of government are drawn, people and States, it is partly federal and partly national; in the operation of its laws on individuals it is national and not federal ; in the appointment and tenure of its Executive it is national and not federal ; in the wide jurisdiction of its judiciary it is more national than federal ; in its guarantee of State rights it is federal ; in its imposition of disabilities on States it is federal ; and finally in the authoritative mode of carrying amendments by requiring a majority of all votes, as well as majorities of the people voting in the majority of States, it is partly federal and partly national. (Madison, in The Federalist, No. xxxix. ; Lodge's ed., p. 239.)

(2.) FEDERAL AND NATIONAL: NEWER SENSE.—We may now analyse the federal and national elements of the Constitution in the more modern sense ; describing as federal those features in which the structure of the central organs of government, and the distribution of powers between the central and local governments, recognize the duality of national and provincial interests ; and describing as national those features in which this duality of interest is not recognized.

Structure of the Federal Parliament.—The structure of the two Houses of Parliament is completely federal—the House of Representatives embodying the national aspect, and the Senate the provincial aspect, of the federal duality. But in the exclusive powers of the House of Representatives with regard to the initiation and amendment of money bills there is a predominating national element ; and this is still further emphasized in the “deadlock clause” (sec. 57), which is designed to ensure that a decisive and determined majority in the national chamber shall be able to overcome the resistance of a majority in the provincial chamber.

Structure of the Federal Executive and Judiciary.—The other two departments show, in their composition, no sign of the federal duality. It has indeed been argued that the political necessity of securing the assent of both Houses to government legislation will place the Executive practically under a double control ; but even if this were so, it would affect legislative policy rather than the execution of the laws. In fact, so far as the structure of the organs of government goes, the federal element has its stronghold in the legislative organ. In the making of laws, even within the sphere entrusted to the national legislature, it was felt that provincial interests should be represented ; but the execution and interpretation of those laws, when made, was recognized to be a national matter alone.

Powers of the Federal Parliament.—It is in the distribution of legislative powers between the Federal Parliament and the State Parliaments that the fundamentally federal basis of the Constitution is most apparent ; yet even here there is a distinct predominance of the national element. Looking down the sub-sections of sec. 51, we find that in many of them the principle of duality is expressly recognized, and the exclusive domestic jurisdiction of the States expressly reserved. For instance, the trade and commerce power is confined to inter-State and foreign trade and commerce, and it is hedged in (Chap. IV.) with a number of minute restrictions to prevent injustice or discrimination as between States. The federal power of imposing taxation and granting bounties is similarly hedged about with conditions for the protection of the States. In sub-sec. x., the power over fisheries is confined to waters beyond territorial limits—the territorial rights of the States being thus reserved. In sub-secs. xiii. and xiv., the powers as to Banking and Insurance also contain a reservation of State rights. In sub-sec. xxxv., power to deal with conciliation and arbitration is only given in the case of inter-State industrial disputes, and so on. In all these cases, the duality of interest is recognized in the very gift of the power to the Federal Parliament, and the distribution of power is thus essentially federal. But in most of the sub-sections this nice analysis is not found. The advantages of uniform legislation, especially in matters relating to commerce, have prevailed over the sentiment of local independence ; and we find that if a subject has, on the whole, a national aspect, it is handed over unconditionally to the national legislature. Thus posts and telegraphs, defences, quarantine, currency, weights and measures, bills of exchange and promissory notes, bankruptcy and insolvency, copyrights, patents, and trade-marks, naturalization and aliens, trading and financial corporations, marriage and divorce, and other subjects, are made unconditionally national. No State reserves any rights with respect to its internal posts and telegraphs, or of marriages between its own citizens; on all these subjects the distinction between internal and inter-State jurisdiction is abolished. These subjects are not federalized, but nationalized—or at least, the power to nationalize them is given to the Federal Parliament.

Powers of the Federal Executive.—The executive power is of course co-extensive with the legislative power. It extends to the execution of the laws made by the Parliament. Consequently it combines federal and national features in exactly the same way.

Powers of the Federal Judiciary.—The original jurisdiction of the federal courts is based entirely on the dual principle of distribution of powers. It embraces at the outset five classes of matters, of a specially federal character, and can only be extended by the Parliament to four other classes of matters of a federal character. In all other matters the original jurisdiction of the State courts is exclusive.

The appellate jurisdiction of the High Court, on the other hand, is completely national—and is in fact the most national element in the whole Constitution. It extends—subject only to partial limitation by the Federal Parliament—to cases of every description decided by the Supreme Courts of the States, whether of federal concern or not. The High Court is, in fact, not a federal court of appeal, but a national court of appeal.

The Amending Power.—Lastly, with regard to the power of amendment, the Constitution is federal. In the initiation of amendments the dual principle is recognized in the power given to either House—the House representing the Nation, or the House representing the States—to submit a proposal to the Referendum. And at the Referendum, the dual principle is further recognized by the power of veto given both to a majority of the people and to a majority of the States.

Composite Character of the Constitution.—It thus appears that even according to the more modern meaning of the word “federal”—which recognizes the national as well as the provincial elements of federalism—the Constitution may be described as partly federal and partly national. That is to say, it contains not only those national elements which appertain to a pure Federation, but also some further national elements which appertain rather to a Unification. This is especially the case with regard to the wide extent of some of its legislative powers, and with regard to the unlimited appellate jurisdiction of the High Court.

THE EVOLUTION OF NATIONALISM.—Whilst the life of the Commonwealth will begin with a clear differentiation of function and status, as between it and its corporate units, the States, it does not follow that the outlines and objects of that differentiation will be distinctly and permanently preserved. There will be, at the outset, a clear demarcation of spheres, a clear delimitation of powers separating the Central Government from the State Governments; but the initial law must not be regarded as expressing a relationship as unchanging as the laws of the Medes and Persians. The Constitution will be capable of change and evolution, arising from the altered conditions of the people whom it is designed to govern. It will be a living organism, animated and dominated by the pulsations of vital forces inherent in every community. It must not be considered as expressing finality in form or principle. If it attempted to restrict the potentialities of future growth and expansion, it would stand self-condemned, as antagonistic to reason, and blind to the lessons and experience of the past. It does not do so. For some years the national principles may be weak or dormant—the occasion may not arise to call them into marked activity. Nations are made only by great occasions, not by paper constitutions. But the energy will be there, and in the fulness of time, when the opportunity comes, the nation will arise like a bridegroom coming forth from his chamber, like a strong man to run a race. This change will not necessarily imply any conflict with the States, because the people of the States, who are also the people of the nation, will throb with the new life, and will be disposed to yield to the irresistible pressure of nationhood. In the adaptability of the Constitution, and (should need arise) in the power of amending the Constitution—the facilities for which are far greater than in the United States—there is ample room for the growth and development of such tendencies as may assert themselves in the present or the distant future of the Commonwealth. The Constitution will come into operation under the fair and well-distributed influence of two forces. One of those forces will be the centralizing attraction of the Commonwealth, and its tendency to detract from the power and dignity of its corporate units the States. The other will be the centrifugal disposition of the States. They will desire to retain their constitutional status unimpaired—to assert State rights and State interests in the Senate—to subordinate Commonwealth policy, and restrict encroachment and invasion by the Central Government on the provincial spheres. In this struggle and competition for supremacy it would, without the aid and enlightenment of experience in other countries, be difficult to conjecture whether in the end the State or the national principle would conquer. Securely entrenched in the Senate behind the ramparts of equal representation, it might be argued that the States would in the end “boss” the Federal legislative machine, and either elog it altogether, or mould its decrees to suit the views of a majority of States, regardless of the interests of the people of the Commonwealth as a whole.

That, however, has not been the experience of the Federal Republic of the United States of America, from which we have copied the principle of equal State representation and the recognition of the States as integral parts of the Federal Union. Mr. Bryce says that—except during the slavery struggle, when the Senate happened to be under the control of the slave-holders, and when it asserted State rights and State sovereignty—the Senate has never been the stronghold of small States, for American politics have never turned on the antagonism between two sets of Commonwealths, but rather on the conflicts of parties. The national spirit which was growing as a silent force, after a long battle with the doctrine of State sovereignty, eventually emerged safely and soared victoriously over all opposition. The latent ambiguity in that Constitution as to whether the United States formed a compact dissoluble at will, or whether it was an indestructible union of indestructible States, was for ever swept away by the Civil War; it was that ambiguity alone which gave rise to the doctrine of secession and nullification which caused the war. After the war there yet remained the question whether the national element would, as a silent force, acting without any express amendment, prove more potent and assertive than the State element.

A few years before 1889, when Mr. Bryce published his book, the American Protestant-Episcopal Church, at its annual Convention, introduced, among the short sentence prayers, one suggested by an eminent New England divine, in these words:—“O Lord, bless our nation.” Next day the prayer was brought up for re-consideration, when so many objections were raised by the laity to the word nation as importing a recognition of national unity that it was dropped, and instead there were adopted the words, “O Lord, bless the United States.” (Amer. Comm., I., p. 12.)

THE TRUE IDEAL OF FEDERALISM.—The drift of the development of the American Constitution is indicated in the following extracts from an essay entitled “The Ideal American Commonwealth,” written by Dr. Burgess and published in the “Political Science Quarterly Review,” vol. 10:—

“I do not think that it need be feared that the doctrine of the sovereignty of the several states will again seriously threaten this development. The Civil War fixed the principle of our polity, that the nation alone is the sovereign, that the nation alone is the real state. We do still hear, indeed, the phrase ‘sovereignty of the states within their respective spheres:’ but this only signifies that we have not yet invented the new forms of expression to fit the new order of things. All that we can now mean by the old phrase is: that realm of autonomy reserved to the states by the sovereignty of the nation declared through the constitution” (pp. 408, 410).

“The language of the constitution of 1787 may be construed, and I think should be construed, as changing a confederacy of sovereignties into a national state with federal government, that is with a system of government in which the powers are distributed by the national constitution, either expressly or impliedly, specifically or generally, between two sets of government organs, largely independent of each other. Yet, on the other hand, it may be construed with much show of logic as having simply substituted the people of the several states for their legislatures, that is for the organic bodies in the confederate constitution of 1781. . . . But I think this theory is now wholly erroneous. It will not fit facts of our history since 1860. Those facts can be explained only upon the theory that federalism with us now means a national state, with two sets of governmental organs, largely independent of each other, but each deriving its powers and authorities ultimately from a common source, namely, the sovereignty of the nation. And this conception of a governmental system I claim to be purely an American product. It is, however, the true ideal of federalism, and all other nations must, I believe, ultimately come to it. It reconciles the imperialism of the Romans, the local autonomy of the Greeks, and the individual liberty of the Teutons, and preserves what is genuine and enduring in each.” (Id. 416.)

§ 28. “Appoint a Governor-General.”

“Formerly each colonial governor was appointed by special letters-patent under the Great Seal which defined his tenure of office and the scope of his powers and duties. As the preparation and issue of these formal and authoritative instruments usually takes considerable time, it became the practice, prior to the year 1875, to issue a minor commission, under the royal sign-manual and signet, to a newly appointed governor, empowering him, meanwhile, to act under the commission and instructions given to his predecessor in office. But doubts having been raised in certain cases, whether these minor commissions effectually authorized the holder to perform all the duties and functions appertaining to his office, it was in 1875 deemed expedient by Her Majesty's government, under the advice of the law officers of the Crown, to issue, on behalf of each colony of the empire, letters-patent constituting permanently the office of governor therein; and providing that all future incumbents of this office should be appointed by special commission under the royal sign-manual and signet to fulfil the duties of the same, under the general authority and directions of the letters-patent aforesaid, and of the permanent instructions to be issued in connection therewith. But, before introducing this change, a circular despatch, dated October 20, 1875, was addressed to all colonial governors, enclosing a copy of the proposed new forms, and inviting suggestions to be submitted by the governor, after consultation with his responsible ministers; for such alterations as might appear to them to be specially advisable in the case of the particular colony.” (Todd's Parliamentary Government in the Colonies, p. 77-8.)

The results of the interchange of views between the Colonial Secretary, Earl Carnarvon, and the government of the Dominion of Canada, was that it was resolved to make a considerable modification in the manner of constituting the office of the Queen's representative in British Colonies and possessions, and in the manner of filling the office and instructing the incumbent of the office in the method of discharging his duties. It was decided to constitute the office in each colony and possession by letters-patent under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom, so drawn as to be of general application to future incumbents of the office and to make permanent provision for the execution of its duties. Accompanying the letters-patent instituting the office there was to be a code of instructions passed under the royal sign-manual and signet, addressed to the governor for the time being or in his absence to the officer administering the government. Appointments were to be made to the governorship as vacancies arose by a commission under the royal sign-manual and signet. At the instance of the Government of the Dominion, alterations were made in the instructions accompanying the letters-patent constituting the office of Governor-General of Canada.

The principal mandates in the old instructions were these:—(1) Relating to the exercise of the prerogative of mercy by the Governor with or without the advice of his ministers, (2) giving directions concerning the meetings of the Executive or Privy Council, (3) authorizing the Governor in certain contingencies to act in opposition to the advice of his ministers, and (4) prescribing the classes of Bills to be reserved for Imperial consideration.

The new practice was not inaugurated in Canada, nor were the alterations in the instructions promulgated, until the Marquis of Lorne was appointed to the office of Governor-General of Canada, in succession to Lord Dufferin, when three new instruments were drawn up, viz. :—Letters-patent, dated 5th October, 1878; instructions bearing even date; and Lord Lorne's commission, bearing date 7th October, 1878.

Commencement of Act.

4. The Commonwealth shall be established²⁹, and the Constitution of the Commonwealth shall take effect³⁰, on and after the day so appointed. But the Parliaments of the several colonies may at any time after the passing of this Act make any such laws³¹, to come into operation on the day so appointed, as they might have made if the Constitution had taken effect at the passing of this Act.

UNITED STATES.—The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same.—Const., Art. VII.

CANADA.—The subsequent Provisions of this Act shall, unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, commence and have effect on and after the Union, that is to say, on and after the day appointed for the Union taking effect in the Queen's Proclamation; and in the same Provisions, unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, the name Canada shall be taken to mean Canada as constituted under this Act.—B.N.A. Act, sec. 4.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 4 of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows :—

“Unless where it is otherwise expressed or implied, this Act shall commence and have effect on and from the day so appointed in the Queen's proclamation; and the name ‘The Commonwealth of Australia’ or ‘The Commonwealth’ shall be taken to mean the Commonwealth of Australia as constituted under this Act.”

This clause, with the omission of the second word “where,” was adopted at the Adelaide Session, 1897. Mr. Carruthers suggested that the introductory words were vague; and Mr. Kingston proposed to substitute “Except in regard to section 3, which shall come into operation at the passing of the Act.” This was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 621-5.) At the Sydney Session, following the suggestions of the Legislatures of New South Wales and Tasmania, the words “unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, this Act” were omitted, and the words “The Constitution of the Commonwealth” were substituted. A provision was then added that “The Parliaments of the several colonies may at any time after the passing of this Act make any such laws, to come into operation on the day so appointed, as they might have made if the Constitution had been established at the passing of this Act.” (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 223-31.) At the Melbourne Session, verbal amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 29. “Shall be Established.”

Clause 3 says that the people of the Commonwealth shall be united on and after the day appointed in the Queen's Proclamation. Clause 4 contains a detailed enumeration and elaboration of the legal results of the Union so accomplished. The first immediate and necessary result is that the Commonwealth is established. The constitutional definition of the Commonwealth will be analysed later on. Meanwhile, attention may be drawn to the significance of the word “Established.” The same verb is used in the preamble to the constitution of the United States, where it is recited that in order to form a more perfect union the people “do ordain and establish this Constitution.”

The word “Established” is used in the enacting passages of several State Constitutions, such as those of Pennsylvania, Vermont, and Massachusetts. (See § 17, “Commonwealth,” supra.) In some of the constitutional Acts passed by the British Parliament authorizing the formation of colonies, the words "erect" and "establish" are used as synonymous terms. The Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 83, sec. 1 (1828), provided that it should be lawful for the King by charters or letters patent under the Great Seal to "erect and establish" courts of judicature in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land. The Act 3 and 4 Vic. c. 62, sec. 2 (1840), authorized the Queen by letters patent to "erect" into a separate colony or colonies any islands being dependencies of the colony of New South Wales; and by section 3, in case Her Majesty should establish any such new colony or colonies, Legislative Councils might be "established" therein.

The Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76, sec. 51, enabled the Queen by letters patent to erect into a separate colony or colonies any territories of the colony of New South Wales lying northward of 26° south latitude. By section 34 of 13 and 14 Vic., c. 59, that provision was amended so as to enable the Queen to detach territories of New South Wales lying northward of 30° of south latitude and to "erect" them into a separate colony or colonies or to include the same in any colony or colonies to be "established" under 3 and 4 Vic. c. 62, sec. 2.

In the first section of the notable Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, the provision occurs that the territories comprised in the district of Port Phillip should be "erected" into and thenceforth form a separate colony to be known as the colony of Victoria. In the second section of the same Act the words occur "that upon the issuing of such writs for the first election of members of the Legislative Council of the said colony of Victoria such colony shall be deemed to be established." From these precedents it appears that the word "Established" is the one commonly used to denote the creation of a new State or community.

§ 30. "Shall take Effect."

Another consequence and necessary incident of the Union is that the Constitution shall on the day so appointed "take effect" or come into operation. Here we reach the third and final stage in the progress of political organization contemplated by the Act. It clearly appears that the Constitution is something distinct from the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth is the community united by the Imperial Act. The Constitution provides the necessary machinery for the government of that community so as to secure its continuity, safety and development. The provision of Clause 3 that the Queen may appoint a Governor-General for the Commonwealth at any time after the issue of the Proclamation, and before the actual establishment of the Commonwealth and before the Constitution "takes effect," is somewhat incongruous and looks like an interpolation out of harmony with the sequence of the other initiatory stages. It enables the Queen to appoint a Governor-General, not for an actual existent Commonwealth, not to fill an office created by a constitution actually in force, but for the Commonwealth that is to be, and in order to fill an office that does not yet exist.

§ 31. "May make any such Laws."

At any time after the passing of the Act, and therefore before as well as after the day appointed by the Proclamation, the Parliament of each of the federating colonies may proceed to exercise certain powers intended by the Constitution to be conferred upon them. The Constitution, by which these powers are defined, does not take effect until the day appointed by the Proclamation. In anticipation of that day the Act authorizes the Parliaments to exercise the powers referred to, but the laws when passed in the exercise of those powers do not come into force until the arrival of the day appointed by the Proclamation. Turning to the Constitution we find that the laws referred to by this clause comprise the following:—

- (1.) Laws prescribing the method of choosing the Senators for a State.—
Sec. 9.

- (2.) Laws for determining the times and places of election of Senators for a State.—Sec. 10.
- 3.) Laws for determining the divisions in each State for which Members of the House of Representatives may be chosen, and the number of Members to be chosen for each division.—Sec. 29.
- (4) Laws of the Parliament of Queensland for determining the divisions in that State for which Senators may be chosen, and the number of Senators to be chosen for each division.—Sec. 7.

Operation of the Constitution and Laws.

5. This Act³², and all laws³³ made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth under the Constitution, shall be binding on the courts, judges, and people³⁴ of every State and of every part of the Commonwealth³⁵, notwithstanding anything in the laws of any State³⁶; and the laws of the Commonwealth³⁷ shall be in force on all British ships³⁸, the Queen's ships of war excepted⁴⁰, whose first port of clearance³⁹ and whose port of destination are in the Commonwealth.

UNITED STATES.—This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.—Const., Art. VI., sec. 2.

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.—Amendment X.

SWITZERLAND.—The Cantons are sovereign, so far as their sovereignty is not limited by the Federal Constitution; and, as such, they exercise all the rights which are not delegated to the federal government.—Const., Art. 3.

GERMANY.— . . . and the laws of the Empire shall take precedence of those of each individual State.—Const., Art. 2.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 7 of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“The Constitution established by this Act, and all laws made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth in pursuance of the powers conferred by the Constitution, and all treaties made by the Commonwealth, shall, according to their tenor, be binding on the courts, judges, and people of every State, and of every part of the Commonwealth, anything in the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding; and the laws and treaties of the Commonwealth shall be in force on board of all British ships whose last port of clearance or whose port of destination is in the Commonwealth.”

This clause was based in part upon sec. 20 of the Federal Council of Australasia Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vic. c. 60), which was as follows:—

“All Acts of the Council, on being assented to in manner hereinbefore provided, shall have the force of law in all Her Majesty's possessions in Australasia in respect to which this Act is in operation, or in the several colonies to which they shall extend, as the case may be, and on board of all British ships, other than Her Majesty's ships of war, whose last port of clearance or port of destination is in any such possession or colony.”

The provision as to British ships in the Federal Council Act was not included in the draft of that Act framed at the Sydney Conference in 1883, but was inserted by the imperial draftsmen.

At the Sydney Convention, 1891, there was some discussion as to this provision. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1891, pp. 558-60.) At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause as adopted in 1891 was introduced verbatim. The provision as to British ships was again discussed. It was thought to be much too wide, and was even criticized as “sheer nonsense,” but being sanctioned by the Federal Council Act, it was not altered. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 626-8.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Council of New South Wales, to omit the words "and treaties made by the Commonwealth," was agreed to. Mr. Reid moved to omit the whole provision as to British ships; but this was thought to be going too far, and he withdrew it. The words "and treaties" were omitted; the words "excepting Her Majesty's ships and vessels of war" were inserted; and the final words were altered to read: "whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the Commonwealth." (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, pp. 239-53) At the Melbourne session, drafting amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

When the Commonwealth Bill was first under the consideration of the Imperial Government in England, it was proposed by the Law Officers of the Crown that this clause should be amended by omitting the words "in force on all British ships, the Queen's ships of war excepted, whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the Commonwealth," and by adding the words: "and the Laws of the Commonwealth shall be Colonial laws within the meaning of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865." (See House of Coms. Pap., May, 1900, p. 19; Historical Introduction, p. 229, supra.) In the Bill as introduced into the House of Commons the clause was restored to the shape in which it was originally passed by the Convention, with the addition of a new paragraph relating to the prerogative of appeal, which was afterwards omitted in Committee. (See Historical Introduction, pp. 242, 248, supra.)

§ 32. "This Act."

The expression "This Act" occurs in Clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 8. The Act consists of Clauses 1 to 9 inclusive, and Clause 9 enacts the Constitution; so that the Constitution is unquestionably a part of the Act. In the Commonwealth Bill as introduced into the Imperial Parliament, the Constitution was, at the suggestion of the Crown Law Officers, annexed as a schedule to the Bill; but in Committee the original form of the Bill was restored. (See Hist. Note to Clause 2.) In the construction of the words "This Act" the question will ever be open to argument as to whether the preamble is part of the Act and to what extent it may be used to explain, enlarge, or contract the meaning of words in the Constitution. (See Note § 2 "Preamble.")

§ 33. "And all Laws."

No difficulty is suggested by the words, "and all laws made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth under the Constitution." The words "under the Constitution" are words of limitation and qualification. They are equivalent to the words in the corresponding section of the Constitution of the United States "in pursuance thereof." Supra. Not all enactments purporting to be laws made by the Parliament are binding; but laws made under, in pursuance of, and within the authority conferred by the Constitution, and those only, are binding on the courts, judges, and people. A law in excess of the authority conferred by the Constitution is no law; it is wholly void and inoperative; it confers no rights, it imposes no duties; it affords no protection. (Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U.S. 425; see note § 447 "Power of the Parliament of a Colony.") The Act itself is binding without limitation or qualification because it is passed by the sovereign Parliament, but the laws passed by the Parliament of the Commonwealth, a subordinate Parliament, must be within the limits of the delegation of powers or they will be null and void. To be valid and binding they must be within the domain of jurisdiction mapped out and delimited in express terms, or by necessary implication, in the Constitution itself. What is not so granted to the Parliament of the Commonwealth is denied to it. What is not so granted is either reserved to the States, as expressed in their respective Constitutions, or remains vested but dormant in the people of the Commonwealth. The possible area of enlargement of Commonwealth power, by an amendment of the Constitution, will be considered under Chapter VIII.

"Every legislative assembly existing under a federal constitution is merely a subordinate law-making body, whose laws are of the nature of by-laws, valid whilst within the authority conferred upon it by the constitution, but invalid or unconstitutional if they go beyond the limits of such authority. There is an apparent absurdity in comparing the legislature of the United States to an English railway company or a school board, but the comparison is just. Congress can, within the limits of its legal powers, pass laws which bind every man throughout the United States. The Great Eastern Railway Company can, in like manner, pass laws which bind every man throughout the British dominions. A law passed by Congress which is in excess of its legal powers, as contravening the Constitution, is invalid; a law passed by the Great Eastern Railway Company in excess of the powers given by Act of Parliament, or, in other words, by the legal constitution of the company, is also invalid; a law passed by Congress is called an 'Act' of Congress, and if ultra vires is described as 'unconstitutional'; a law passed by the Great Eastern Railway Company is called a 'by-law,' and if ultra vires is called, not 'unconstitutional,' but 'invalid.' Differences, however, of words must not conceal from us essential similarity in things. Acts of Congress, or of the Legislative Assembly of New York or of Massachusetts, are at bottom simply 'by-laws,' depending for their validity upon their being within the powers given to Congress or to the State legislatures by the Constitution. The by-laws of the Great Eastern Railway Company, imposing fines upon passengers who travel over their line without a ticket, are laws, but they are laws depending for their validity upon their being within the powers conferred upon the company by Act of Parliament, i.e., by the company's constitution. Congress and the Great Eastern Railway Company are in truth each of them nothing more than subordinate law-making bodies." (Dicey's Law of the Constitution, p. 137.)

"Every Act of Congress, and every Act of the legislatures of the States, and every part of the Constitution of any State, which are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, are necessarily void. This is a clear and settled principle of (our) constitutional jurisprudence." (Kent's Commentaries, I., p. 314.)

"The legal duty therefore of every judge, whether he act as a judge of the State of New York or as a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, is clear. He is bound to treat as void every legislative act, whether proceeding from Congress or from the State legislatures, which is inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States. His duty is as clear as that of an English judge called upon to determine the validity of a by-law made by the Great Eastern Railway Company or any other Railway Company. The American judge must in giving judgment obey the terms of the Constitution, just as his English brother must in giving judgment obey every Act of Parliament bearing on the case." (Dicey, Law of the Constitution, p. 146.)

In Canada the Dominion Parliament has power to make laws in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects exclusively assigned to the legislatures of the Provinces.

"There exists, however, one marked distinction in principle between the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the Canadian Dominion. The Constitution of the United States in substance reserves to the separate States all powers not expressly conferred upon the national government. The Canadian Constitution in substance confers upon the Dominion government all powers not assigned exclusively to the Provinces. In this matter the Swiss Constitution follows that of the United States." (Dicey, Law of the Const., p. 159.)

This characteristic of the Canadian Constitution tends greatly to strengthen the power of the Dominion at the expense of the Provinces, and so helps, in common with other features, to make it approximate to a unitarian rather than a federal form.

THE COLONIAL LAWS VALIDITY ACT.—A detailed reference may be here appropriately made to a subject which was not specifically discussed during the progress of the Commonwealth Bill through the Federal Convention, but which was raised by the Law Officers of the Imperial Government whilst the Bill was under consideration in England, namely, the applicability of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, to the Constitution of the Commonwealth. Can the Federal Parliament, legislating in reference to subjects assigned to it, enact laws repugnant to Imperial legislation applicable to the colonies, in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or passed subsequently?

It was a rule of common law that a colonial legislature was subordinate to the English and afterwards to the British Parliament; that it could not pass laws in conflict with the laws of England expressly applicable to the colonies. This rule was confirmed by Statute. It was declared by sec. 9 of 7 and 8 Wm. III. c. 22 (1696) that all laws, by-laws, usages, and customs which should be in practice in any of the American plantations, repugnant to any law made or to be made in the Kingdom, "so far as such laws shall relate to and mention the said plantations," were null and void. (Supra, p. 1.) This section was subsequently re-enacted, in substantially the same words, by 3 and 4 Wm. IV. c. 59, sec. 56 (1833). The commissions and instructions of colonial governors used to require that ordinances passed by the Governor in Council should not be repugnant to the law of England.

The extent of this prohibition was very uncertain, and doubts frequently arose as to what constituted a repugnancy. See, for instance, the Imperial Act, 1 Wm IV. c. 20 (1831) passed to remove doubts which had arisen in Lower Canada. A vague limitation was even supposed to exist, that the laws of a Crown colony must not be repugnant to the common law. (See Tarring, Law relating to Colonies, 2nd ed., 144; Stephen, Hist. of Crim. Law, ii., 58.)

This vague and sweeping rule of invalidity was ultimately superseded by the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 28 and 29 Vic. c. 63. Sec. 2 of that Act declares that any colonial law which is in any respect repugnant to an Act of the Imperial Parliament extending to the colony (which is defined to mean "applicable to such colony by the express words or necessary intendment of any Act of Parliament") or repugnant to any order or regulation made under any such Act, shall be read subject to such Act, order, or regulation, and shall, to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be absolutely void. Sec. 3 provides that no colonial law shall be void on the ground of repugnancy to the law of England unless it is repugnant to some such Act of Parliament, order, or regulation as aforesaid.

When this Act was passed, it was not regarded as a curtailment of legislative power in the colonies; it took away no power previously enjoyed; it was, in fact, looked upon as one of the charters of colonial legislative independence, next in importance to the famous Declaratory Act, 18 Geo. III. c. 12, in which the British Parliament, profiting by the lessons of the American rebellion, renounced its intention to again tax the colonies. It removed all doubts as to the powers of colonial Legislatures to alter or repeal the general mass of English law, such as the law of primogeniture, inheritance, &c., not made operative, by Statute, throughout the Empire. The Colonial Laws Validity Act was, therefore, an enabling Act, not a restrictive or disabling Act. This proposition may be best illustrated and confirmed by a reference to authorities.

The Imperial Copyright Act 5 and 6 Vic. c. 45 (1842) is by express words declared to extend "to every part of the British dominions." In the celebrated copyright case of Low v Roulledge, L.R. 1 Ch. 42 (1865), it was contended that the Imperial Act was not in force in Canada, because Canada had a representative Legislature of its own, and was not directly governed by legislation from England; that consequently it was not included in the general words of the Act. This contention was not sustained. In delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, Lord Justice Turner said the Imperial Copyright Act was in force in Canada; and consequently rights acquired under an Imperial Act in force throughout the Empire could not be affected by the law of a colony inconsistent therewith. This case was decided in 1865, before the passing of the Colonial Laws Validity Act.

Shortly after the grant of a new constitution and responsible government to Victoria, the Parliament of that colony passed an Act, No. 8, to amend the law of evidence. It purported to repeal the provisions of the Imperial Acts, 54 Geo. III. c. 15, 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 62, and 14 and 15 Vic. c. 99, s. 11, so far as they applied to Victoria. The Secretary of State for the Colonies afterwards drew attention to the fact that it was beyond the competence of a colonial Legislature to repeal an Imperial Act applicable to the colonies. An Act was then passed by the British Parliament repealing the Acts of Geo. III. and Will. IV. so far as Victoria was concerned, and also enabling the Legislatures of other colonies to repeal those Acts if they thought proper. (22 and 23 Vic. c. 12.) The Victorian Parliament repealed its own Act, No. 8, and passed a new one, in which it was recognized and declared that the section of the Act 14 and 15 Vic. c.

99, s. 11, which it had abortively attempted to repeal, was in force in Victoria. (Hearn's "Government of England," 2nd ed., p. 597.)

These two precedents show that even before the passing of the Colonial Laws Validity Act it was recognized in law as well as in practice that a colonial Legislature could not repeal an Imperial Act applicable to the colonies, whether that Act was in force before or came into force after the constitution of such colonial Legislature. That Act limits rather than enlarges the doctrine of repugnancy; it enlarges rather than limits the power of colonial Legislatures (1) by repealing the common law rule that every colonial law repugnant to English law is void, and confining nullity for repugnancy to cases where statutes are expressly intended to apply to the colonies, and (2) by restricting the nullity to the inconsistent provisions only, and not allowing a particular variance to invalidate the whole colonial Act.

Attention may be now drawn to cases which have occurred, and contentions raised, since the passing of the Validity Act. In the case of Smiles v. Belford (1877), 1 Ont. Appeals, 436, the author of the well-known work, "Thrift," published in England, brought a suit in Canada to restrain the reprint of his work in Canada. The work had been copyrighted in England under 5 and 6 Vic. c. 45 (1842), which we have seen is in force throughout the British dominions, but it had not been copyrighted in Canada under the Canadian Copyright Act 35 Vic. c. 88. It was argued for the defendant that the Canadian Act repealed the Imperial Act, notwithstanding the Colonial Laws Validity Act. Proudfoot, V.C., overruled this contention. In the Court of Appeal (Ontario), the judges were unanimous in the opinion that the Federal Parliament had no authority to pass any law opposed to statutes which the Imperial Parliament had made applicable to the whole Empire.

In ex parte Renaud, 14 N. Bruns. 273, 2 Cart. 447 (1873), Chief Justice Ritchie referred to the Colonial Laws Validity Act as a clear statutory recognition of the supreme legislative control of the British Parliament over colonial Legislatures. So the same learned judge decided in the City of Fredricton v. The Queen, 3 S.C.R. (Can.) 529 (1880) that the power of legislation conferred on the Dominion Parliament and the provincial Legislatures, respectively, by the British North America Act, 1867, was subject to the sovereignty of the British Parliament.

In the case of the Merchants' Bank of Halifax v. Gillespie, 10 S.C.R. (Can.) 312 (1885), the validity of the Dominion Winding-up Act, 45 Vic. c. 23, which was apparently in conflict with the Imperial Joint Stock Acts of 1862 and 1867, was considered. Justices Strong and Henry expressed the opinion that the Dominion Act would have been ultra vires if it had purported to deal with a company incorporated under English laws, thus supporting the view that the Dominion Parliament had no authority to enact laws repugnant to an Imperial Act extending to Canada, whether such Act was passed before or after the creation of the Dominion. (Lefroy, Leg. Power, p. 210.)

A dictum somewhat in conflict with these decisions, to the effect that the Parliament of Canada had power to pass laws repealing Imperial Acts in force prior to federation and extending to the colonies, was expressed by Draper, C.J., in Regina v. Taylor, 36 Upper Canada Q. B. 183 (1875). But the opinion of that learned judge was based on the special wording of sec. 91 of the B.N.A. Act, which gives the Dominion Parliament "exclusive legislative authority" to make laws in certain cases. The word "exclusive" he considered as meaning exclusive of the British Parliament, and hence it was a renunciation of its right to legislate in matters exclusively assigned to the Canadian Parliament. This dictum, it will be noticed, turns on the word "exclusive," which does not occur in sec. 51 of the Commonwealth Bill, defining the principal powers of the Federal Parliament. The opinion of Draper, C.J., was seriously doubted by the Ontario Court of Appeal in the later case of Smiles v. Belford, in which Moss, J., said: "I believe his lordship did not deliberately entertain the opinion which these expressions have been taken to intend. He simply threw out the suggestion in that direction, but further consideration led him to adopt the view that the Act did not curtail the paramount authority of the Imperial Parliament." In a British Columbia case, Tai Sing v. Maeguire, 1 Brit. Col. (Irving), p. 107 (1878), Gray, J., said: "It was difficult to see the foundation for the conclusion arrived at by Draper, C.J." In Regina v. College of Physicians, 44 Upper Can. Q. B. 564, 1 Cart., p. 761 (1879), the Court of Queen's Bench of Ontario held that the British Medical Act (1868) applied to Canada, and that the provincial Legislatures could not pass a law repugnant to the Imperial Act, which declared that any person registered thereunder as a duly qualified medical practitioner should be entitled to register and practice in any part of the British dominions.

The Canadian case, Riel v. The Queen, 10 App. Ca. 675 (1885), illustrates the conditions under which a colonial Legislature may alter an Imperial Act operative within the colony. The Amending British North America Act, 34 and 35 Vic. c. 28 (1871), authorized the Parliament of Canada to make laws for the administration, peace, order and good government of any territory not included in a province. In the exercise of this power it passed the Act 43 Vic. No. 25, providing, inter alia, a summary procedure for the trial of criminal offences, including treason, committed in the North-west Territory. This summary trial for treason was alleged to be inconsistent with the Act 7 and 8 Wm. III. c. 3 (1696) and the Hudson's Bay Act, 31 and 32 Vic. c. 105 (1868), under which a person charged in the territory with treason was entitled to trial by a judge and jury of twelve men with a right of challenging thirty-five. Riel was convicted under the new law. He applied for leave to appeal to the Privy Council, on the ground that the Parliament of Canada had no authority to abolish, in the North-west Territory, trial by jury in treason cases, and that the local Act was not necessary for the peace, order, and good government of the territory. The Privy Council held that the Canadian Act was properly passed in the exercise of the power conferred by the Imperial Act of 1871, and that the words of that statute authorized the utmost discretion of enactment for the object aimed at, and the widest departure from the criminal procedure as known in England.

On the 27th March, 1889, during a debate in the Canadian Parliament on the constitutionality of the Quebec Jesuits Bill, Sir John Thompson, Minister of Justice, raised for the first time, in the political arena, the doctrine that the Canadian Legislatures, federal and provincial, had legal authority to repeal or amend Imperial Acts passed prior to the B.N.A. Act, 1867, and relating to subjects within the exclusive jurisdiction of those Legislatures. The only relevant legal authority which he cited in support of the doctrine was that of Riel v. The Queen, supra. A reference to the report of that case shows that the validity of the Canadian Act was affirmed because it was authorized by the special and expressed terms of the Imperial Act of 1871.

Sir John Thompson afterwards renewed the same contention in connection with Canadian Copyright Bills; it was not acquiesced in, but strongly objected to by the Imperial law officers, and by at least two Secretaries of State. (Lefroy, Leg. Power, p. 223.)

The result of this review of authority may now be summed up. The great mass of legal decision in Canada and England, and official opinion in England, is to the effect that a colonial representative legislature cannot, even within the jurisdiction assigned to it, repeal or alter an Imperial Act operative throughout the Empire, whether the Act is in force before or passed after the creation of the colonial Legislature; to enable it to amend the terms of Imperial statutes generally in force it must have special and express authority.

These were the principles of Constitutional Government which were no doubt kept in view by the framers of the Commonwealth Bill. It was not thought necessary to declare that the Constitution should be read in conjunction with the Colonial Laws Validity Act. It was assumed, as a matter of course, that that would be done.

When clause 5 was under consideration in the Sydney Convention an amendment, formulated by the Legislative Council of South Australia, was submitted, adding the words "in addition to the laws of Great Britain," and making the last part of the clause to read—"in addition to the laws of Great Britain the laws of the Commonwealth shall be in force on all British ships." The amendment, it was considered, was vague, confusing, and unnecessary. Mr. R. E. O'Connor suggested that the clause might be made clearer by inserting the words "the laws of the Commonwealth in so far as the same are not repugnant to any Imperial Act relating to shipping or navigation." Mr. Isaacs suggested that even that addition was unnecessary, as the laws of the Commonwealth would be subject to the Imperial laws relating to repugnancy, the Imperial laws being paramount. Mr. O'Connor was of opinion that the Colonial Laws Validity Act would apply only to the legislation of the various States, and that "it would not apply to this Act at all;" but eventually the South Australian amendment was rejected, and Mr. O'Connor did not press his suggestion. (Conv. Deb., Sydney, p. 252.)

When the Bill was sent to England the question was raised, and a doubt expressed by the Law Officers of the Crown as to the application of the Colonial Laws Validity Act to Acts passed by the Federal Parliament. In support of the doubt attention was drawn to Mr. O'Connor's dictum, also to the definition of "colony" and "colonial legislature," as given in sec. 1 of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, and to the definition of "colony" as given in Clause 6 of the Commonwealth Bill. The Imperial authorities had always held that the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada was "a colonial legislature," as defined by the said Act; yet it was now submitted that the definition of "colony" in the Commonwealth Bill might raise a doubt whether "the Commonwealth" was a "colony" within the meaning of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, and consequently whether laws passed by the Federal Parliament would be laws passed by "a Colonial Legislature" as defined by that Act. It was, therefore, proposed to remove doubts by adding a paragraph to Clause 6 declaring that "the laws of the Commonwealth shall be Colonial laws within the meaning of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865." It was pointed out in the first Imperial Memorandum that Mr. O'Connor's dictum showed that there was room for misapprehension, which it was desirable to remove. It was important in the interests of the Commonwealth, as well as of the rest of the Empire, that there should be no doubt as to the validity of Commonwealth laws, or as to the supremacy of Imperial legislation. The Memorandum proceeded to argue that there was room for such misapprehension not only from the language of Clause 6 of the covering clauses, but also from sec. 51, sub-sec. xxxviii., of the Constitution, which conferred on the Commonwealth Parliament "the exercise within the Commonwealth, at the request or with the concurrence of the Parliaments of all the States directly concerned, of any power which can at the establishment of this Constitution be exercised only by the Parliament of the United Kingdom or by the Federal Council of Australasia." Sub-sec. xxix. of the same section of the Constitution, moreover, empowered the Commonwealth Parliament to legislate in regard to "external affairs," and, consequently, under these provisions it might be claimed that the Parliament of the Commonwealth had power to pass legislation inconsistent with Imperial legislation dealing with such subjects as those dealt with by the Foreign Enlistment Act. The responsibility to Foreign Powers for such legislation would rest, not on Australia, but on the Government of the United Kingdom, as representing the whole Empire; and in the absence of any definition or limitation of the privilege claimed by these provisions for the Commonwealth Parliament, Her Majesty's Government would fail in their duty if they left any room for doubt as to the paramount authority of Imperial legislation. (See House of Com. Pap. May, 1900, p. 23.)

The Australian Delegates maintained that the doubt raised by the Imperial Law Officers was unfounded, and that there was no necessity for any amendment. They were of opinion that the meaning of the Bill was clear, without any such legislative explanation. The doubt expressed by the law advisers of the Crown arose, as they explained, from the presence in Clause 6 of the words "Colony shall mean any Colony or Province." It was submitted that this definition was framed simply for the purpose of clearly including South Australia in the Bill, and could in no wise exclude the definition of "Colony" in the Colonial Laws Validity Act from applying to the Commonwealth in relation to its laws.

"The definition in the Commonwealth Bill arises from the fact that South Australia has from time to time been variously designated in legislation as a Colony and as a Province. For instance, in the Imperial Statutes 4 and 5 Wm. IV. c. 95 and 1 and 2 Vic. c. 60, the designation is 'Province;' in 5 and 6 Vic. c. 61 'Colony' and 'Province' are both used for the same purpose. In 4 and 5 Vic. c. 13, in 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, and in all Imperial Acts relating to South Australia since the passage by the local Legislature of the Constitution Act (18 and 19 Vic. No. 2) the term 'Colony' is used. But in the Act last mentioned, and in all other local legislation since its passage, South Australia has uniformly been referred to as a 'Province.' Apart from legislation, the Letters-patent, Commissions and Instructions, issued in connection with the offices of Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, and Administrator of the Government for South Australia, have all employed the word 'Colony' alone to designate that possession, while the Regulations and other official documents under or in consequence of local Acts have as regularly referred to South Australia as a 'Province.' It was merely for the purpose of avoiding the constant repetition of the distinction between the words 'Colony,' as applied to the other states, and 'Province,' as applied to South Australia, that the definition in question was placed in the Bill. Inasmuch as Imperial legislation has so generally referred to South Australia as a Colony, it may be that excessive caution has been used by the draughtsmen in this instance. If after this explanation any doubt remains, the Delegates are of opinion that the real point of objection is in the definition itself as introducing that doubt, and if the definition is unnecessary it would not seem to be convenient to counteract any doubt by amendment elsewhere in the Bill. The Commonwealth appears to the Delegates to be clearly a 'Colony,' and the Federal Parliament to be a 'Legislature' within the meaning of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, and they cannot think that the larger meaning given to the word 'Colony' in Clause VI. to save words, can be held to take away the protection of the Act of 1865 from any law passed by the Federal Parliament. But the Interpretation Act of 1889 (52 and 53 Vic. c. 63) might itself be cited in support of the same contention. That Act prescribes that 'unless the contrary intention appears, the expression "Colony" in any Act passed since the 1st January, 1890, is to mean any part of Her Majesty's Dominions, exclusive of the British Islands and of British India.' The Interpretation Act goes on to require that where parts of such Dominions are under both a central and a local legislature, all parts under the Central Legislature shall, for the purposes of the definition, be deemed to be one Colony. It might be argued that this definition secures the application of the Validity Act to Colonial Statutes passed since the end of 1889, and if this be so it would be strange if the occurrence in Clause 6 of the few words quoted were held to deprive the laws of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia of the same protection. It may further be observed that the Constitution of Canada contains no words similar to those proposed to be here inserted, even though that Constitution was enacted prior to 1889; yet it will not be denied that the Colonial Laws Validity Act applies to Dominion Statutes. What then is there which excludes its application to the Statutes of the Commonwealth?" (See House Coms Pap. May, 1900, pp. 14, 15.)

On the question whether, if an amendment were made, it should be placed in the Covering Clauses or in the Schedule, the Delegates agreed in the opinion that a declaratory enactment of this kind would be looked for rather in the Covering Clauses than in the Schedule. But a separate enactment appeared to be a better vehicle for such a declaration than the measure itself.

The amendment declaring that "the laws of the Commonwealth shall be Colonial laws within the meaning of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865," appeared in Clause 6 of the Bill introduced into the House of Commons. As a result of subsequent negotiations, however, the Imperial Government decided to omit these words, and also to omit the definition of "colony," and in Committee this was done. It may be assumed, therefore, that the Crown Law Officers were satisfied that the Colonial Laws Validity Act is applicable to the Constitution as it stands.

§ 34. "Shall be Binding on the Courts, Judges and People."

The importance of these words, as indicating one of the fundamental principles of the Constitution, should be specially noted. They make Clause 5 of the Commonwealth Constitution Act substantially similar in scope and intention to article VI. sec. 2 of the Constitution of the United States, supra. Under this clause, the Act, the Constitution, and laws of the Commonwealth made in pursuance of its powers, will be the supreme law of the land, binding on the Courts, Judges, and people of every State, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the laws of any State. The latter words operate as a rescission of all State laws incompatible with the Act, with the Constitution, and with such laws as may be passed by the Parliament of the Commonwealth in the exercise of its Constitutional rights. Therefore, by this clause, coupled with sections 106 to 109, all the laws of a State, constitutional as well as ordinary, will be in effect repealed so far as they are repugnant to the supreme law. All the laws of any State, so far as not inconsistent with the supreme law, will remain in force until altered by the proper authority.

The pre-eminent significance of this direct action of the federal laws on the Courts, Judges, and people, is that it forms a distinctly national feature of the Constitution and differentiates it from the weakness and imperfection of a confederate system of government. The constitutional value of these words will be better appreciated by comparing this Constitution with the Articles of Confederation of the American States (1781), from which they are absent.

Those articles established a league of States organized in a Congress in which each State had an equal voice. The Congress was endowed with certain legislative powers, but it lacked any means of enforcing obedience to its mandates. Not only was there no federal executive or judiciary worthy of the name, but the laws of the Congress were directed to the States as political entities and not to private individuals. Congress could not pass a single law binding on the Courts, Judges, or people of the States. It could only recommend the States to pass local Acts giving effect to its laws or requisitions. (Fiske, Critical Period of American History, p. 99.) One of the greatest triumphs of the American Constitution (1787) was that it gave expression to the original and noble conception of a dual system of government operating at one and the same time upon the same individuals, harmonious with each other, but each supreme in its own sphere (id. 239). This dual system gave rise to two groups or classes of laws—State laws and Federal laws—both equally binding on individuals and enforceable by appropriate procedure. Thereby the federal principle of the Union of States, which was the basis of the Articles of Confederation, was preserved and conjoined with the national principle that the laws of the Union should be binding on the people of the Union, interpreted by the judges of the Union, and enforced by the Executive of the Union.

"In all communities there must be one supreme power and one only. A confederacy is a mere compact, resting on the good faith of the parties; a national, supreme government must have a complete and compulsive operation." (Gouverneur Morris, in the Federal Convention, 30th May, 1787. Bancroft's History of the United States, vol. 1, p. 15.)

"In the nature of things punishment cannot be executed on the States collectively; therefore such a government is necessary as can operate directly on individuals." (George Mason, id., p. 15.)

"The difference between a federal and a national government, as it relates to the operation of the government, is supposed to consist in this, that in the former the powers operate on the political bodies composing the confederacy, in their political capacities; in the latter, on the individual citizens composing the nation, in their individual capacities." (Madison, in The Federalist, xxxix., p. 237, cited Foster on the Constitution, vol. I., p. 106.)

As of the laws of Congress and the Constitution of the United States, so of the laws of the Federal Parliament and the Constitution of the Commonwealth, it may be said that their authority extends over the whole territory of the Union, acting upon the States and the people of the States. Whilst the Federal Government is limited in the number of its powers, within the scope of those powers it is supreme. No State Government can exclude it from the exercise of any authority conferred upon it by the Constitution, obstruct its authorized officers against its will, or withhold from it for a moment the cognizance of any subject which the Constitution has committed to it. (Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U.S. 257.)

§ 35. "And of Every Part of the Commonwealth."

TERRITORIAL LIMITS.—The Constitution and laws of the Commonwealth are in force within the territorial limits of the Commonwealth. By the law of nations the territorial limits of a country are allowed to extend into every part of the open sea within one marine league from the coast, measured from low water mark. This coastal margin is called "territorial waters," or the "three-mile limit." (See Note, Territorial Waters, infra.) By a later part of this clause the Constitution and the laws of the Commonwealth are conceded an extra-territorial force on British ships. (See Note, § 33 "British Ships.")

But there may be "parts of the Commonwealth" which are not States. The territorial limits of the Commonwealth will not be necessarily co-terminous with the boundaries of the States and their territorial waters added; they will also embrace any other regions, with their adjacent territorial waters, which for the time being may not be included within the boundaries of a State, but which may be acquired by the Commonwealth in any of the ways authorized by the Constitution. Thus the seat of government, when determined by the Parliament and made federal territory, will no longer be part of the State of New South Wales, but will be a part of the Commonwealth. Again, the Queen might place British New Guinea under the control of the Commonwealth; she might detach a part of the vast area of Western Australia from that State and hand it over to the Commonwealth; she might do the same with the Northern Territory of South Australia; Tasmania might agree to surrender King's Island to the Commonwealth. Upon acceptance by the Commonwealth in each of these cases, the territory so surrendered to or placed under the authority of the Commonwealth would even before its erection into a State, or States, become a part of the Commonwealth, and the Constitution and laws of the Commonwealth would be as binding on the people there as on those of a State.

EXTRA-TERRITORIAL OPERATION OF LAWS.—A Colony, Dominion, or Federation, under the British Crown, has no jurisdiction to make laws operative beyond its territorial limits, unless such power is specially granted by Imperial Statute. "In this respect independent States are in the same position, at least with regard to the subjects of other independent States and their property, as those colonies of Great Britain which possess plenary powers of legislation and self-government. Both are restricted as to acts of legislation by territorial limits, those limits being fixed in the one case by an Imperial Statute, and in the other case by the established principles of international law. The first of the three celebrated axioms of Huberus lays down the rule for independent States in distinct terms: 'Leges cujusque imperii vim habent intra terminos ejusdem reipublice omnesque ei subjectos obligant, nec ultra.'" (Per Higinbotham, J., in Regina v. Call, ex p. Murphy [1881], 7 V.L.R. [L.], p. 121.)

There are only two provisions in the Constitution Act explicitly relating to the extra-territorial operation of laws. The first is in Clause 5, which makes the laws of the Commonwealth in force on British ships voyaging solely between ports of the Commonwealth (see Note, § 38, "British ships"); the second is in sec. 51 x., which empowers the Federal Parliament to legislate as to "fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits." The legislative powers given by sec. 51—xxix., as to "external affairs," and by sec. 51—xxxviii., as to powers previously exercisable by the Imperial Parliament or by the Federal Council, do not necessarily imply extra-territorial operation, and it is therefore submitted that they do not sanction any such operation.

"No State can by its laws directly affect, bind, or regulate property beyond its own territory, or control persons who do not reside within it, whether they be native-born subjects or not; a different system, which would recognize in each State the power of regulating persons or things beyond its territory, would exclude the equality of rights among different States, and the exclusive sovereignty which belongs to each of them." (Felix, Droit International Privé, s. 10.)

"The Legislature of a colony may authorize the exclusion from its territory of a person charged with an offence in another colony, or that he be punished unless he leaves the territory, or his detention; but it cannot authorize the sending him in custody out of its territory into another colony." (Ray v. McMackin, 1 V.L.R. [L.], p. 272.)

"In Phillips v. Eyre, L.R. 6 Q.B., p. 1., it was distinctly enunciated that the superior Courts in England will regard Acts of colonial Legislatures in the same way as they regard Acts of foreign countries legislating with respect to their inhabitants within the limits of their authority. Any attempt to exercise jurisdiction beyond the boundaries of their own territory, domestic or distant, by either one or the other, is treated as being beyond the powers of their Legislatures." (Per Barry, J., in Ray v. McMackin, 1 V.L.R. [L.], p. 280.)

"On Dec. 17, 1869, the Secretary of State for the Colonies notified the Governor-General of Canada, in regard to certain Acts passed by the Dominion Parliament in the previous session of Parliament, that Her Majesty would not be advised to exercise her power of disallowance with respect thereto; but that he observed that the third section of 'an Act respecting perjury' assumed to affix a criminal character to acts committed beyond the limits of the Dominion. 'As such a provision is beyond the legislative power of the Canadian Parliament,' the Colonial Secretary requested the Governor-General to bring this point to the notice of his Ministers, with a view to the amendment of the Act in this particular. Accordingly, in the ensuing session of the Dominion Parliament, an Act was passed to correct this error." (Todd, Parl. Gov. in the Col., p. 145.)

The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1883, sec. 54, of New South Wales, enacts that "whosoever being married marries another person during the life of the former husband or wife, wheresoever such second marriage takes place, shall be liable to penal servitude for seven years." It was held by the Privy Council that those words must be intended to apply to persons actually within the jurisdiction of the Legislature, and consequently that the Courts of the colony had no jurisdiction to try the appellant for the offence of bigamy alleged to have been committed in the United States of America. (Macleod v. Att.-Gen. for New South Wales [1891], A.C. 455; Digest of English Case Law, vol. 3, p. 486.)

In the case of Re Victoria Steam Navigation Board, ex parte Allan, decided by the Full Court of Victoria, consisting of Stawell, C.J., and Stephen and Higinbotham, J.J., in 1881, the Court (Higinbotham, J., dissenting) were of the opinion that the Passengers, Harbours, and Navigation Statute, 1865, did not give the Steam Navigation Board any jurisdiction to enquire into charges of incompetency of a master, occurring at Cape Jaffa outside Victorian waters, and that the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 242, sub-sec. 5, and Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 23, did not confer on it any extra-territorial jurisdiction. The summons to prohibit the enforcement of the suspension of a master's certificate was allowed, with costs. (Ex parte Allan, 7 V.L.R. 248, 3 A.L.T., p. 1.) But now see Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 478.

The British Parliament, being a sovereign legislature, may pass laws binding on its subjects all over the world; but, according to the principles of international law, it ought not to legislate for foreigners out of its dominions and beyond the jurisdiction of the Crown. (Lopez v. Burslem, 4 Moo. P.C., 390; the Zollverein, 1 Swab. Adm., 96.) The British Parliament has not, according to the principles of public law, any authority to legislate for foreign vessels on the high seas or for foreigners beyond the frontiers of the Empire. (Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D 220.) Should the British Parliament in violation of those principles attempt to render foreigners subject to its laws with reference to offences committed beyond its territorial limits, it would be incumbent on the Courts of the Empire to enforce those enactments, leaving it to the Imperial Government to settle the question of international law with the governments of the nations concerned. But the laws of the Commonwealth being those of a subordinate and non-sovereign legislature would be examinable by the Courts, and if it appeared that they purported to legislate for matters outside the limits of the Commonwealth they would be pronounced ultra vires and null and void.

TERRITORIAL WATERS.—Some further explanation of the rule of the “three mile limit” by Mr. Hall may be here added :—

“Of the marginal seas, and enclosed waters, which were regarded at the beginning of the present century as being susceptible of appropriation, the case of the first is the simplest. In claiming its marginal seas as property a state is able to satisfy the condition of valid appropriation, because a narrow belt of water along a coast can be effectively commanded from the coast itself either by guns or by means of a coast-guard. In fact also such a belt is always appropriated, because states reserve to their own subjects the enjoyment of its fisheries, or, in other words, take from it the natural products which it is capable of yielding. It may be added that, unless the right to exercise control were admitted, no sufficient security would exist for the lives and property of the subjects of the state upon land; they would be exposed without recognised means of redress to the intended or accidental effects of violence directed against themselves or other persons of whose nationality, in the absence of a right to pursue and capture, it would often be impossible to get proof, and whose state consequently could not be made responsible for their deeds. Accordingly, on the assumption that any part of the sea is susceptible of appropriation, no serious question can arise as to the existence of property in marginal waters. Their precise extent however is not so certain. Generally their limit is fixed at a marine league from the shore; but this distance was defined by the supposed range of a gun of position, and the effect of the recent increase in the power of artillery has not yet been taken into consideration, either as supplying a new measure of the space over which control may be efficiently exercised, or as enlarging that within which acts of violence may be dangerous to persons and property on shore. It may be doubted, in view of the very diverse opinions which have been held until lately as to the extent to which marginal seas may be appropriated, of the lateness of the time at which much more extensive claims have been fully abandoned, and of the absence of cases in which the breadth of territorial water has come into international question, whether the three mile limit has ever been unequivocally settled; but, in any case, as it has been determined, if determined at all, upon an assumption which has ceased to hold good, it would be pedantry to adhere to the rule in its present form; and perhaps it may be said without impropriety that a state has the right to extend its territorial waters from time to time at its will with the increased range of guns; though it would undoubtedly be more satisfactory that an arrangement upon the subject should be come to by common agreement.” (Hall’s International Law, § 41.)

“Bluntschli thinks that, considering the range of modern artillery, the three-mile zone is too narrow. Phillimore and Fiore express the same opinion, but think that an alteration can only be made by treaty. It appears to have been suggested by the American government to that of England in 1864 that territorial waters should be considered to extend to a distance of five miles from shore.” (Id.)

§ 36. “The Laws of Any State.”

The laws of the States will comprise the following classes :—

- (i.) Imperial Acts relating to the Constitution and government of the colonies when they become States :
- (ii.) Imperial Acts relating to matters of ordinary legislation expressly applicable to the colonies when they become States :
- (iii.) The Common law so far as applicable and not modified by colonial or State legislation :
- (iv.) Laws of the realm of England made applicable to some colonies by the general terms of the Act of 9 George IV. c. 83, and not since repealed or amended by colonial legislation :
- (v.) Acts relating to constitutional matters as well as to matters of ordinary legislation passed by the colonial or State legislatures in the exercise of Statutory authority conferred by Imperial law.

All these laws will remain in full force and effect until they become inconsistent with—(1) The Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, or (2) some Act amending the Constitution, or (3) laws to be made thereunder by the Parliament of the Commonwealth. By the Constitution of the colonies their legislatures have power to make laws in and for those colonies respectively in all cases whatsoever. When these colonies become States their large powers will by degrees be considerably cut down, although they will be compensated for the loss of direct authority by their representation in the Federal Parliament. The jurisdiction of that Parliament will overlap and in time will considerably contract the realm of State jurisdiction. As the federal legislation within the area of enumerated powers acquires activity and increases in volume, the State laws within that area will be gradually displaced by federal laws, but until they are so displaced through repugnancy they will retain their original vitality and be binding on the people of their respective States.

§ 37. "The Laws of the Commonwealth."

This is a more suitable and comprehensive expression than the one which appears at the beginning of this clause, viz., "this Act and all laws made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth." The laws of the Commonwealth will consist of the following classes:—

- (I.) The Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act.
- (II.) Alterations of the Constitution pursuant to the provisions of Chapter VIII.
- (III.) Laws made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth under the Constitution.

It will be noticed that the second group of laws as above classified will not be laws made by the Parliament; they may be laws proposed either by one or both of the Federal Chambers, subject to certain conditions, and afterwards approved by the qualified electors of the Commonwealth and assented to by the Governor-General or by the Queen.

§ 38. "British Ships."

The rights, duties, and liabilities of British ships whilst at home or abroad have been settled by a long series of legal decisions interpreting and enforcing the common law, as well as by the codified provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, some parts of which are in force throughout the British empire. One of the fundamental principles of British shipping law is that British merchant ships sailing upon the high seas are considered parts of the territory of the British empire and come within the rule of extra-territoriality. It is a principle of the Common Law and of the law of nations that a ship on the high seas is a part of the territory of the State to which she belongs, and therefore an English ship is deemed to be a part of England. (Per Blackburn, J., Marshall v. Murgatroyd, L.R. 6 Q.B. 31.)

Klüber says "that upon the ocean every ship is considered extra-territorial in regard to all foreign nations. A merchant vessel ought to be considered as a floating colony of its State." (Droit des Gens, part 2, Tit. 1, c. 2, § 299.)

Hall and other writers on international law describe Klüber's theory as a fiction, but they all agree that a ship at sea should be subject to the jurisdiction of the State under whose flag she sails; that such a doctrine is most reasonable and advantageous; and that if ships were amenable to no tribunal the sea would become a place where every crime might be committed with impunity. (Twiss' Law of Nations in Time of War, p. 172.) A merchant vessel in non-territorial waters is therefore subject to the sovereignty of that country only to which she belongs, and all acts done on board her whilst on such waters are cognizable only by the courts of her own State unless they be acts of piracy. This rule extends to cases in which, after a crime has been committed by a native of a country other than that to which the ship belongs, she enters a port of that State with the criminal on board. (Hall's International Law, p. 186.) In foreign territorial waters, however, a merchant vessel is under the territorial jurisdiction, and its officers and crew are subject to the local laws prevailing in such waters.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION ON THE HIGH SEAS.—All persons on board a ship are within the jurisdiction of the nation whose flag the ship flies, in the same manner as if they were within the territory of that nation. The criminal jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England extends over British ships, not only on the high seas, but also on rivers below the bridges where the tide ebbs and flows and where great ships go, though at a spot where the municipal authorities of a foreign country might exercise concurrent jurisdiction if invoked. (Per Blackburn, J., in Reg. v. Anderson [1886] L.R. 1 C.C. 161-4.) There will be jurisdiction at common law if a British ship be on the high seas, infra primos pontes, or in a tidal river where great ships come and go. (Reg. v. Armstrong [1875] 13 Cox, C.C. 185.) The offence need not be consummated or wholly completed on board such ship to give jurisdiction (id.) A larceny of bonds was committed by some person unknown on board a British ocean-going merchant ship lying in an open river, moored to the quay at Rotterdam, in Holland, at a distance of 18 miles from the sea, but within the ebb and flow of the tide. A person who afterwards was found in England in possession of the stolen property was there convicted of receiving the bonds. (Reg. v. Carr [1882] 10 Q.B.D. 76.) The surviving crew of an English yacht, cast away in a storm on the high seas, who were obliged to take to an open boat, and who were, they alleged, constrained by hunger to kill and eat a boy, one of their number, were tried in England and found guilty of murder. (Reg. v. Dudley [1884] 14 Q.B.D. 273.) A hulk retaining the general appointments of a ship registered as a British ship, though only used as a floating warehouse, is a British ship. (Reg. v. Armstrong, 13 Cox, C.C. 185.)

JURISDICTION OF COLONIAL COURTS.—The jurisdiction to try persons for offences committed on the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, was in 1849 conferred on colonial courts by the Act 12 and 13 Vic. c. 96, sec. 1. This provides that colonial courts should have the same jurisdiction for trying such offences, and should be empowered to take all such proceedings for bringing persons charged therewith to trial, and for and auxiliary to and consequent upon the trial, as by the law of the colony might have been taken if the offence had been committed upon any waters within the limits of the colony.

LATER IMPERIAL LEGISLATION.—By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vic. c. 124, s. 11.) it was enacted that if any British subject commits any offence on board any British ship, or on board any foreign ship to which he does not belong, any court of justice in her Majesty's dominions which would have cognizance of such offence, if committed on board a British ship, within the limits of the ordinary jurisdiction of such court, shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the case, as if the offence had been so committed.

The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 686, re-enacts in substance the provisions of previous legislation giving jurisdiction, in the case of any offence committed by a British subject on board any British ship on the high seas, or in any foreign port or harbour, or by a person not a British subject on board any British ship on the high seas, to any court in her Majesty's dominions within the jurisdiction of which that person is found. Sec. 687 further provides that all offences against property or person committed at any place, either ashore or afloat, out of Her Majesty's dominions by any master, seaman or apprentice who at the time of the offence is, or within three months previously has been employed in any British ship, shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature and liable to the same punishment as if committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England.

FOREIGNERS ON BRITISH SHIPS.—A foreigner who, whilst on board a British ship upon the high seas, commits an offence against British law, is amenable to such law, and it makes no difference whether he has gone on board voluntarily or has been taken and detained there against his will. (Reg. v. Lopez; Reg. v. Sattler, 27 L.J. M.C. 48.)

A foreigner was convicted of manslaughter on board a British ship in the river Garonne, in France, 35 miles from the sea, but within the ebb and flow of the tide. (Reg. v. Anderson, L.R. 1 C.C. 161.) A foreigner on board a British ship is entitled to the same protection as if he were on English soil. (Reg. v. Leslie, 8 Cox, C.C., 269; 29 L.J. M.C. 97.)

JURISDICTION OVER FOREIGN SHIPS.—A German vessel, under the command and immediate direction of a German subject, collided with a British steamer navigating the English Channel at a point within two miles and a half from Dover Beach, with the result that the British ship sank and a British subject on board was drowned. The captain of the German ship was tried and found guilty of manslaughter at the Central Criminal Court. It was held by the majority of the Court of Criminal Appeal, that the Central Criminal Court had no jurisdiction to try the case. (Reg. v. Keyn, The Franconia, 2 Ex. D. 63; 46 L.J., M.C. 17.) But now by the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vic. c. 73 s. 2) an offence committed by any person, whether a British subject or not, on the open sea, within the territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions, is an offence within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, although it may have been committed on board or by means of a foreign ship, and the person who committed such offence may be arrested, tried, and punished accordingly. By s. 7 of this Act "Territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions" means any part of the open sea within one marine league of the coast measured from low water mark.

OWNERSHIP OF BRITISH SHIPS.—Under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, no person can own a British ship except a natural born or naturalized subject of the Queen, or a denizen by letters of Denization, or a corporate body established under and subject to the law of some part of the British dominions. Every such ship must be registered, and every transfer must be by registered bill of sale. If a ship belonging to British subjects be not registered she is not recognized as a British ship, and is then not entitled to the benefit or protection enjoyed by British ships, or to sail under the British flag, or to assume the British national character.

BRITISH MERCHANT SHIPS AND COLONIAL LAWS.—It will now be convenient to consider some of the obligations and liabilities of British merchant ships in the Territorial waters, under the law as it existed before, and under the law as it will be after the establishment of the Commonwealth. The jurisdiction of colonial legislatures over British ships whilst within the colonial ports, harbours, rivers and adjacent territorial waters, extends to such subjects as the following:—The governance and preservation of ports, the regulation of shipping and navigation, the mooring of vessels, the management of wharves and piers, the organization of marine boards and of courts of marine inquiry, pilots and pilotage, lights and signals, prevention of accidents on ships, inspection of ships, equipment and survey of ships, carriage of dangerous goods, storage of cargoes, misconduct of passengers, misconduct of crew, health and safety of passengers, anding of passengers, investigations respecting casualties, and inquiries into complaints of incompetency and misconduct on the part of mariners.

COLONIAL COURTS TO ENFORCE IMPERIAL SHIPPING LAWS.—By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vic. c. 104) and by the amending Merchant Shipping Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vic. c. 63) legislation was adopted in order to increase the efficiency of, and enlarge the supervision over, the mercantile marine of England. Higher qualifications for mates and masters were exacted, and means were adopted by which incompetency and misconduct might be promptly brought before the Board of Trade, by whom certificates to mates and masters were issued. It was further provided that the legislature of any British possession should be able to make laws for the appointment of a court or tribunal to inquire into charges of incompetency or misconduct on the part of masters and mates of ships, and to cancel or suspend the certificates of offenders subject to the review of the Board of Trade. In 1865 the Victorian Parliament passed the Passengers (Harbour and Navigation) Act, sec. 77 of which enacted that the Steam Navigation Board should be constituted a court or tribunal authorized to exercise such powers as are mentioned in or conferred by the 242nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and the 23rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862. Similar Boards were established by other colonial legislatures.

The extra-territorial jurisdiction of Australian courts of inquiry created by local legislation in the exercise of statutory power conferred by the above Imperial Acts was considered in the case of Re Victoria Steam Navigation Board, ex parte Allan, in which the Supreme Court held that the Victorian Board had no jurisdiction to deal with a master holding a certificate issued by the Board of Trade, on a charge of negligence resulting in a collision off Cape Jaffa, South Australia; that it could only inquire into misconduct which had taken place within the jurisdiction of the Board, viz., within the territorial waters of the colony in which the Board was constituted (3 A.L.T. 1, 7 V.L.R. [L] 248, June, 1881). In consequence of this decision there was a demand for further Imperial legislation enlarging the authority of marine boards, and in August, 1882, the Act (45 and 46 Vic. c. 76) was passed, which is now re-enacted in sec. 478 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vic. c. 60). This section expressly empowers the legislature of any British possession to authorize any court or tribunal to make inquiries as to shipwrecks or other casualties affecting ships, or as to charges of incompetency or misconduct on the part of masters, mates or engineers of ships, in the following cases:—

- (a) Where a shipwreck or casualty occurs to a British ship on or near the coasts of the British possession or to a British ship in the course of a voyage to a port within the British possession :
- (b) Where a shipwreck or casualty occurs in any part of the world to a British ship registered in the British possession :
- (c) Where some of the crew of a British ship which have been wrecked or to which a casualty has occurred, and who are competent witnesses to the facts, are found in the British possession :
- (d) Where the incompetency or misconduct has occurred on board a British ship on or near the coasts of the British possession, or on board a British ship in the course of a voyage to a port within the British possession :
- (e) Where the incompetency or misconduct has occurred on board a British ship registered in the British possession :
- (f) When the master, mate, or engineer of a British ship who is charged with incompetency or misconduct on board that British ship is found in the British possession.

A British ship during its voyage on the high seas from any British port to Australia was, before the establishment of the Commonwealth, and still is, subject solely to British Civil and Criminal Law. Upon its entry into the territorial waters, that is within the three mile limit of any colony, say Western Australia, it still remained subject to British Merchant Shipping Acts, but in addition thereto it became subject to the local laws of Western Australia, Civil and Criminal, including local navigation and shipping regulations, so far as those laws and regulations were not contrary to British Merchant Shipping Acts. On leaving the ports of Western Australia and passing beyond the three mile limit, the British ship ceased to be subject to West Australian laws, and became once more subject only to Imperial laws. Upon the same ship entering the territorial waters of South Australia it, in like manner, came under the local laws of South Australia, Civil and Criminal, including local navigation and shipping regulations, so far as those laws and regulations were not repugnant to the Merchant Shipping Acts. On clearing the ports of Adelaide and resuming its voyage on the high seas, the British ship again came and continued solely under British laws until it reached the Victorian waters, where it once more came under local laws as in the cases of the other colonies mentioned; and so on from one Australian port to another.

Under the Constitution of the Commonwealth British ships will still be under Imperial shipping laws, and local shipping laws not contrary to Imperial laws, but, instead of encountering five or six different sets of local laws relating to navigation and shipping in five or six different Australian ports, they will—when the Federal Parliament has legislated on the subject—find one uniform federal law relating to navigation and shipping operating in every port within the limits of the Commonwealth. In journeying along the high seas between federal ports, and outside the three mile limit, British ships whose first port of clearance is outside the Commonwealth will not be subject to Commonwealth law, but will, as before, remain solely under British law; and British ships whose port of destination is outside the Commonwealth will also not be subject to Commonwealth law.

The Parliament of the Commonwealth has, under sections 51 and 98 of the Constitution, power to make laws relating to navigation and shipping. That power is restricted to making laws applicable to the Commonwealth and operative within the three-mile limit all round the ocean boundary of the Commonwealth. In order to make a Commonwealth law applicable to and operative on ships going from one part of the Commonwealth to another, and in so doing passing over the high seas outside the three mile limit, it was necessary to extend the power given by section 98. This is done by clause 5 of the Act; without which the laws of the Commonwealth would only be operative within the three mile limit. By that clause the laws of the Commonwealth are in force on British ships on the high seas outside the three mile limits if they are on a voyage which both begins and ends within the Commonwealth. (Mr. R. E. O'Connor's speech in the Legislative Council of N.S.W., Parliamentary Debates, 1897, p. 3017. Mr. E. Barton's speech in the Legislative Council, N.S.W., idem., p. 3081.)

BRITISH SHIPS WITHIN THE COMMONWEALTH.—Clause 5 provides that the laws of the Commonwealth shall be in force on all British merchant ships whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are within the Commonwealth. There are two classes of British ships which come within the meaning of this clause: (1) Intercolonial vessels exclusively engaged in the Australian trade; (2) ocean going vessels arriving on the Australian coast and temporarily staying and engaging in trade between the ports of the Commonwealth; in so doing beginning and completing new voyages. For the purposes of this clause, ships which come within the conditions specified will be considered as within the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth from the beginning to the end of their respective voyages, even though during the course of their voyages they travel across the high seas hundreds or even thousands of miles beyond the limits of the Commonwealth. The first port of clearance of a ship bound by the laws of the Commonwealth must be within the Commonwealth, and its port of destination must be within the Commonwealth. The combination of these two conditions is required; they mark the beginning and end of a continuous voyage. For example, a steamer starts from her headquarters—say Melbourne; thence she proceeds to Tasmania, thence to New Zealand, thence to Samoa, thence to Fiji, thence to New Caledonia, thence to Brisbane, thence to Sydney, thence to Melbourne. During the whole of this voyage the laws of the Commonwealth would be in force in such a vessel. In the course of her journey she would traverse regions far beyond the limits of the Commonwealth; yet by the application and extension of the principle of extra-territoriality—described by some jurists as a fiction, though a very useful one—the ship is deemed to be a part of the Commonwealth floating on the high seas.

If it be asked what kinds of Commonwealth laws could reasonably be brought into operation on board a Commonwealth ship sailing a thousand miles away from Australia, attention may be drawn to those laws relating to shipping and navigation which have hitherto been within the competency of the various Australian legislatures, but which under the Commonwealth will be vested in the Federal Parliament. Attention may be also drawn to some of the other powers conferred on the Federal Parliament, such as those relating to trade and commerce, weights and measures, fisheries beyond territorial limits, the service and execution of civil and criminal process, and the enforcement of the judgments of the Courts of the States: also immigration and emigration, influx of criminals, external affairs, the relations of the Commonwealth with the isles of the Pacific, and the naval and military defences of the Commonwealth. It might be extremely advisable, and in fact absolutely necessary, that the laws of the Commonwealth, in reference to matters such as these, should follow a Commonwealth ship and operate upon it wherever it went.

PROPOSED IMPERIAL AMENDMENT.—When the Commonwealth Bill was under the consideration of the Imperial Government in March, 1900, the Law Officers of the Crown proposed the omission of the words of Clause 5, "in force on all British ships, the Queen's ships of war excepted, whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the Commonwealth." (See Historical Introduction, p. 229, supra.) It was suggested that there was no constitutional, or practical, necessity for the appearance of those words in the Bill. It seemed to be thought that all that was desired was a grant of power to the Commonwealth to control the coasting trade. This power, it was pointed out, the Federal Parliament would have under section 736 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which is not confined in its operation to the coasting trade while in territorial waters. Moreover, the words, "first port of clearance" and "port of destination" in the clause in question were not free from ambiguity, and embarrassing questions might be raised as to the law applicable to a ship clearing from one Australian port for another after coming to Australia from a port in some other part of Her Majesty's dominions.

In reply to this objection the Australian Delegates drew attention to section 20 of the Federal Council Act, 1885 (see supra). It was observed that the provision of Clause 5 of the Draft Bill was much more restricted than that made by the Act of 1885. Under the present measure the provision was made to apply to cases in which a British ship begins and concludes her voyage within the limits of the Commonwealth. But section 20 of the Federal Council Act applied to every British ship which commenced her voyage in any one of the colonies concerned, and also to every British ship which concluded her voyage in any one of them. In the former case the Federal Council Law would apply to a British ship on the whole of her voyage from Australia to a port beyond the Commonwealth; in the latter case to a British ship on the whole of her voyage from any point beyond the Commonwealth to Australia. In the present measure, so wide an application was not for a moment desired to be given to any law of the Commonwealth; yet it was now sought to further restrict, in the hands of a much more competent legislature, a power which 15 years ago the Imperial Parliament did not consider too wide for a much inferior body: a body neither elective nor bi-cameral, and lacking both a responsible executive and a Treasury. Dealing with the suggestion that the matter was sufficiently provided for by section 736 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the Delegates argued that if that view were correct then the phrase objected to was at worst a redundancy and therefore harmless. Section 736 gave power to the Legislature of any English possession to make laws regulating its coasting trade under certain conditions. It was true that the term "British Possession," whether as defined in the Act of 1869 or in the Interpretation Act of 1889, which preceded the present Merchant Shipping Act, would include such a Possession as the Commonwealth of Australia, which under the Interpretation Act would be deemed to be one British Possession including all parts under the Central Legislature. The expression "coasting trade" was not defined in any of the Acts cited; it may be taken to include the trade of vessels plying merely between the ports of a Possession within territorial limits. But the provision in the Commonwealth Bill, to which exception had been taken, would apply to such ships, on a voyage solely between two ports of the Commonwealth, even outside the three-mile territorial limit; the beneficial effect therefore would be, that a vessel on such a voyage would not be exposed to the anomaly of being subject to one set of laws at $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles from the coast, and to another set of laws at $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles from the coast. That this should be prevented was surely not too much to ask. Moreover, the provision in the Bill removed a further anomaly by protecting a vessel which passed from the territorial waters of one colony into those of another from being subjected to a change of laws in that very operation, and by applying to her the uniform laws of the Commonwealth during the whole of her passage between Commonwealth ports. While, then, the power was less than that conceded to the Federal Council, and never abused, it was larger than that conceded by the Merchant Shipping Act, but larger only for the most beneficial purposes. The reasonableness of the right claimed appeared the more clearly when it was considered that one of the most useful purposes of the Constitution was the facilitation of trade between the several colonies to an extent not hitherto possible, with a clear tendency towards obliterating in respect of commerce those arbitrary lines between colony and colony, which in the past have been productive of so much friction and hindrance. (House of Com. Pap., May 1900, p. 15.)

The Colonial Secretary, in answer to this contention, admitted that the words of section 20 of the Federal Council Act were very wide, perhaps unduly so, and if the powers thereby conferred had been freely exercised he thought grave difficulties would certainly have arisen. The analogy of the Federal Council Act was, however, in his opinion incomplete, inasmuch as it was contemplated that all British possessions in Australia might be represented in the Federal Council, "whereas the operation of this Bill is at present confined to five Australian colonies." (See House Coms. Pap., May, 1900, p. 24.)

The Imperial Government, however, did not insist in the proposed omission of the words relating to British ships. Although those words were omitted in the first draft of proposed amendments submitted to the Delegates, they were restored in the Bill as actually introduced in the House of Commons. (See House Coms. Paps., May, 1900, p. 19.)

§ 39. "First Port of Clearance."

If a British vessel began a voyage from any port outside the Commonwealth, then the port whence she started on her voyage would be the "First Port of Clearance," and consequently she would be exempt from the operation of the clause. If, upon the completion of that voyage by disembarking her passengers and discharging her cargo, she were chartered to carry cargo or passengers from one port of the Commonwealth to another, her first port of clearance on the new voyage, as well as her "port of destination," would be within the Commonwealth, and she would carry Commonwealth law with her from the beginning to the end of the local voyage.

§ 40. "The Queen's Ships of War."

Public ships of war are regarded as floating fortresses representing the sovereignty and independence of the country to which they belong. "A ship of war retains its national character with all its incidental privileges and immunities in whatever waters it may go, but if members of the crew leave the ship or its tenders, or its boats, they are liable to the territorial jurisdiction of the country into which they go. Even the captain is not considered to be individually exempt in respect of acts not done in his capacity as agent of his State. In his ship he is protected; he has entire freedom of movement; he is under no obligation to expose himself to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the country in whose ports, harbours, bays, rivers, or other territorial waters he may find himself; if he voluntarily does so he may be fairly expected to take the consequences of his acts." (Hall's International Law [1895], p. 205.)

Although the extra-territoriality of a public ship does not extend to her officers and men whilst they are on shore in a foreign country, the territorial government often pardons cognizance and waives the punishment of offences committed by a public ship's company on shore to the government to which the ship belongs. (Rivier, Principes du droit des Gens [1896], l., 334-51.)

Definitions⁴¹.

6. "The Commonwealth" shall mean⁴² the Commonwealth of Australia as established under this Act⁴³.

"The States"⁴⁴ shall mean such of the colonies⁴⁶ of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, Western Australia, and South Australia, including the Northern Territory of South Australia, as for the time being are parts of the Commonwealth⁴⁵, and such colonies or territories⁴⁷ as may be admitted into or established by the Commonwealth as States; and each of such parts of the Commonwealth shall be called "a State."

"Original States" shall mean such States as are parts of the Commonwealth at its establishment.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 5 of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

"The term 'The States' shall be taken to mean such of the existing colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, Western Australia, and the Province of South Australia, as for the time being form part of the Commonwealth, and such other States as may hereafter be admitted into the Commonwealth under the Constitution thereof, and each of such colonies so forming part of the Commonwealth shall be hereafter designated a State."

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced and passed in the same words. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 625-6.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion made by the Legislative Council of New South Wales (where it had been originated by Mr. R. E. O'Connor) to define "Original States" and "New States," was discussed; and ultimately the definition of "Original States" was agreed to. On Mr. Solomon's motion, the words "including the Northern Territory of South Australia" were agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897] pp. 231-9, 986-7.) At the Melbourne session, drafting amendments were made before the first report; and also after the fourth report, when the words "'Colony' shall mean any colony or province" were added.

In the Bill as introduced in the Imperial Parliament, the following words were added to the definition of Commonwealth:—"and the laws of the Commonwealth shall be colonial laws within the meaning of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865." In Committee, these words were omitted, and the words "'Colony' shall mean any colony or province"—which it was thought might raise a doubt as to the application of the Colonial Laws Validity Act—were also omitted. (See pp. 222-248, 351-2, supra.)

The definitions in the Act are remarkably few, being confined to the words "Commonwealth" and "State"—both old English words which receive by this Act a new technical application—and the phrase "Original States." Every other word and phrase of the Constitution is left to be construed from its natural meaning and its context.

It is safer to abstain from imposing, with regard to Acts of Parliament, any further canons of construction than those applicable to all documents. (Lamplugh v. Norton, 22 Q.B.D. 452.) When a doubt arises upon the construction of the words of an Act of Parliament, it is the duty of the Court to remove the doubt by deciding it; and when the Court has given its decision, the point can no longer be considered doubtful. (Bell v. Holtby, L.R. 15 Eq. 178.) Acts should be construed according to the intent of Parliament. If the words of the statute are themselves precise and unambiguous, then no more can be necessary than to expound those words in their natural and ordinary sense. The words themselves, in such case, best declare the intention of the legislature. (Sussex Peerage, 11 Cl. and F. 86; 8 Jur. 793.) The Court knows nothing of the intention of an Act, except from the words in which it is expressed, applied to the facts existing at the time. (Logan v. Courtown, 20 L.J. Ch. 347; Digest of Eng. Ca. L., xiii., p. 1888.) Anyone who contends that a section of an Act of Parliament is not to be read literally, must be able to show one of two things, either that (1) there is some other section which cuts down its meaning, or else (2) that the section itself is repugnant to the general purview of the Act. (Nuth v. Tamplin, 8 Q.B.D. 253. Id. p. 1889.) "I prefer to adhere to the golden rule of construction that the words of a statute are to be read in their ordinary sense, unless the so construing them will lead to some incongruity or manifest absurdity." (Per Grove, J., Collins v. Welch, 5 C.P.D. at p. 29. Id. p. 1889.) "The more literal construction of a section of a statute ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the intentions of the legislature as apparent by the statute, and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction by which that intention will be better effectuated." (Per Lord Selborne, L.C., Caledonian R. Co. v. North British R. Co., 6 App. Cas. 122; Id. p. 1889.) "No Court is entitled to depart from the intention of the legislature as appearing from the words of the Act because it is thought unreasonable. But when two constructions are open, the Court may adopt the more reasonable of the two." (Per Lord Blackburn, Roths v. Kirkeally Waterworks Commissioners, 7 App. Cas. 702; Id. p. 1889.)

"If we can fairly construe an Act so as to carry out what must obviously have been the intention of the legislature, although the words may be a little difficult to deal with, and although they may possibly admit of more than one interpretation, we ought, from those general considerations, to adopt the interpretation which will make the law uniform, and will remedy the evil which prevailed in all the cases to which the law can be fairly applied." (Per Jessel, M.R., Freme v. Clement, 44 L.T. 399, id. p. 1890.)

"In order to construe an Act of Parliament, the court is entitled to consider the state of the law at the time it was enacted." (Per Lord Esher, M.R., Philipps v. Rees, 24 Q.B.D. 17, id. p. 1892.)

It is useless to enter into an inquiry with regard to the history of an enactment, and any supposed defect in former legislation on the subject which it was intended to cure, in cases where the words of an enactment are clear. It is only material to enter into such inquiry where the words of an enactment are ambiguous and capable of two meanings, in order to determine which of the two meanings was intended. (Per Lord Esher, M.R., Reg. v. London [Bishop], 24 Q.B.D. 213.) If the words are really and fairly doubtful, then, according to well-known legal principles and principles of common sense, historical investigation may be used for the purpose of clearing away the doubt which the phraseology of the statute creates. (Reg. v. Most, 7 Q.B.D. 251.) The court cannot impute to the legislature, in passing statutes confirming titles created by means of parliamentary powers, ignorance of the transactions which had taken place in exercise of such powers. (Beardon v. King, 22 L.J. Ch. 111, Dig. of Eng. Ca. L. xiii. p. 1892.)

It is the most natural and genuine exposition of a statute to construe one part by another, for that best expresseth the meaning of the makers, and this exposition is ex visceribus actus. (Reg. v. Mallow Union, 12 Ir. C.L.R. 35.) The common law rights of the subject, in respect of the enjoyment of his property, are not to be trespassed upon by a statute, unless such intention is shown by clear words or necessary implication. Statutes restrictive of the common law receive a restrictive construction. (Ash v. Abdy, 3 Swans. 634, Dig. of Eng. Ca. L. xiii. p. 1893.)

In construing Acts which infringe on the common law, the state of the law before the passing of the Act must be ascertained to determine how far it is necessary to alter that law, in order to carry out the object of the Act. (Swanton v. Goold, 9 Ir. C.L.R. 234.) A right to demand a poll is a common law incident of all popular elections, and as such cannot be taken away by mere implication which is not necessary for the reasonable construction of a statute. (Per Brett, L.J., Reg. v. Wimbledon Local Board, 8 Q.B.D. 459.) The general law of the country is not altered or controlled by partial legislation, made without any special reference to it. (Denton v. Manners, 27 L.J. Ch. 199; affirmed 27 L.J. Ch. 623, Dig. of Eng. Ca. L. xiii. p. 1893.)

As a rule, existing customs or rights are not to be taken away by mere general words in an Act. But, without words especially abrogating them, they may be abrogated by plain directions to do something which is wholly inconsistent with them. And this may be the case though the Act is a private Act, and though the particular custom may have been confirmed, years before, by a verdict in a court of law. (Green v. Reg., 1 App. Cas. 513, id. p. 1894.)

"When there are ambiguous expressions in an Act passed one or two centuries ago, it may be legitimate to refer to the construction put upon these expressions throughout a long course of years, by the unanimous consent of all parties interested, as evidencing what must presumably have been the intention of the legislature at that remote period. But I feel bound to construe a recent statute according to its own terms, when these are brought into controversy, and not according to the views which interested parties may have hitherto taken." (Per Lord Watson, Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Laird, 8 App. Cas. 673, id. p. 1895.)

§ 42. "Shall Mean."

An interpretation clause is a modern innovation, and frequently does a great deal of harm. (Lindsay v. Cundy, 1 Q.B.D. 348; Reg. v. Boiler Explosion Act Commissioners, (1891), 1 Q.B. 703; Dig. Eng. Ca. L. Vol. xiii. p. 1886.)

"But for the interpretation clause, no difficulty as to the construction would have arisen. But I think an interpretation clause should be used for the purpose of interpreting words which are ambiguous or equivocal, and not so as to disturb the meaning of such as are plain." (Reg. v. Pearce, per Lush, J., 5 Q.B.D. 386, 389; Robinson v. Barton-Eccles, 8 App. Cas. 798; id. 1885.)

An interpretation clause in an Act should be understood to define the meaning of the word thereby interpreted, in cases as to which there is nothing else in the Act opposed to or inconsistent with that interpretation. (Midland R. Co. v. Ambergate, Nottingham and Boston and Eastern Junction R. Co., 10 Hare, 359, id. p. 1885)

§ 43. "Commonwealth . . . as Established Under this Act."

We have summarized the literary history of the name Commonwealth. (Note § 17, supra.) We now come to the statutory definition of the term. This definition, it will be observed, is a vague and technical one; the dominant words being "as established under this Act." For the true nature and primary meaning of the expression, the student is required to examine the first six clauses of the Act, which deal with the establishment of the new community. The Commonwealth is not in any way defined or explained by the Constitution itself; that deals only with the governing organization of the Commonwealth.

The first observation to be made is that the Commonwealth should not be confounded with the Constitution or with the Government. The Commonwealth, as a political entity and a political partnership, is outside of and supreme over the Constitution; it is outside of and supreme over the Government provided by that Constitution. The Government of the Commonwealth, consisting of two sets of legislative, executive and judicial departments, central and provincial, does not constitute the community. At the back of the Government lies the amending power—the quasi-sovereign organization of the Commonwealth within the Constitution; at the back of the Commonwealth and the Constitution is the British Parliament, its creator and guardian, whose legal relationship it requires that the Commonwealth should be described, not as an absolutely-sovereign organization, but by some term indicating a degree of subordination to that body. (Burgess, Political Sc., I., p. 57.)

The Commonwealth is established by a clause in the Imperial Act which could operate antecedently to and independently of the Constitution detailed in Clause 9, and of the machinery and procedure therein specified. In other words, the Commonwealth is the legal objective realization of an Australian quasi-Federal State or a quasi-National State, using those phrases in a sense to be hereafter explained. What, then, are the essential attributes and characteristics of the Commonwealth "as established by the Act?" These may be thus summarized:—First, its population basis; secondly, its territorial basis; thirdly, its federal principle; fourthly, its Imperial relationship; resulting in the establishment of a united people, upon a defined territory, organized on a federal plan, consistently with the Imperial connection, legally equipped for political action and development.

(1.) POPULATION BASIS.—Clause 3, illustrated by the preamble of the Act, explicitly provides that on the day appointed by the Queen's proclamation the people of the concurring colonies shall be united in a Federal Commonwealth. This union is not founded on force or coercion, but on a consensus of opinion induced by a consciousness of common interests and mutual benefit. The people so agreeing had all the elements of ethnic unity, such as sameness of race, language, literature, history, custom, faith and order of life, combined with the contributing influences of antecedent intercourse and territorial neighbourhood. (Burgess' Political Sc., vol. I., p. 2.)

Hence there were, co-existing with the desire for union, all the conditions and requirements essential for successful and harmonious union. These people, then, formerly living under separate systems of government are, by Clause 3 of the Act, declared to be united in a Federal Commonwealth, and by Clause 4 the Commonwealth is established. If the Act had given no further explanation, and had enumerated no other incidents or attributes of the Commonwealth, it might have been contended that the Commonwealth was merely a personal union of the people without any other element of cohesion and organization ; but all doubt on that point is removed by important phrases which occur in other clauses.

(2.) TERRITORIAL BASIS.—In Clause 5 a distinction is drawn between the people “of every State” and “of every part of the Commonwealth.” One expression relates to human beings, as residents of States, whilst the other evidently refers to land or country which might not be within a State, but might nevertheless be within the Commonwealth. In the clause now under review the States are defined as such of the colonies as form the union and become “parts of the Commonwealth.” In the Imperial Acts erecting the colonies they are described as territories included within certain geographical boundaries. Hence, if the colonies are parts of the Commonwealth, their territories are by the terms of the definition “parts of the Commonwealth.” These words, therefore, clearly show that the Commonwealth is a territorial community, having the right to conduct its governing operations in, over, and through certain territory, and, when they are read in conjunction with certain sections of the Constitution, it is plain that the Commonwealth has the right of eminent domain which may be exercised in the manner prescribed by the Constitution throughout its confines, when necessary for the execution and enjoyment of the powers conferred by the Constitution. (Kohl v. United States, 91 U.S., 367.) So far the Commonwealth “established under this Act” is a united people, organized within a united territory : the people being the population of the former colonies, and the territory being coincident with the territorial limits of the former colonies in addition to such other territory as may be added to the Commonwealth under section 122. Two other important features of the Commonwealth are, however, discoverable in the actual language of the Act.

(3.) FEDERAL FORM.—The only word in the Act creating the Commonwealth which is at all suggestive of structural design or functional distribution is the word “federal ;” it occurs once in the preamble and once in the clause under review, as descriptive of the form and structure of the new community. It is true that it appears in several passages in the constitution, but there it is descriptive of the central governing organs of the community, and not of the community itself. The Commonwealth is declared to be a Federal Commonwealth. The original and fundamental idea implied by “federal” and its various shades of meaning, as used in modern political literature, have been already analysed. (See Note. § 27, “Federal,” supra.)

(4.) IMPERIAL RELATIONSHIP.—By the preamble the Commonwealth is declared to be “Under the Crown ;” it is constitutionally a subordinate, and not an independent Sovereign community, or state. But its population is so great, its territory so vast, the obvious scope and intention of the scheme of union are so comprehensive, whilst its political organization is of such a superior type, that it is entitled to a designation which, whilst not conveying the idea of complete sovereignty and independence, will serve to distinguish it from an ordinary provincial society.

QUASI-NATIONAL STATE.—Burgess contends that there is no such thing in political science as a “federal State ;” that this adjective is applicable only to the organs of government and the distribution and division of governing powers : that its application to the State itself is due to a confusion of State with Government. (Political Sc., vol. I. p. 165.) What is really meant by such expressions as “Federal State” or “Federal Commonwealth,” technically inaccurate, according to this eminent jurist, is a National State, with a federal government—a dual system of government under common sovereignty. Such a State comprehends a population previously divided into a group of independent States. Certain causes have contributed to a union of this group of States into a single State, and the new State has constructed a government for the general affairs of the whole State, and has left to the old bodies, whose sovereignty it has destroyed, certain residuary powers of government to be exercised by them so long as the new State makes no other disposition. The old States become parts of the Government in the new States, and nothing more. (Political Sc., I. 79.) The Commonwealth therefore, may be said to possess nearly all, but not quite all, the characteristics and features of a national State. In order to denote its subordinate relation as an integral part of the British Empire, and not an independent sovereign State, some qualifying adjective or particle is necessary, such as "semi" or "quasi." We may therefore define the Commonwealth, established by this Act, as a quasi-national State (or semi-national State) composed of a homogeneous and related people of ethnic unity, occupying a fixed territory of geographical unity, bound together by a common Constitution, and organized by that Constitution under a dual system of provincial and central government, each supreme within its own sphere, and each subject to the common Constitution.

SECONDARY MEANING OF "COMMONWEALTH."—In several sections of the Constitution the term "Commonwealth" is used inartistically to denote the Central Government as contrasted with the Governments of the States, i.e., "The Legislative Power of the Commonwealth," sec. 1; "the Executive Power of the Commonwealth," sec. 61; "the Judicial Power of the Commonwealth," sec. 71. These expressions refer to the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Powers granted by the Constitution to the various organs of the Central Government. In the American Constitution the term "United States" is sometimes used to describe the Union and sometimes to denote the Central Government of the Union. These are instances of the secondary use and significance of corresponding terms in both Constitutions. The secondary use and meaning of "Commonwealth" must be distinguished from its primary and proper meaning as defined in the constructive clauses of the Imperial Act.

VARIOUS MEANINGS.—We will first consider the term "State" as popularly understood in English speaking communities, without reference to technical or external relations; secondly, "State" in its international significance; thirdly, "State" in its federal significance; and finally, "Nation" as contrasted with "State."

Popular Significance—In a popular sense the word "State" is often employed to denote the governing political authority of a country as distinguished from the inhabitants thereof; the mechanism of government; the organism of government as opposed to the persons who have to submit to the rule of the government; the central government, in contradistinction to the local governing authorities and the local governing institutions. Sometimes it is specially used to contrast the secular and political with the ecclesiastical organization of a country. (Ency. of British Law, vol. XI, p. 710.)

International Significance.—"State" has a technical meaning known to international law, according to which it is an organized political entity, having certain recognizable predicates, such as population, territory, independence of other entities like itself, and an organized system of self-government enabling it to determine its own internal organization and development. (Sheldon Amos, The Science of Politics (1883), p. 64.) The modern notion of the State was not brought into clear consciousness till a number of parallel States presented themselves side by side, and each of them by enforcing its own claim against the others manifested to itself and to the world its own personality, independence and integral unity. (Id.) For the purpose of comparison other definitions of "State" are here appended.

"A State is a collective body composed of a multitude of individuals united for their safety and convenience and intended to act as one man. Such a body can be only produced by a political union, by the consent of all persons to submit their own private wills to the will of one man or of one or more assemblies of men to whom the supreme authority is entrusted, and this will of that one man or one or more assemblies of men is, in different States, according to their different constitutions understood to be law." (Blackstone's Commentaries, I. 52.)

"This description of a State, it will be observed, omits all reference to territoriality and independence of other States; as such it is deficient. Further it is only applicable to States in which the supreme authority is entrusted to the will of one man, or one or more assemblies of men, and is not applicable to a federation in which the ultimate power is reserved to the people. (Judge Wilson's Comments on Blackstone's theory, 2 Dallas, 458.)

"For all the purposes of international law, a State may be defined to be a people permanently occupying a fixed territory, bound together by common laws, habits, and customs into one body politic, exercising, through the medium of an organized Government, independent sovereignty and control over all persons and things within its boundaries, capable of making peace and war, and of entering into international relations with other communities." (Phillimore's International Law, I, p. 81.)

"By a sovereign State we mean a community, or number of persons permanently organized under a sovereign Government of their own; and by a sovereign Government we mean a Government, however constituted, which exercises the power of making and enforcing law within a community, and is not itself subject to any superior Government. These two factors, the one positive, the other negative, the exercise of power and the absence of superior control, compose the notion of sovereignty, and are essential to it." (Montague Bernard, Neutrality of Great Britain during the American Civil War.)

"The State is a particular portion of mankind viewed as an organized unit, and its characteristics are the comprehension of individuals within its territory, the exclusiveness of its powers, its permanence and its sovereignty, that is its absolute, unlimited, and universal power over individuals who are its subjects. These constitute the essence of a State." (Burgess, Political Sc., I, p. 51-2.)

"The State is now the people in sovereign organization. This is an immense advance in the development of the State. It is the beginning of the modern political era. Under its educating influence the consciousness of the State spreads rapidly to the great mass of the population, and the idea of the State becomes completely secularized and popularized. The doctrine that the people, in ultimate sovereign organization, are the State, becomes a formulated principle of the schools, and of political science and literature. The jurists and publicists, and the moral philosophers, lead in the evolution of the idea. The warriors and the priests are assigned to the second place. The sovereign people turn their attention to the perfecting of their own organization. They lay hands upon the royal power. They strip it of its apparent sovereignty, and make it purely office. If it accommodates itself to the position, it is allowed to exist; if not, it is cast aside. At last the State knows itself, and is able to take care of itself. The fictions, the make-shifts, the temporary supports, have done their work, and done it successfully. They are now swept away. The structure stands upon its own foundation. The State, the realization of the universal in man, in sovereign organization over the particular, is at last established—the product of the progressive revelation of the human reason through history." (Burgess, id., p. 66.)

"A colony is, at the outset, no State. It is local government, with perhaps more or less of local autonomy. It may grow to contain in itself the elements to form a State, and may become a State by revolution, or by peaceable severance from the motherland; but before this, there is one simple State, and after it, there are two simple States, but at no time is there a compound State. If the motherland should so extend its state organization as to include the colony as active participant in the same, the state organization would still be simple; it would only be widened. A larger proportion of the population of such a State would be thereby introduced into the sovereign body. The only change which could be effected in this manner, as to the form of State, would be possibly the advance from monarchy to aristocracy, from aristocracy to democracy. The sovereignty would not be divided between the motherland and the colony, for the sovereignty is and must be a unit. It must be wholly in the motherland or wholly in the motherland and colony, as one consolidated, not compounded, organization." (Burgess, id., p. 77-8.)

Federal Significance.—The term "State" has also a special meaning applied to a federal system. In federal nomenclature a State is one of a number of communities formerly autonomous and self-governing, such as the States of America, and the States of Germany, which have agreed to transfer a portion of their political power to a union of the States, in the governing operations of which they retain an active share. Internationally such communities have no status as States; they are States only in a titular sense. "The old States become parts of the government in the new State, and nothing more. It is no longer proper to call them States at all. It is in fact only a title of honour, without any corresponding substance." (Burgess, Political Sc., I, p. 80.) They could, with equal convenience and propriety, be designated by other names, such as the Provinces of Canada, and the Cantons of Switzerland. Blackstone's definition, and all other standard definitions of a State would, of course, be quite inapplicable to those communities called "States" which are merely parts of a federal or national State, using those terms in the same sense previously discussed. A "State," therefore, in the ordinary sense of a federal constitution, is said to be a political community of free citizens, occupying a territory of defined boundaries, and organized with other similar communities, under a government sanctioned and limited by a written constitution, and established by the consent of the governed. It is the union of such States, under a common constitution, that forms the distinct and greater political unit which the American constitution designates as the United States. (Texas v. White, 7 Wall., 721) A State such as one of the United States of America is a body of political co-equals, or units, commonly called "the people," in whom, as electors, the sovereign and uncontrollable power originally resides, and whose will, as expressed and proclaimed by them in their written Constitution, is their sole organic law and bond of political existence. The United States are a community of such States, politically united only by a federal constitution and general government founded therein. (Bateman, Political and Constitutional Law, p. 21.)

"The States were not 'sovereigns' in the sense contended for by some. They did not possess the peculiar features of sovereignty—they could not make war, nor peace, nor alliances, nor treaties. Considering them as political beings, they were dumb, for they could not speak to any foreign sovereign whatever. They were deaf, for they could not hear any proposition from such sovereign. They had not even the organs or faculties of defence or offence, for they could not of themselves raise troops, or equip vessels, for war. On the other side, if the union of the States comprises the idea of a confederation, it comprises that also of consolidation. A union of the States is a union of the men composing them, from whence a national character results to the whole. Congress can act alone without the States, they can act (and their acts will be binding) against the instructions of the States. If they declare war, war is de jure declared; captures made in pursuance of it are lawful; no acts of the States can vary the situation, or prevent the judicial consequences. If the States, therefore, retained some portion of their sovereignty, they had certainly divested themselves of essential portions of it. If they formed a confederacy in some respects, they formed a nation in others. The Convention could clearly deliberate on and propose any alterations that Congress could have done under the Federal Articles. And could not Congress propose, by virtue of the last article, a change in any article whatever, and as well that relating to the equality of suffrage as any other? He made these remarks to obviate some scruples which had been expressed. He doubted much the practicability of annihilating the States; but thought that much of their power ought to be taken from them." (Rufus King in the Federal Convention 1788; Elliott's Debates 2nd ed. V., pp. 212-213)

"Some contend that the States are sovereign, when in fact they are only political societies. The States never possessed the essential rights of sovereignty. They were always vested in Congress. Their voting as States in Congress is no evidence of their sovereignty. The State of Maryland voted by counties. Did this make the counties sovereign? The States, at present, are only great corporations, having the power of making by laws, and these are effectual only if they are not contradictory to the general confederation." (Madison in the Federal Convention; Elliott's Debates 2nd ed. I., p. 461.)

A great controversy went on in America for many years as to whether the States, as integrated in the federal constitution, formed a union of independent commonwealths acting together for the limited purposes of general government, or whether they formed a single sovereign and independent political State composed of the whole mass of the American people. A few years before 1889, when Mr. Bryce published his book, the American Protestant-Episcopal Church at its annual Convention introduced, among the short sentence prayers, one suggested by an eminent New England divine, "O Lord, bless our nation." Next day the prayer was brought up for reconsideration, when so many objections were raised by the laity to the word nation, as importing a recognition of national unity, that it was dropped, and instead were adopted the words, "O Lord, bless the United States." Referring to this incident Mr. Bryce says:—

"But it is only the expression, on its sentimental side, of the most striking and pervading characteristic of the political system of the country, the existence of a double government, a double allegiance, a double patriotism. America is a Commonwealth of commonwealths, a Republic of republics, a State which, while one, is nevertheless composed of other States even more essential to its existence than it is to theirs." (The American Commonwealth, I., p. 12.)

"The acceptance of the Constitution of 1789 made the American people a nation. It turned what had been a League of States into a Federal State, by giving it a National Government, with direct authority over all citizens. But as this national government was not to supersede the governments of the States, the problem which the Constitution-makers had to solve was two-fold. They had to create a central government. They had also to determine the relations of this central government to the States as well as to the individual citizen. An exposition of the Constitution and criticism of its working must therefore deal with it in these two aspects; as a system of national government built up of executive powers and legislative bodies, like the monarchy of England or the republic of France, and as a Federal system linking together and regulating the relations of a number of commonwealths which are for certain purposes, but for certain purposes only, subordinated to it." (Id., p. 29.)

"The government of the United States is federal government. By this I do not mean that the central government alone is a federal government. It is true that this term is generally applied to it, but I think this arises from the mistaken assumption that it is the government of a federal State. I think I have shown that there is no such thing as a federal State; that, in what is usually called the federal system, one State employs two separate and largely independent governmental organizations in the work of government. What I mean, therefore, in the proposition that the government of the United States is federal government, is that the whole governmental system is federal and that the central government is one of two governmental organizations employed by the State." (Burgess, Political Sc. II., p. 18.)

A CONFEDERACY.—A confederacy is not a State. The members of the confederacy remain separate States. The confederacy has no sovereignty; it is merely a system of government founded on inter-state treaty dissolvable at will.

COMMONWEALTH AND STATES.—As we have already seen, Dr. Burgess contends that there is no such thing as a federal State. A federation, he says, is merely a dual system of government under a common sovereignty. (Political Sc., I., p. 79.) This definition is partly in conflict with that of Professor Dicey, who recognizes the possibility of a federal State, which he defines as a political contrivance intended to reconcile national unity and power with the maintenance of State rights. (Law of the Constitution, p. 131.) It does not agree with that of Mr. Bryce, who in the foregoing passage describes the United States as a Federal State. (American Comm., p. 12.)

From this conflict of literary authority we turn to the Imperial Act constituting the Commonwealth, where we find it described as a Federal Commonwealth, and we may assume that the expression is there used by the framers in either the first or the second of the four meanings already analysed (see Note, § No. 27, "Federal," supra), viz., as (1) descriptive of a union of States, linked together as co-equal societies, forming one political system, regulated and co-ordinated in their relations to one another by a common Constitution; or (2) as descriptive of the new community formed by such union. In this Act the term "States" is used as descriptive of those co-equal societies.

The Commonwealth, in almost every feature, answers the German expression Bundesstaat or composite State. In this sense it may be described as a single State which is administered by a dual system of government—one set of ruling organs dealing with those matters common to the whole State and another dealing with those relating to the several communities, considered as separate entities. (R. R. Garran, The Coming Commonwealth, p. 17.)

NATION.—As an abstract definition, a Nation may be described as a population of ethnic unity inhabiting a territory of geographic unity. By ethnic unity is meant a population having a common language, a common literature, common traditions and history, common customs, and a common consciousness of rights and wrongs. By geographic unity is meant a territory separated from other territory by natural physical boundaries. The nation, as thus defined, is the nation in perfect and complete existence, and this is hardly as yet anywhere to be found. (Burgess, Political Science, I., p. 2.) Where geographic and ethnic unities coincide, or very nearly coincide, the nation is almost sure to become a State. The nation must pass through many preliminary stages in its development before it reaches the maturity of a political State. (Id. p. 3.)

"Not all nations, however, are endowed with political capacity or great political impulse. Frequently the national genius expends itself in the production of language, art, or religion; frequently it shows itself too feeble to bring even these to any degree of perfection. The highest talent for political organization has been exhibited by the Aryan nations, and by these unequally. Those of them remaining in the Asiatic home have created no real States; and the European branches manifest great differences of capacity in this respect. The Celt, for instance, has shown almost none; the Greek but little, while the Teuton really dominates the world by his superior political genius. It is therefore not to be assumed that every nation must become a State. The political subjection or attachment of the unpolitical nations to those possessing political endowment appears, if we may judge from history, to be as truly a part of the course of the world's civilization as is the national organization of States. I do not think that Asia and Africa can ever receive political organization in any other way. Of course, in such a state of things, the dominant nation should spare, as far as possible, the language, literature, art, religion and innocent customs of the subject nation; but in law and politics it is referred wholly to its own consciousness of justice and expedience. Lastly, a nation may be divided into two or more States on account of territorial separation—as for example, the English and the North American, the Spanish-Portuguese and the South American—and one of the results of this division will be the development of new and distinct national traits. From these reflections, I trust that it will be manifest to the mind of every reader how very important it is to distinguish clearly the nation, both in word and idea, from the State; preserving to the former its ethnic signification, and using the latter exclusively as a term of law and politics. (Burgess, Political Sc., I., pp. 3-4.)

TERRITORIALITY OF THE COMMONWEALTH.—The territorial basis of the Commonwealth has been already briefly referred to. The above words so clearly and emphatically establish this principle, that special attention should be drawn to them at this stage. Grotius, in his celebrated treatise, wrote: "There are commonly two things which are subject to sovereignty (Imperium); first, persons, which alone sometimes suffice, as an army of men, women and children seeking new plantations; secondly, lands, which are called territory." (De Jure Belli et Pace II, pp. 3 and 4.) The case contemplated by Grotius as presenting the possible condition of a non-territorial sovereignty could scarcely occur in our time. It would be difficult to recognize the existence of a State without its undisputed possession of a defined territory; the only approach to such a phenomenon that might temporarily arise would be a rebel army wandering from place to place and recognized as a belligerent, which is tantamount to being recognized as a State. (Encyc. of the Law of England, Vol. xi. p. 710.) This, however, would be a feeble example of a State. It would have, at best, a precarious existence; its occupation of territory would be shifting, uncertain, and undefined; it would lack that continuity, cohesion, and recognition which are the essential attributes of a State. On the whole, therefore, the dictum of this distinguished jurist, whatever possible application it might have had in his time (1583-1645), may be regarded as untenable in the present age, in which territorial occupation is looked upon as one of the most important factors of the constitution of a true State. The inevitable tendency towards the establishment of territorial sovereignty, as an advance on personal and tribal sovereignty, is an historical fact of great significance. It is thus referred to by Sir Henry Maine:—

"From the moment when a tribal community settles down finally upon a definite space of land, the Land begins to be the basis of society in place of Kinship. The constitution of the Family through actual blood-relationship is of course an observable fact, but, for all groups of men larger than the Family, the Land on which they live tends to become the bond of union between them at the expense of Kinship, ever more and more vaguely conceived. We can trace the development of idea both in the large and now extremely miscellaneous aggregations of men combined in States or Political Communities, and also in the smaller aggregations collected in Village-Communities and Manors, among whom landed property took rise. The barbarian invaders of the Western Roman Empire, though not uninfluenced by former settlements in older homes, brought back to Western Europe a mass of tribal ideas which the Roman dominion had banished from it; but, from the moment of their final occupation of definite territories, a transformation of these ideas began. Some years ago I pointed out (Ancient Law, pp. 103 et seq.) the evidence furnished by the history of International Law that the notion of territorial sovereignty, which is the basis of the International system, and which is inseparably connected with dominion over a definite area of land, very slowly substituted itself for the notion of tribal sovereignty. Clear traces of the change are to be seen in the official style of kings. Of our own kings, King John was the first who always called himself King of England. (Freeman, 'Norman Conquest,' l. 82, 84.) His predecessors commonly or always called themselves Kings of the English. The style of the king reflected the older tribal sovereignty for a much longer time in France. The title of King of France may no doubt have come into use in the vernacular soon after the accession of the dynasty of Capet, but it is an impressive fact that, even at the time of the Massacre of St Bartholomew, the Kings of France were still in Latin Reges Francorum, and Henry the Fourth only abandoned the designation because it could not be got to fit in conveniently on his coins with the title of King of Navarre, the purely feudal and territorial principality of the Bourbons. (Freeman, loc. cit.) We may bring home to ourselves the transformation of idea in another way. England was once the country which Englishmen inhabited. Englishmen are now the people who inhabit England. The descendants of our forefathers keep up the tradition of kinship by calling themselves men of English race, but they tend steadily to become Americans and Australians. I do not say that the notion of consanguinity is absolutely lost, but it is extremely diluted, and quite subordinated to the newer view of the territorial constitution of nations. The blended ideas are reflected in such an expression as 'Fatherland,' which is itself an index to the fact that our thoughts cannot separate national kinship from common country. No doubt it is true that in our day the older conception of national union through consanguinity has seemed to be revived by theories which are sometimes called generally theories of Nationality, and of which particular forms are known to us as Pan-Slavism and Pan-Teutonism. Such theories are in truth a product of modern philology, and have grown out of the assumption that linguistic affinities prove community of blood. But wherever the political theory of Nationality is distinctly conceived, it amounts to a claim that men of the same race shall be included, not in the same tribal, but in the same territorial sovereignty. We can perceive, from the records of the Hellenic and Latin city-communities, that there, and probably over a great part of the world, the substitution of common territory for common race, as the basis of national union, was slow, and not accomplished without very violent struggles." (Maine's Early History of Institutions, 72-75.)

NEW SOUTH WALES.—The area of this colony, the oldest established of the Australian group, is 306,066 square miles. It is bounded on the east by the Pacific ocean, on the south by the colony of Victoria, on the north by the colony of Queensland, and on the west by the colony of South Australia. Population, 31st Dec., 1899, 1,348,400; public revenue from all sources, 1898-9, £9,572,912. Executive Government at the passing of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act:—Governor and Commander-in-Chief, the Right Honourable William Earl Beauchamp, K.C.M.G.; Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Frederick Matthew Darley, K.C.M.G., C.J. Administration—Premier, Colonial Treasurer, and Minister for Railways, Sir William J. Lyne; Colonial Secretary, the Hon. John See; Secretary for Lands, the Hon. T. H. Hassall; Secretary for Public Works, the Hon. E. W. O Sullivan; Attorney-General, the Hon. B. R. Wise, Q.C.; Minister for Public Instruction and Industry, the Hon. John Perry; Minister for Justice, the Hon. W. H. Wood; Secretary for Mines and Agriculture, the Hon. J. L. Fegan; Postmaster-General, the Hon. W. P. Crick; Representative in the Legislative Council, the Hon. F. B. Suttor.

NEW ZEALAND.—There are two principal islands, known as the North and Middle Islands, besides the South or Stewart's Island, and small outlying islands. The group is nearly 1,000 miles long, and 200 miles across at the broadest part. Its coast line extends over 4,000 miles. New Zealand is situated 1,200 miles to the east of the Australian continent. The area of New Zealand is estimated to embrace 104,471 square miles, of which the North Island comprises 44,468 square miles, the Middle Island 58,525, and Stewart's Island 665 square miles. Population, 31st Dec., 1898, 743,463; public revenue, 1898-9, £5,258,228. Executive Government at the passing of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act:—Governor and Commander-in-Chief, the Right Hon. the Earl of Ranfurly, K.C.M.G. Administration—Premier, Treasurer, Commissioner of Trade and Customs, Minister of Labour, Minister of Native Affairs, the Right Hon. R. J. Seddon, P.C.; Colonial Secretary, Postmaster-General, Minister of Railways, Industries, and Commerce, the Hon. J. G. Ward; Minister of Lands and Agriculture, Commissioner of Forests, the Hon. J. McKenzie; Commissioner of Stamp Duties and Member representing the Native Races, the Hon. J. Carroll; Minister of Education, Immigration and in charge of Hospitals and Charities, the Hon. W. C. Walker; Minister of Public Works, Marine and Printing Office, the Hon. W. Hall-Jones; Minister for Justice and Defence, the Hon. J. Thompson

QUEENSLAND.—Queensland comprises the whole north-eastern portion of the Australian continent, including the adjacent islands in the Pacific Ocean and in the Gulf of Carpentaria. The territory is of an estimated area of 668,497 English square miles, with a seaboard of 2,550 miles. Population, 31st Dec., 1899, 482,400; public revenue, 1898-9, £4,174,086. Executive Government at the passing of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act:—Governor and Commander-in-Chief, the Right Hon. Baron Lamington, K.C.M.G.; Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Samuel W. Griffith, G.C.M.G., C.J. Administration—Premier, Treasurer, and Secretary for Mines, the Hon. Robert Philp; Chief Secretary, the Hon. J. R. Dickson, C.M.G.; Home Secretary, the Hon. J. F. G. Foxton; Attorney-General, the Hon. Arthur Rutledge, Q.C.; Secretary for Public Lands, the Hon. W. B. H. O'Connell; Secretary for Railways and Public Works, the Hon. John Murray; Secretary for Agriculture, the Hon. J. V. Chataway; Postmaster-General and Secretary for Public Instruction, the Hon. J. G. Drake; Ministers without portfolios, the Hon. G. W. Gray and D. H. Dalrymple.

TASMANIA.—The area of the colony is estimated at 26,215 square miles, of which 24,330 square miles form the area of Tasmania proper, the rest constituting that of a number of small islands, in two main groups, the north-east and north-west. Population, 31st Dec., 1899, 182,300; public revenue, 1898-9, £908,223. Executive Government at the passing of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act:—Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief, Viscount Gormanston, K.C.M.G. Administration—Premier and Attorney-General, the Hon. N. E. Lewis; Chief Secretary, the Hon. G. T. Collins; Treasurer, the Hon. B. S. Bird; Minister of Lands, Works, and Mines, the Hon. E. Mulcahy; without portfolio, the Hon. F. W. Piessé.

VICTORIA.—Victoria is bounded on the north and north-east by a straight line drawn from Cape Howe to the nearest source of the river Murray, thence by the course of that river to the eastern boundary of the colony of South Australia, thence by that boundary to the Southern Ocean. It has an area of 87,885 square miles. Population, 31st Dec., 1899, 1,162,900; public revenue, 1898-9, £7,396,943. Executive Government at the passing of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act:—Lieutenant-Governor, the Hon. Sir John Madden, K.C.M.G., C.J. Administration—Premier and Chief Secretary, the Hon. Allan McLean; Treasurer, the Hon. Wm. Shiels; Attorney-General, the Hon. Wm. Hill Irvine; Solicitor-General, the Hon. John M. Davies; Minister of Mines, Water Supply, and Railways, the Hon. Alfred R. Outtrim; Minister of Public Works and Agriculture, the Hon. Geo. Graham; Minister of Lands, the Hon. James McColl; Minister of Education and Trade and Customs, the Hon. Dr. Charles Carty Salmon; Postmaster-General, the Hon. Wm. A. Watt; Minister of Defence and Public Health, the Hon. Donald Melville; without portfolio, the Hon. James Balfour.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—The original boundaries of the province, according to the statute of 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 95, were fixed between 132° and 141° E. long. as its eastern and western boundaries, the 26° of S. lat. as its northern limit and bounded on the south by the Southern Ocean. The boundaries were subsequently extended; under the statute of 24 and 25 Vic. c. 44, a strip of land between 132° and 129° E. long. was added on October 10th, 1861. (Statesman's Year Book, 1899; Webb's Imperial Law, p. 99.) The total area of South Australia proper is 380,070 square miles; and including the Northern Territory it is calculated to amount to 903,690 square miles. Population, 31st Dec., 1899, 370,700; public revenue, 1898-9, £2,731,208. Executive Government at the passing of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act :—Governor and Commander-in-Chief, the Right Hon. Baron Tennyson, K.C.M.G.; Lieutenant-Governor, the Right Hon. Sir S. J. Way, Bart., J.C. Administration—Premier and Treasurer, the Hon. F. W. Holder; Chief Secretary, the Hon. G. Jenkins; Attorney-General, the Hon. John H. Gordon; Commissioner of Lands and Minister for Mines, the Hon. L. O'Loughlin; Commissioner of Public Works, the Hon. R. W. Foster; Minister of Education and Agriculture, the Hon. E. L. Batchelor.

NORTHERN TERRITORY.—The Northern Territory of South Australia, formerly known as Alexandra Land, embraces an immense tract of country, and contains an area of about 523,620 square miles. It is bounded on the north by the Indian Ocean—that portion of it known as the Arafura Sea; on the south by the 26th parallel of south latitude, which is the line of demarcation between it and South Australia proper; on the east by the 133th meridian of east longitude, which divides it from Queensland; and on the west by the 129th meridian of east longitude, which separates it from Western Australia. It also comprises all the bays, gulfs, and adjacent islands on its northern coasts. The eastern boundary line of this territory cuts the coast near the mouth of the Wentworth river, on the south-east coast of the Gulf of Carpentaria, and the western boundary near Cape Domett, in Cambridge Gulf. (Aust. Hand Book [1900], p. 390.)

The Home Government originally proposed to annex this territory to Queensland; but, in consequence of the favourable report given by Mr. John M'Douall Stuart (the explorer) of the country on the northern coast, the South Australian Government petitioned the Home Government for its annexation to South Australia. This request was granted, and by royal letters patent of 6th July, 1863, a "supplementary commission" was issued extending the boundaries of that colony accordingly. The letters patent recited the provision of the Act (5 and 6 Vic. c. 76, sec. 51), empowering the Queen by letters patent to separate from New South Wales any part of the territory of that colony lying to the northward of 26° south latitude, and to erect the same into a separate colony or colonies (see p. 72, supra). They also recited the Act (24 and 25 Vic. c. 44, sec. 2), which empowered the Queen to annex to any Australian colony any territories which in the exercise of the above powers might have been erected into a separate colony; with a proviso that it should be lawful for the Queen in such letters patent to reserve the power of revoking or altering the same, and also on such revocation to exercise the power again. The letters patent then proceeded to declare that "We have thought fit, in pursuance of the powers so vested in Us, and of all other powers and authorities to Us in that behalf belonging, to annex, and we do hereby annex to Our said colony of South Australia, until We think fit to make other disposition thereof," so much of the colony of New South Wales as lies to the northward of 26° south latitude, and between 129° and 133° east longitude, together with the bays, gulfs, and adjacent islands; "and we do hereby reserve to Us, Our heirs and successors, full power and authority from time to time to revoke, alter, or amend these Our letters patent, as to Us or them shall seem fit." (Parl. Papers [S.A.], 1896, Vol. ii., No. 113.)

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.—As defined by Royal Commission, Western Australia includes all that portion of the continent situated to the westward of 129° E. longitude. The greatest length of this territory from Cape Londonderry in the north to Peak Head (south of King George's Sound) in the south is 1,450 miles, and its breadth from Steep Point near Dirk Hartog's Island, on the west, to the 129th meridian, on the east, about 850 miles. According to the latest computation, the total estimated area of the colony is 975,920 English square miles, including islands. Population 31st December, 1898—168,129; public revenue, 1898-9—£2,478,811. Executive Government at the passing of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act :—Governor and Commander-in-Chief, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Gerard Smith, K.C.M.G. Administration : Premier and Colonial Treasurer—The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, P.C., K.C.M.G.; Commissioner of Railways and Director of Public Works—the Hon. F. H. Piesse; Minister for Crown Lands—the Hon. G. Throssell; Minister of Mines—the Hon. H. B. Lefroy; Attorney-

General—the Hon. R. W. Pennefather ; Colonial Secretary—the Hon. G. Randell ; without portfolio—the Hon. S. Burt, Q.C.

§ 47. “Colonies or Territories.”

The only “States” at the outset will be the “Original States,” namely, New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania. But under sec. 121 the Federal Parliament may admit or establish new States ; and any colonies or territories which are so established as States will thenceforth be included in the definition. Apart from New Zealand and the northern Territory of South Australia, new States are hardly likely to be formed except by the sub-division of existing States.

TERRITORIES.—A description may here be given of the chief Australasian territories which are likely, in time, to become territories of the Commonwealth—though their size or political condition, or both, render it unlikely that any of them will be admitted to the rank of States.

NORFOLK ISLAND.—This island, about five miles in length, and three in breadth, situated 900 miles from the Australian main land, and 1,100 miles from Sydney, was discovered by Captain Cook, on 9th October, 1774. It is said to be one of the most beautiful spots in the Pacific. The inhabitants are governed, since 14th November, 1896, by a Resident Magistrate, and an elective Council of 12 members ; they are subject to the instructions of the Governor of New South Wales, who is expected to visit it once during his term of office. Area, 10 square miles ; population about 750.

LORD HOWE ISLAND.—This picturesque island, seven miles in length, and about one and half miles in breadth, situated about 400 miles from Sydney, was discovered by Lieutenant Ball, on 14th February, 1788, whilst on a voyage in H.M.S. Supply from Port Jackson to found a Settlement at Norfolk Island. It is administered by the Government of New South Wales, and since 1882, it has been under the jurisdiction of a visiting Magistrate from Sydney. Population, 55.

FJI.—The Fiji Islands were ceded to the Queen by the Chiefs and people thereof, and the British flag was hoisted on 10th October, 1874. Rotumah was annexed in December, 1880. The islands are ruled by a Governor, assisted by an Executive and a Legislative Council. There are about 80 inhabited islands in the group, containing a total area, including Rotumah, of about 8,000 square miles, and having a population of 121,180 ; of whom 99,773 are Fijians, and the rest Indians, Polynesians, Rotumans, and Europeans.

NEW GUINEA.—By letters patent, dated 8th June, 1888, British New Guinea was erected into a separate possession, as part of the Queen’s dominions. Its area is calculated to include about 86,000 square miles. The territory is at present governed by a local administrator, assisted by an Executive Council ; the sum of £15,000 per year being guaranteed by the colonies of Queensland, New South Wales, and Victoria towards the expenses of governing the territory.

Repeal of Federal Council Act. (48 and 49 Vic. c. 60.)

7. The Federal Council of Australasia Act, 1885, is hereby repealed, but so as not to affect any laws passed by the Federal Council of Australasia⁴⁸ and in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Any such law may be repealed as to any State by the Parliament of the Commonwealth, or as to any colony not being a State by the Parliament thereof.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 6 of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was in almost identical words, and was adopted by the convention of 1897-8 without debate. At the Melbourne session, verbal amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 48. "Laws Passed by the Federal Council."

The following Acts have been passed by the Federal Council, viz :—

(1.) 49 Vic. No. 1. An Act for shortening the language used in Acts of the Federal Council of Australasia. Cited as "The Federal Council Interpretation Act, 1886." (Vic. Gov. Gaz., 19 Feb., 1886, p. 396.)

(2.) 49 Vic. No. 2. An Act to facilitate the proof throughout the Federation of Acts of the Federal Council and of the Acts of the Parliaments of the Australasian Colonies, and of Judicial and Official Documents and of the Signatures of certain Public Officers. Cited as "The Federal Council Evidence Act, 1886." (Vic. Gov. Gaz., 19 Feb., 1886, p. 397.)

(3.) 49 Vic. No. 3. An Act to authorize the service of Civil Process out of the jurisdiction of the colony in which it is issued. Cited as "The Australasian Civil Process Act, 1886." (Vic. Gov. Gaz., 19 Feb., 1886, p. 397.)

(4.) 49 Vic. No. 4. An Act to make provision for the enforcement within the Federation of judgments of the Supreme Court of the Colonies of the Federation. Cited as "The Australasian Judgments Act, 1886." (Vic. Gov. Gaz., 19 Feb., 1886, p. 398.)

(5.) 51 Vic. No. 1. An Act to regulate the Pearl Shell and Beche de mer Fisheries in Australasian waters adjacent to the colony of Queensland. Cited as "The Queensland Pearl Shell and Beche de mer Fisheries (extra-territorial) Act, 1888." Reserved for the Royal assent 20 Jan., 1888, and proclaimed 19 July, 1888. (Vic. Gov. Gaz., 17 Aug., 1888, p. 2576 ; 31 Aug., 1888, p. 2706 ; and 7 Sept., 1888, p. 2753.)

(6.) 52 Vic. No. 1. An Act to regulate the Pearl Shell and Beche de mer Fisheries in Australasian waters adjacent to the colony of Western Australia. Cited as "The Western Australian Pearl Shell and Beche de mer Fisheries (extra-territorial) Act of 1889." Reserved for the Royal assent 4 Feb. 1889, and proclaimed 18 Jan., 1890. (Vic. Gov. Gaz., 31 Jan., 1890, p. 332.)

(7.) 54 Vic. No. 1. An Act to facilitate the recognition in other colonies of Orders and Declarations of the Supreme Court of any colony in matters of Lunacy. Cited as "The Australasian Orders in Lunacy Act, 1891." (Vic. Gov. Gaz., 17 Feb., 1891, p. 903.)

(8.) 56 Vic. No. 1. An Act to make provision for the Discipline and Government of the Garrisons established at King George's Sound and Thursday Island at the joint expense of the Australian Colonies or some of them (3 Feb., 1893). Cited as "The Federal Garrisons Act, 1893." (Published in the Vic. Gov. Gaz., 3 March, 1893, p. 1131.)

(9.) 60 Vic. No. 1. An Act to provide for the naturalization within the Australian Colonies, or some of them, of persons of European descent naturalized in any of such colonies (1 Feb., 1897). Cited as "The Australasian Naturalization Act, 1897." (Vic. Gov. Gaz., 19 March, 1897, pp. 1121-2.)

(10.) 60 Vic. No. 2. An Act to make provisions for the enforcement in certain cases within the Australasian Colonies, or some of them, of Orders of the Supreme Courts of such Colonies for the production of Testamentary Instruments (1 Feb., 1897). Cited as "The Australasian Testamentary Process Act, 1897." (Vic. Gov. Gaz., 19 March, 1897, p. 1123.)

The colonies represented in the Federal Council were:—Victoria, Queensland, Western Australia, Tasmania, Fiji ; and also, for a period of two years (from 10th December, 1888, to 10th December, 1890), South Australia. (See Historical Introduction, p. 114, supra.)

Application of Colonial Boundaries Act. (58 and 59 Vic. c. 34.)

8. After the passing of this Act the Colonial Boundaries Act, 1895⁴⁹, shall not apply to any colony which becomes a State of the Commonwealth; but the Commonwealth shall be taken to be a self-governing colony for the purposes of that Act.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—At the Melbourne Session of the Convention, after the first report, this clause was proposed by Mr. O'Connor in precisely the form in which it now stands. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1,826-7.)

§ 49. "Colonial Boundaries Act."

This is an Act to provide, in certain cases, for the alteration of the boundaries of self-governing colonies. It provides as follows:—

- (i.) Where the boundaries of a colony have, either before or after the passing of this Act, been altered by Her Majesty the Queen by Order-in-Council or letters-patent, the boundaries as so altered shall be, and be deemed to have been from the date of the alteration, the boundaries of the colony.
- (ii.) Provided that the consent of a self-governing colony shall be required for the alteration of the boundaries thereof.
- (iii.) In this Act "self-governing colony" means any of the colonies specified in the schedule to this Act.

SCHEDULE.

SELF-GOVERNING COLONIES.

Canada.	South Anstralia.	New Zealand.
Newfoundland.	Queensland.	Cape of Good Hope.
New South Wales.	Western Australia.	Natal.
Victoria.	Tasmania.

The effect of this clause is to make the Colonial Boundaries Act apply, not to the separate States of the Commonwealth, but to the Commonwealth as a whole—just as it applies to the Dominion of Canada as a whole. In other words, the colonies which become States are in effect struck out of the schedule, and the Commonwealth of Australia is substituted.

The purpose of the Act is to confer general statutory authority on the Queen to alter the boundaries of a self-governing colony, with the consent of that colony, without the necessity of resorting to Imperial legislation in every case.

The reason for repealing the Act, so far as it applied to colonies which become States of the Commonwealth, is that the Constitution itself makes provision for the alteration of the boundaries of States. Sec. 123 provides that the Parliament of the Commonwealth may, with the consent of the Parliament of a State, and the approval of a majority of voters in the State, alter the limits of the State.

Now, therefore, the Colonial Boundaries Act only applies to the alteration of the boundaries of the Commonwealth. Apart altogether from that Act, the Commonwealth has power under section 121 to alter the boundaries of the Commonwealth by admitting new States; and sec. 122 contemplates, and perhaps impliedly gives, the power to accept or acquire new territories.

The first question is—What constitutes the consent of the Commonwealth within the meaning of the Colonial Boundaries Act? The consent of a colony is ordinarily given by its Legislature; and the consent here intended is evidently the consent of the Parliament of the Commonwealth. It may indeed be contended that by the Commonwealth, which is described in the Colonial Boundaries Act, as "a self-governing colony," is meant the community; and that the consent of the community cannot be given either by the Parliament of the Commonwealth or by the Parliaments of the States, or both, but only by the community in quasi-sovereign organization—i.e., by the amending power. This, however, was certainly not the intention of the framers of the Colonial Boundaries Act, or of the Federal Constitution; whatever may be the teachings of political science as to the seat of quasi-sovereignty in the Commonwealth. The consent of Canada under the Colonial Boundaries Act is clearly to be given by the Parliament of Canada; and the consent of the Commonwealth means the consent of the Parliament of the Commonwealth. That is to say, the word "Commonwealth" is used here as in other provisions as referring to the central governing organs of the Commonwealth. (See notes § 17 and § 43 "Commonwealth," supra.)

Where the alteration of the boundaries of the Commonwealth involves merely territory which is not part of any State, the clause presents no further difficulty; but where it involves the alteration of the limits of a State, it becomes a question whether in addition to the consent of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, the consent of the Parliament and electors of the State is also necessary. The Colonial Boundaries Act, as amended by the Constitution Act, provides that Orders in Council, or letters patent, altering the boundaries of the Commonwealth, shall be valid if made with the consent of the Commonwealth; sec. 123 of the Constitution provides that the Parliament of the Commonwealth may, with the consent of the Parliament and a majority of the electors of a State, alter the limits of the State. The latter section certainly implies that the Parliament of the Commonwealth may not alter the limits of a State without such consent. The question is whether, in consenting to an alteration of boundaries by the Queen, the Parliament can be said to alter the limits of a State. Under sec. 123, the Parliament of the Commonwealth makes the alteration; under the Colonial Boundaries Act, the Queen makes the alteration, and the Parliament of the Commonwealth merely consents. It is certainly open to argument that the consent of the Commonwealth, in such a case, is in effect an alteration of the limits of a State by the Commonwealth, and therefore that the Parliament of the Commonwealth cannot lawfully give such consent without the consent of the Parliament of the State, and the approval of a majority of the electors.

Constitution.

9. The Constitution⁵⁰ of the Commonwealth shall be as follows:—

THE CONSTITUTION.

This Constitution is divided as follows:—

- | | |
|---------|--|
| Chapter | I.—The Parliament : |
| Part | I.—General : |
| Part | II.—The Senate : |
| Part | III.—The House of Representatives : |
| Part | IV.—Both Houses of the Parliament : |
| Part | V.—Powers of the Parliament : |
| Chapter | II.—The Executive Government : |
| Chapter | III.—The Judicature : |
| Chapter | IV.—Finance and Trade : |
| Chapter | V.—The States : |
| Chapter | VI.—New States : |
| Chapter | VII.—Miscellaneous : |
| Chapter | VIII.—Alteration of the Constitution : |
| | The Schedule. |

HISTORICAL NOTE.—The division of the Constitution into Chapters and Parts is precisely the same as in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. At the Adelaide Session, 1897, the wording of the Bill of 1891 was followed exactly. At the Melbourne Session, after the fourth report, a few verbal changes were made—notably the substitution of “Alteration” for “Amendment;” but the mode of division remained unchanged.

In the Bill as introduced into the Imperial Parliament, the clause was altered to read:—“Subject to the foregoing provisions, the Constitution of the Commonwealth shall be as set forth in the schedule to this Act.” The Constitution was appended as a schedule. In Committee, however, the clause was restored to its original shape. (See Hist. Intro., pp. 242, 248, supra.)

ORGANIZATION OF THE COMMONWEALTH WITHIN THE CONSTITUTION.—Up to this stage the Imperial Act has dealt with the organization of the Commonwealth outside of and without reference to the Constitution. Clause 9 unfolds the Constitution, which, as we have already seen, deals with the internal organization of the Commonwealth, distributes power, provides for the government of the Commonwealth, guarantees the corporate rights of the States, parts of the Commonwealth, and the personal rights and liberties of individuals resident within the Commonwealth; and contains provisions for the accomplishment of changes to meet the possible requirements and potentialities of the future. We are now able to appreciate the distinction, previously emphasized, between the Commonwealth and the Constitution. Back of the Federal and State governments lies the amending power—the quasi-sovereign organization of the Commonwealth within the Constitution; back of the amending power and the Constitution lies the sovereign British Parliament, which ordained the Constitution. (Burgess, Political Sc., I., p. 57.) The Constitution embodies the terms of the deed of political partnership between the people and the States, by whose union the Commonwealth is composed. This deed contains a complete scheme for the regulation of the legal rights and duties of the people, considered both as members of the united community, and as members of the provincial communities in which they respectively reside; it contains a full delimitation and distribution of the governing powers of the Commonwealth, not only creating a central government, but expressly confirming the Constitutions, powers and laws of the State governments so far as not inconsistent with grants of powers to the central government. This is a feature which presents a marked contrast to the Constitution of the United States, referring to which Bryce says:—

“It must, however, be remembered that the Constitution does not profess to be a complete scheme of government, creating organs for the discharge of all the functions and duties which a civilized community undertakes. It pre-supposes the State governments. It assumes their existence, their wide and constant activity. It is a scheme designed to provide for the discharge of such and so many functions of government as the States do not already possess and discharge.” (Bryce’s American Comm., vol. I., p. 29.)

By implication, no doubt, the State Constitutions of the United States must be read along with and into the Federal Constitution in order to make it cover the whole field of civil government. But no such implication or inference is necessary in order to show that the Constitution of the Commonwealth is not a fragmentary statute dealing in a partial manner with the political government of the Union. It does not merely pre-suppose the State governments. It expressly recognizes and confirms their existence (secs. 106-7-8). It is a comprehensive and a complete system of government, partitioning the totality of quasi-sovereign powers delegated to the Commonwealth, as well as providing for a future development and expansion of those powers. This is suggested by a general conspectus of the Constitution now under review, and it is confirmed by an analysis of the Constitution in detail. A logical classification of the various powers exercisable under the Constitution would resolve them into three parts—

- (1.) General authority vested in the Federal Parliament, the Federal Executive, and the Federal Judiciary, with limitations and qualifications.
- (2.) Residuary authority of the States as defined in their respective Constitutions, confirmed and continued by sections 106, 107, and 108 of the supreme Constitution, and exercised by them through their respective legislative, executive, and judiciary organization, with limitations and qualifications.
- (3.) Power to amend the Constitution of the Commonwealth, enlarging or diminishing the area of federal authority and jurisdiction; or enlarging or diminishing the area of State authority and jurisdiction.

TRIPARTITE DIVISION OF GOVERNMENT.—It will be noticed that the authority and jurisdiction assigned to the central or general government is distributed among three departments—(1) The Legislature; (2) the Executive; (3) the Judiciary. A further tripartite division of the legislative power itself is seen in the threefold mode of legislation—the legislative power being vested jointly in three bodies—(1) The Queen; (2) the Senate; and (3) the House of Representatives. (See Bancroft on the Constitution of the United States, infra.)

The same division and co-ordination is observed in the Constitutions of the States. It is a fundamental principle in the British and American political systems. The Constitution of the Commonwealth is a compound, embodying the best features of both those time-honoured models, and eliminating those considered objectionable, according to the views and judgments of its framers. This tripartite principle of division and distribution of power has been followed in the Constitution of the Commonwealth; though, of course, there are differences in the relative powers of the several organs.

“In every form of government (πολιτεία) there are three departments (μόρια), and in every form the wise law-giver must consider, what, in respect to each of these, is for its interest. If all is well with these, all must needs be well with it, and the differences between forms of government are differences in respect to these. Of these three, one is the part which deliberates (τὸ βουλευόμενον) about public affairs; the second is that which has to do with the offices . . . ; and the third is the judicial part (τὸ δικάζον.)” (Aristotle, Politics, Book vi., c. xiv.; cited Foster’s Comm., I., 299.)

“The tripartite division of government into legislative, executive, and judicial, enforced in theory by the illustrious Montesquien, and practised in the home government of every one of the American States, became a part of the Constitution of the United States, which derived their mode of instituting it from their own happy experience. It was established by the federal convention with rigid consistency that went beyond the example of Britain, where one branch of the legislature still remains a court of appeal. Each one of the three departments proceeded from the people, and each is endowed with all the authority needed for its just activity. The president may recommend or dissuade from enactments, and has a limited veto on them; but whatever becomes a law he must execute. The power of the legislature to enact is likewise uncontrolled, except by the paramount law of the Constitution. The judiciary passes upon every case that may be presented, and its decision on the case is definitive; but without further authority over the executive or the legislature, for the convention had wisely refused to make the judges a council to either of them. Tripartite division takes place not only in the threefold powers of government; it is established as the mode of legislation. There too, three powers proceeding from the people, must concur, except in cases provided for, before an act of legislation can take place. This tripartite division in the power of legislation—so at the time wrote Madison, so thought all the great builders of the constitution, so asserted John Adams with vehemence and sound reasoning—is absolutely essential to the success of a federal republic; for if all legislative powers are vested in one man or in one assembly, there is despotism; if in two branches, there is a restless antagonism between the two; if they are distributed among three, it will be hard to unite two of them in a fatal strife with the third. But the executive, and each of the two chambers, must be so chosen as to have a character and strength and popular support of its own. The Government of the United States is thoroughly a government of the people. By the English aristocratic revolution of 1688, made after the failure of the popular attempt at reform, the majority of the House of Commons was in substance composed of nominees of the House of Lords, so that no ministry could prevail in it except by the power of that House; and as the prime minister and cabinet depended on the majority in the House of Commons, the House of Lords directly controlled the government not only in its own branch, but in the Commons, and through the Commons in the nomination of the ministry. All these branches of the government were in harmony, for all three branches represented the aristocracy. In the United States, on the other hand, all the branches of power—president, senators, and representatives—proceed directly or indirectly from the people. The government of the United States is a government by the people, for the people.” (Baneroff, History of the Constitution of the United States, vol. ii., p. 327-8-9, 6th ed., 1889.)

“It is believed to be one of the chief merits of the American system of written constitutional law, that all the powers entrusted to the government, whether State or national, are divided into three grand departments—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. That the function appropriate to each of these branches of government shall be vested in a separate body of public servants, and that the perfection of the system requires that the lines which separate and divide these departments shall be broadly and clearly defined. It is also essential to the successful working of this system that the persons entrusted with power in any one of these branches shall not be permitted to encroach upon the powers confided to the others, but that each shall by the law of its creation be limited to the exercise of the powers appropriate to its own department and no other. To these general propositions there are in the Constitution of the United States certain important exceptions. These are then stated substantially as set forth in the text.” (Per Mr. Justice Miller, in Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S., 168; Foster’s Comm., I., p. 296.)

“One branch of the government cannot encroach on the domain of another without danger.” (Per Chief Justice Waite, in the Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U.S., 700, 718; quoted with approval by Mr. Justice Harlan, in Clough v. Curtis, 134 U.S., 361; Foster, I., 297.)

“The maintenance of the system of checks and balances, characteristic of republican constitutions, requires the co-ordinate departments of government, whether federal or State, to refrain from any infringement of the independence of each other, and the possession of property by the judicial department cannot be arbitrarily encroached upon, save in violation of this fundamental principle.” (Per Chief Justice Fuller, in re Tyler, 149 U.S., 164; to the same effect in Swan, 150 U.S., 637; Foster, I., 297.)

“The classification of governmental powers into three is as old as Aristotle, but the importance of their separation was first explained by Montesquieu. His great work was accepted as infallible by the leaders of the American people throughout the Revolution and at the time of the Federal Convention. More than half the first State constitutions contained declarations of the importance of the distinction. The rest recognized it in their structure. The first constitution proposed for Massachusetts was rejected partly for the reason that the powers were not kept sufficiently apart.” (Foster, I., 299.)

“Where the government lays down general rules for the guidance of conduct, it is exercising its legislative functions. Where it is carrying those rules into effect, it is exercising its executive powers. And where it is punishing or remedying the breach of them, it is fulfilling judicial duties. It by no means follows that the exercise of these different classes of functions is always entrusted to different hands. But, nevertheless, the distinctions between the functions themselves usually exist, both in central and in local matters.” (Jenks, Government of Victoria, p. 228.)

The Constitution of the Commonwealth, in accordance with these time-honoured precedents and principles, draws a clear-cut distinction between the law-making and the law-enforcing agencies; the legislative power being vested in the Federal Parliament, and the Executive power being vested in the Queen, and exercisable by the Governor-General with the advice of a Federal Executive Council. The two departments are differentiated as clearly as they can be by language. But out of the Executive Council will spring a body whose name is not to be found in this Constitution; whose name is not legally known to the British Constitution; a body which is “the connecting link, the hyphen, the buckle,” fastening the legislative to the executive part of the Federal Government; that ministerial committee of Parliament, nominally and theoretically servants of the Crown, but in reality, though indirectly, appointed by the National Chamber; that committee whose tenure of office depends upon its retention of the confidence of the National Chamber and by and through whose agency a close union, if not a complete fusion, is established between the executive and legislative powers—THE CABINET. (Walter Bagehot, English Constitution, 2nd ed., pp. 10-11.) This separation in theory, but fusion in practice, of the legislative and executive functions, through the agency of the Cabinet, may, to those who have not much considered it, seem a dry and small matter, but it is "the latent essence and effectual secret of the English Constitution." (Id., p. 16; see Note, § 271, "Executive Government.")

CHAPTER I.—THE PARLIAMENT⁵¹.

§ 51. "Parliament."

ORIGIN.—This word, which, Bagehot says, is descriptive of the greatest inquiring, discussing, and legislative machine the world has ever known, "the great engine of popular instruction and political controversy," is derived from the Old English, Parlement; French, Parlement, Parler, to speak; Low Latin, Parliamentum—a parleying, a discussion, a conference; hence a formal conference on public affairs; an assembly of representatives of a nation. (Webster's Internat. Dictionary.) Freedom of speech is the essence of political representation, and without it a national council could not exist.

"The word (which was at first applied to general assemblies of the States under Louis VII. in France, about A.D. 1150) was not used in England until the reign of Hen. III., and the first mention of it, in our statute law, is in the preamble to stat. Westm. I., 3 Ed. I., A.D. 1272. When therefore it is said that Parliaments met before that era, it is by a license of speech, considering every national assembly as a Parliament. See I. Comm., c. 2, p. 147, and the notes thereof." (Tomlins's British Law—Title, Parliament.)

"In 21 Henry III. the King finds himself, in consequence of pressing money embarrassments, again compelled to make a solemn confirmation of the charter, in which once more the clauses relating to the estates are omitted. Shortly afterwards, as had happened just one hundred years previously in France, the name 'parliamentum' occurs for the first time (Chron., Dunst., 1244; Matth., Paris, 1246), and, curiously enough, Henry III. himself, in a writ addressed to the Sheriff of Northampton, designates with this term the assembly which originated the Magna Charta: 'Parliamentum Runemede, quod fuit inter Dom. Joh., Regem patrem nostrum et barones suos Anglie.' (Rot. Claus., 28 Hen. III.) The name 'parliament' now occurs more frequently, but does not supplant the more indefinite terms concilium, colloquium, &c." (Geist, English Constitution, p. 261.)

PRECURSORS AND PROTOTYPES.—The Parliament of the Commonwealth is not an original invention in any of its leading principles. It has its roots deep in the past. It has been built on lines suggested by the best available models of its kind. Its framers did not venture to indulge in any new fangled experiments; they resisted every temptation to leave the beaten tract of precedent and experience, or to hanker after revolutionary ideals. In constructing a legislative machine for the new community they believed that they would most successfully perform their work by utilizing and adapting the materials to be found in the British, American, and Canadian Constitutions, with such developments and improvements as might be justified by reason and expediency. Of them and their work it may be said, as of the authors of the Constitution of the United States and of their work—

"They had a profound disbelief in theory and knew better than to commit the folly of breaking with the past. They were not seduced by the French fallacy that a new system of Government could be ordered like a new suit of clothes. They would as soon have thought of ordering a suit of flesh and skin. It is only on the roaring loom of time that the stuff is woven for such vesture of their thought and experience as they were meditating." (Mr. Lowell's Address on Democracy, Oct. 6, 1884.)

"They had neither the rashness nor the capacity necessary for constructing a Constitution, a priori. There is wonderfully little genuine inventiveness in the world, and perhaps least of all has been shown in the sphere of political institutions. These men, practical politicians who knew how infinitely difficult a business government is, desired no bold experiments. They preferred, so far as circumstances permitted, to walk in the old paths, to follow methods which experience had tested. Accordingly they started from the system on which their own colonial governments, and afterwards their State governments, had been conducted. This system bore a general resemblance to the British Constitution; and in so far it may with truth be said that the British Constitution became a model for the new national government." (Bryce's American Comm., I., p. 31.)

"There were other precursors of the federal government; but the men who framed it followed the lead of no theoretical writer of their own or preceding times. They harboured no desire of revolution, no craving after untried experiments. They wrought from the elements which were at hand, and shaped them to meet the new exigencies which had arisen. The least possible reference was made by them to abstract doctrines; they moulded their design by a creative power of their own, but nothing was introduced that did not already exist, or was not a natural development of a well-known principle. The materials for building the American constitution were the gifts of the ages." (Bancroft, Constitution of the U.S., II., p. 322.)

"In the constant remaking of the constitutions of Europe, South America, and even Asia, Africa, and the Pacific islands, they should teach statesmen the pitfalls to avoid and the paths to seek for the permanent security of both liberty and property. These can be found only by an exhaustive study of the precedents which are landmarks of the progress of the development of the Constitution of the United States, before as well as since its adoption. They lead from the forests of Germany in the time of Tacitus, over the island of Rynnymede and the rock at Plymouth, beyond the apple-tree at Appomattox into the old Senate Chamber at Washington, where Chief Justice Fuller sits with his associates. They were the result of conflicts with the sword, the pen, and the tongue, in the field, the press, the senate, and the court. Amongst their builders are enrolled the names of Simon de Montfort, Coke, Eliot, Hampden, Lilburne, Milton, Shaftesbury, Locke, Wilkes, Jefferson, Hamilton, Marshall, Webster, and Lincoln. They present the spectacle of the struggles of a people to obtain civil and religious liberty for themselves, to extend them to those of another and despised race, and now to combine them with the rights to ungoverned labour and complete security for private property." (Foster's Comm., I., p. 2.)

"The form of government which prevails usually in primitive communities comprises a king or chief, a senate or gathering of elders or selectmen with whom he consults, and a public assembly of all freemen with the right of suffrage, who decide questions of importance, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, which are submitted to them. This naturally arose from the councils of war, where the general, after consulting the more experienced, took the sense of the whole body of warriors before an important enterprise. Such a legislative assemblage of the whole people may still be seen once a year on the Tynwald in the Isle of Man, in the Swiss cantons of Uri, Unterwalden, Glarus, and Appenzell; and more frequently in the town meetings in New England and the Western States. In Switzerland the voters still follow the early custom of attending armed. Of such a character were the federal assemblies of the Achaian, Aetolian and Lycian Leagues, which each citizen had a right to attend, although they voted by cities. They were manifestly impracticable when a government was spread over an extensive territory, and to the lack of representative institutions has been ascribed the loss of liberty in Greece and Rome. The senates of these confederations seem to have been composed of the present and former magistrates of the different cities, who acted rather as ambassadors than legislators, and voted by cities, each having an equal voice regardless of differences in wealth and population." (Id., p. 307-8.)

PART I.—GENERAL.

Legislative Power.

1. The legislative power⁵² of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament⁵³, which shall consist of the Queen, a Senate, and a House of Representatives, and which is hereinafter called "The Parliament," or "The Parliament of the Commonwealth."

UNITED STATES.—All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a congress of the United States, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives.—Const., Art. I., sec. 1

CANADA.—There shall be one Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 17.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—The clause in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was in substantially the same form. The clause as introduced at the Adelaide session, 1897, substituted "States Assembly" for "Senate," but in Committee, on Mr. Walker's motion, the name "Senate" was restored. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 480-2.) Mr. Higgins proposed "National Assembly" in place of "House of Representatives," and Mr. Symon proposed "House of Commons," but both suggestions were negatived. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 483, 625-9, 1189.) At the Sydney session, suggestions of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, to omit "Federal" and to substitute "House of Assembly" for "House of Representatives," were negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], p. 253.) At the Melbourne session, after the fourth report, "power" was substituted for "powers."

Legislation consists in the making of laws. It is contrasted with the Executive power, whose office is to enforce the law, and with the Judicial power which deals with the interpretation and application of the law in particular cases. "The legislative power of the Commonwealth," referred to in this section, means the legislative power in respect of matters limited and defined in the Constitution; or, in the words of the corresponding section of the United States Constitution, it means "the legislative power herein granted." The legislative power so granted and vested in the Federal Parliament does not exhaust the whole of the quasi-sovereign authority of the Commonwealth. A residuum of power continues vested in the States. What is not granted to the federal government and what is not possessed by the States is reserved to the people of the Commonwealth, and may at any time be brought into action by the provision for amendment of the Constitution of the Commonwealth. By the process of amendment further legislative power may be assigned to the Federal Parliament. That Parliament will possess only such authority as is expressly, or by necessary implication, conferred upon it by the Constitution, as it stands, or by amendments which may hereafter be incorporated into and become part of the Constitution.

The power of the Federal Parliament can only be found by searching through the federal constitutional instrument. It has no scrap or particle of authority except such as can be discovered or inferred somewhere within the document. A general enumeration of the legislative powers of the Parliament is given in section 51 of the Constitution. That, however, is not the only section in which legislative power is conferred. Numerous sections may be referred to, in which law-making authority is embedded. Thus every section beginning with the words or containing the words "until the parliament otherwise provides" contains a grant of legislative power. Other sections not so plainly identifiable are of the same effect; such as sec. 27—the Parliament may alter the number of members of the House of Representatives; Chapter III.—the Parliament may create inferior federal courts and make other judiciary arrangements; sec. 94—the Parliament may distribute the surplus revenue; sec. 102—the Parliament may forbid preferences and discriminations by States; sec. 104—the Parliament may take over the public debts of the States; Chapter VI.—The Parliament may admit new States, govern territories, and alter the limits of States with the consent thereof.

§ 53. "Federal Parliament."

THE QUEEN.—The Federal Parliament consists of the Queen, the Senate, and the House of Representatives. This is a statutory recognition of the Queen as a constituent part of Parliament. In the British Constitution, and in most of the colonial constitutions, the King or Queen for the time being has up to the present been recognized in form and in theory, at least, as the principal legislator, if not the sole legislator, acting by and with the consent of the parliamentary bodies. For over three hundred years every Act of Parliament passed in England has begun with the well-known formula "Be it enacted by the King's (Queen's) most excellent Majesty by and with the advice and consent," &c. In the Australian Constitutional Acts, 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76, and 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, the legislative power was vested in the Governor by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council, &c. In the subsequent constitutions of the self-governing Australian colonies (1855) the power of legislation was conferred upon the Queen "by and with the advice and consent of the said Council and Assembly." In the Constitution of the Commonwealth the old fiction that the occupant of the throne was the principal legislator, as expressed in the above formula, has been disregarded; and the ancient enacting words will hereafter be replaced by words more in harmony with the practice and reality of constitutional government. The Queen, instead of being represented as the principal or sole legislator, is now plainly stated to be one of the co-ordinate constituents of the Parliament. Consequently, federal legislation will begin with such mandatory words as "Be it enacted by the Queen, the Senate, and the House of Representatives," or, "Be it enacted by the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia."

It would not be correct to say that the Queen's share in the exercise of federal legislative authority will be altogether formal and nominal. As regards matters of purely Australian policy, no doubt the Governor-General, as representative of the Queen, will be guided by the advice of the federal administration, as to whether he should, in the Queen's name, assent to a proposed law passed by both Houses. But if he has reason to believe that any proposed law comes within a class of bills to which, in his discretion as the Queen's representative, he ought not to assent, he will reserve the proposed law for the Queen's pleasure. A Bill so reserved will not have any force unless and until it receives the Queen's assent within two years from the day on which it was presented to the Governor-General (sec. 60). If the Governor-General assents to a proposed law in the Queen's name, and the Imperial Government find that it is contrary to an Imperial Act applicable to the Commonwealth, or that it is in excess of the legislative power possessed by the Federal Parliament, or that it is inconsistent with Her Majesty's treaty obligations, Her Majesty may be advised to disallow such law, within one year from the Governor-General's assent. (Secs. 58 and 59.)

"The right of the Crown, as the supreme executive authority of the empire, to control all legislation which is enacted in the name of the Crown, in any part of the Queen's dominion, is self-evident and unquestionable. In the mother country, the personal and direct exercise of this prerogative has fallen into disuse. But eminent statesmen, irrespective of party, and who represent the ideas of our own day, have concurred in asserting that 'it is a fundamental error to suppose that the power of the Crown to reject laws has consequently ceased to exist.' The authority of the Crown, as a constituent part of the legislative body, still remains; although, since the establishment of parliamentary government, the prerogative has been constitutionally exercised in a different way. But, in respect to the colonies, the royal veto upon legislation has always been an active and not a dormant power. The reason of this is obvious. A colony is but a part of the empire, occupying a subordinate position in the realm. No colonial legislative body is competent to pass a law which is at variance with, or repugnant to, any Imperial statute which extends in its operation to the particular colony. Neither may a colonial legislature exceed the bounds of its assigned jurisdiction, or limited powers. Should such an excess of authority be assumed, it becomes the duty of the Crown to veto, or disallow, the illegal or unconstitutional enactment. This duty should be fulfilled by the Crown, without reference to the conclusions arrived at in respect to the legality of a particular enactment, by any legal tribunal. It would be no adequate protection to the public, against erroneous and unlawful legislation on the part of a colonial legislature, that a decision of a court of law had pronounced the same to be ultra vires. An appeal might be taken against this decision, and the question carried to a higher court. Pending its ultimate determination, the public interests might suffer. Therefore, whenever it is clear to the advisers of the Crown that there has been an unlawful exercise of power by a legislative body, it becomes their duty to recommend that the royal prerogative should be invoked to annul the same." (Todd, 1st ed., pp. 125-6; 2nd ed., p. 155.)

THE BICAMERAL SYSTEM.—The Senate and the House of Representatives compose the two Chambers, according to what is generally described as the Bicameral System. Apart from the philosophical and practical arguments in favour of a two-chambered legislature as against a single-chambered legislature, a political union on the federal plan could not have been accomplished without the constitution of two Houses to represent the composite elements of the union.

“Theory and practice both proclaim that in a single House there is danger of a legislative despotism.” (James Wilson, in the American Federal Convention, 16th June, 1787.)

“We may say that modern constitutional law has settled firmly upon the bicameral system in the legislature, with substantial parity of powers in the two Houses, except in dealing with the budget; and that, in the control of the finances, a larger privilege is regularly confided to the more popular House, i.e., the House least removed in its origin from universal suffrage and direct election.” (Burgess, Political Sc., II., p. 106.)

“A single body of men is a ways in danger of adopting hasty and one-sided views, of accepting facts upon insufficient tests, of being satisfied with incomplete generalizations, and of mistaking happy phrases for sound principles. Two legislative bodies do not always escape these crude and one-sided processes and results, but they are far more likely to do so than is a single body. There is a sort of natural and healthy rivalry between the two bodies, which causes each to subject the measures proceeding from the other to a careful scrutiny, and a destructive criticism, even though the same party may be in a majority in both. In this conflict of views between the two houses lies, in fact, the only safe-guard against hasty and ill-digested legislation when the same party is in majority in both houses. A disagreement between the majorities in such a case is far more likely, also, to lead to a deeper generalization of principle than when the struggle is between the majority and the minority in each house; since the majority in each house will be much more inclined to look into the real merits of the question in the former than in the latter instance, and will come to a decision far more independent of partizanship.” (Burgess, Political Sc., II., pp. 106-7.)

“The necessity of a double, independent deliberation is thus the fundamental principle of the bicameral system in the construction of the legislature. A legislature of one chamber inclines too much to radicalism. One of three chambers or more would incline too much to conservatism. The true mean between conservatism and progress, and therefore the true interpretation of the common consciousness at each particular moment, will be best secured by the legislature of two chambers. There is another reason for this system, which, though less philosophic, is fully as practical. It is that two chambers are necessary to preserve the balance of power between the legislative and executive departments. The single-chamber legislature tends to subject the executive to its will. It then introduces into the administration a confusion which degenerates into anarchy. The necessity of the state then produces the military executive, who subjects the legislature to himself. History so often presents these events in this sequence, that we cannot refrain from connecting them as cause and effect. The two chambers, on the other hand, are a support in the first place to the executive power, and therefore in the second place to the legislature. By preventing legislative usurpation in the beginning, the bicameral legislature avoids executive usurpation in the end.” (Id., p. 107.)

Governor-General.

2. A Governor-General⁵⁴ appointed by the Queen shall be Her Majesty's Representative in the Commonwealth, and shall have and may exercise in the Commonwealth during the Queen's pleasure⁵⁵, but subject to this Constitution, such powers and functions of the Queen⁵⁶ as Her Majesty may be pleased to assign to him.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 2 Chap. I. of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“The Queen may, from time to time, appoint a Governor-General, who shall be Her Majesty's representative in the Commonwealth, and who shall have and may exercise in the Commonwealth during the Queen's pleasure, and subject to the provisions of this Constitution, such powers and functions as the Queen may think fit to assign to him.”

In Committee, Sir George Grey proposed to make the clause read “There shall be a Governor-General,” with the intention of making the Governor-General elective. This, after debate, was negated by 35 votes to 3. Mr. Baker proposed to insert, after “functions,” the words “as are contained in Schedule B hereto, and such other powers and functions as are not inconsistent therewith.” He urged that the clause, as it stood made the royal instructions part of the Constitutional law of the Commonwealth; and though he was not prepared at present to define the powers of the Governor-General, he wished to affirm the principle that they should be contained in the Constitution. Mr. Deakin and Dr. Cockburn thought that the best means of securing Mr. Baker's object would be to state on the face of the Constitution that the Governor-General should always act on the advice of his Ministers. Mr. Wrixon thought that if they were careful, in the Executive Chapter, to thoroughly establish responsible Government, they might let this clause go. Mr. Baker finally withdrew his amendment. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891] pp. 560-78.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced in the same words, except that the powers exercisable by the Governor-General were defined to be "such powers and functions of the Queen as Her Majesty may think fit to assign to him." Mr. Glynn, lest these words might revive dormant or dead prerogatives, moved to add "and capable of being constitutionally exercised as part of the prerogative of the Crown" This was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 629.)

At the Sydney session, Mr. Reid suggested that the clause be postponed. Mr. Barton agreed, saying "Some question may arise about the clause, which I do not like to indicate at present; but the Committee may take my word for it that it will be wise to postpone it now." (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897] pp. 253-4.) Subsequently, as a drafting amendment, the clause was altered to read:—"A Governor-General appointed by the Queen shall be," &c. After the fourth report, the words "the provisions of" were omitted.

§ 54. "A Governor-General."

"The governor of a colony constitutes the only political link connecting the colony with the mother country. So far as regards the internal administration of his government, he is merely a constitutional sovereign acting through his advisers: interfering with their policy or their patronage, if at all, only as a friend and impartial councillor. But whenever any question is agitated touching the interests of the mother country—such, for instance, as the imposition of customs duties, or the public defence—his functions as an independent officer are called at once into play. He must see that the mother country receives no detriment. In this duty he cannot count on aid from his advisers: they will consult the interests either of the colony or of their own popularity; he may often have to act in opposition to them, either by interposing his veto on enactments or by referring those enactments for the decision of the home government. But for these purposes the constitution furnishes him with no public officers to assist him in council or execution, or to share his responsibility. The home government looks to him alone." (Merivale's Lectures on Colonization, 1861, p. 649.)

"Under responsible government a Governor becomes the image, in little, of a constitutional king, introducing measures to the legislature, conducting the executive, distributing patronage, in name only, while all these functions are in reality performed by his councillors. And it is a common supposition that his office is consequently become one of parade and sentiment only. There cannot be a greater error. The functions of a colonial Governor under responsible government are (occasionally) arduous and difficult in the extreme. Even in the domestic politics of the colony, his influence as a mediator between extreme parties and controller of extreme resolutions, as an independent and dispassionate adviser, is far from inconsiderable, however cautiously it may be exercised. But the really onerous part of his duty consists in watching that portion of colonial politics which touches on the connection with the mother country. Here he has to reconcile, as well as he can, his double function as governor responsible to the Crown, and as a constitutional head of an executive controlled by his advisers. He has to watch and control, as best he may, those attempted infringements of the recognized principles of the connection which carelessness or ignorance, or deliberate intention, or mere love of popularity, may from time to time originate. And this duty, of peculiar nicety, he must perform alone. . . . His responsible ministers may (and probably will) entertain views quite different from his own. And the temptation to surround himself with a camarilla of special advisers, distinct from those ministers, is one which a governor must carefully resist. It may, therefore, be readily inferred, that to execute the office well requires no common abilities, and I must add that the occasion has called forth these abilities." (Id., p. 666.)

“The office of Governor tends to become—in the most emphatic sense of the term—the link which connects the mother country and the colony, and his influence the means by which harmony of action between the local and Imperial authorities is to be preserved. From his independent and impartial position, the opinion of a Governor must needs have great weight in the colonial councils; while he is free to constitute himself, in an especial manner, the patron of those larger and higher interests—as of education, and of moral and material progress in all its branches—which, unlike the contests of party, unite, instead of dividing, the members of the body-politic.” (Lord Elgin [1854], cited Todd's Parl. Gov. in Col., p. 809, 2nd ed.)

“The Governor-General of Canada is the representative of the Queen, and the highest authority in a dominion vast in extent, occupied by several millions of people, comprising within itself various provinces recently brought together which can only knit into a mature and lasting whole by wise and conciliatory administration. Nor is the position insulated. The Governor-General is continually called upon to act on questions affecting international relations with the United States. The person who discharges such exalted functions ought to possess not only sound judgment and wide experience, but also an established public reputation. He should be qualified both to exercise a moderating influence among the different provinces composing the union, and also to bear weight in his relations with the British minister at Washington and with the authorities of the great neighbouring republic.” (Despatch by the Duke of Buckingham, Secretary of State for the Colonies [1868], explaining the reasons of the Imperial Government for advising the Queen to refuse assent to a bill passed by the Dominion Parliament to reduce the salary of the Governor-General. Cited, Todd, p. 810, 2nd ed.)

“Colonial Governors invariably hold office during the pleasure of the Crown; but their period of service in a colony is usually limited to six years from the assumption of their duties therein; although, at the discretion of the Crown, a Governor may be re-appointed for a further term. The rule which limits the term of service of a Governor to six years was established principally for the purpose of ensuring in Governors the utmost impartiality of conduct, by disconnecting them from fixed relations with the colony over which they are appointed to preside. It was first made applicable to all British colonies by a circular despatch from Mr. Secretary Huskisson, issued in May, 1828, as follows:—‘It shall for the future be understood that, at the expiration of six years, a Governor of a colony shall, as a matter of course, retire from his government, unless there should be some special reasons for retaining him there; and that the way should thus be opened for the employment of others, who may have claims to the notice of His Majesty's government.’” (Todd, 2nd ed., pp. 122-3.)

§ 56. “Powers and Functions of the Queen.”

Section 2 of the Constitution is the same in substance as section 2 ch. I. of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. When it was first proposed in 1891, strong exception was taken to it and other sections relating to the Governor-General on the ground that they would confer extraordinary and enormous powers on the Governor-General, far in excess of any authority previously conferred on any governor in these colonies. Subsequent discussion showed that this contention was untenable.

During the progress of Provincial Government in the Australian colonies, two propositions have been suggested as explaining the position and attributes of the Governor of a Constitutional colony. One proposition has been that the Governor, as the Representative of the Queen, is vested with authority defined and limited, partly by the statute law establishing the Queen's Government in the colony, partly by the letters patent constituting the office of Governor, partly by the commission appointing him to the office, and finally by the royal instructions communicated to him by the Secretary of State on behalf of Her Majesty. (Anson's Law and Custom of the Constitution, vol. ii., p. 260.) The other view has been that the Governor of a colony, in which the system known as Responsible Government exists, is a local constitutional ruler, vested with authority defined or necessarily implied by the statute law establishing the Queen's Government in the colony, and vested thereby with all the prerogatives of the Crown reasonably necessary for the exercise of the proper functions of government; that the responsible ministers of such a colony possess, by virtue of that law, the power to advise the representative of the Crown to do any act which it would be competent for the legislature of the colony to sanction, and which ordinarily is, or under special circumstances may become, reasonably necessary to its existence as a body constituted by law, or for the proper exercise of the functions which it is intended to execute. (Per Higinbotham, C.J., in Ah Toy v. Musgrove [1888], 14-V.L.R. p 295-6.) A similar contention was raised in the year in which that case was decided in Victoria by the Government of Ontario, to the effect that the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province was entitled, virtute officii, to exercise all the prerogatives of the Crown incident to executive authority in matters over which the provincial legislature had jurisdiction, in the same manner as, and to the same extent that the Governor-General was entitled, virtute officii, to exercise all prerogatives incident to executive authority in matters within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. (Ontario Sess. Pap., 1888, No. 37, pp. 20-2.) The same doctrine was mooted in the Canadian courts on the hearing of the pardoning power case. (Attorney-General of Canada v. Attorney-General of Ontario, 22 Ont. Rep. 222; 19 Ont. App. Rep. 31. Cited, A. H. F. Lefroy, Law Quarterly Review, July, 1899, p. 283.)

In the construction of the powers and functions of the Governor-General of the Commonwealth no such difficulties and ambiguities as were discussed in Ah Toy v. Musgrove need arise. The principal and most important of his powers and functions, legislative as well as executive, are expressly conferred on him by the terms of the Constitution itself. Among these may be mentioned: the appointment of the times for holding the Sessions of Parliament; the prorogation of the Parliament; the dissolution of the House of Representatives (sec. 4); the dissolution of the Senate and of the House of Representatives simultaneously (sec. 57); the convening of a joint sitting of the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives (sec. 57); the assent in the name of the Queen to Bills passed by the Federal Houses; the withholding of the Queen's assent to such Bills; the reservation of Bills for the Queen's pleasure; the recommendation of amendments to be made in Bills (sec. 58); the exercise of the Executive power of the Commonwealth (sec. 61); the appointment of political officers to administer departments of state of the Commonwealth (sec. 64); the command of the naval and military forces of the Commonwealth (sec. 68); and generally, "in respect of matters which, under this Constitution, pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, all powers and functions which at the establishment of the Commonwealth are vested in the Governor of a colony" (sec. 70). These are powers and functions vested in the Governor-General by statute, to be exercised by him in accordance with the recognized principles of Responsible Government. The point to emphasize is, that they are legislative and executive powers and functions conferred on the Governor-General, not by Royal authority, but by statutory authority. (See Note § 60.)

The section now under consideration authorizes the Governor-General to exercise such powers and functions as Her Majesty may be pleased to assign to him. These powers and functions, however, must not be confused with the statutory authority and statutory duties to which reference has been made, relating to the Government of the Commonwealth, expressly specified in and expressly conferred on the Governor-General by the Constitution. The powers and functions contemplated by this section relate either to matters subordinate and ancillary to the statutory authority and statutory duties enumerated in the Constitution, or to matters connected with the Royal prerogative (that body of powers, rights, and privileges, belonging to the Crown at common law, such as the prerogative of mercy), or to authority vested in the Crown by Imperial statute law, other than the law creating the Constitution of the Commonwealth. Some of these powers and functions are of a formal character; some of them are purely ceremonial; others import the exercise of sovereign authority in matters of Imperial interests. The nature of some of the prerogative as well as formal and ceremonial power referred to, may be gathered from the extracts from letters patent and commissions relating to the office of Governor, which will be found further on. Among examples of powers relating to matters of Imperial interests the following may be suggested: the observance of the relations during peace, or in time of war, of foreign States to Great Britain, so far as they may be affected by the indirect relations of such foreign States to the Commonwealth; the treaty rights and obligations of the Crown; the treatment of belligerent and neutral ships in the waters of the Commonwealth in times of war; the control of Her Majesty's Imperial naval and military forces within the limits of the Commonwealth. (Higinbotham, C.J., in Ah Toy v. Musgrove [1888], 14 V.L.R., 350.)

RESPONSIBILITY OF GOVERNORS.—Reference may here be made to two leading cases in which the powers, privileges, and immunities of colonial Governors were considered. In Mostyn v. Fabrigas, [1775], 1 Cowp. 161-172, 2 W. Bl. 929, Lord Mansfield held that a Governor of a colony is in the nature of a Viceroy. This dictum, however, has not been generally acquiesced in, and it is now understood that Mostyn v. Fabrigas simply decided that Governor Mostyn was liable to be sued in England for personal wrongs done by him, whilst he was Governor of Minorca. In the case of Musgrave v. Pulido [1879], 5 App. Cas. 102, Pulido, the charterer of a schooner, sued Sir Anthony Musgrave, the Governor of Jamaica, to recover damages from him for an alleged act of trespass committed by him in seizing and detaining the schooner at Kingston. The defendant pleaded to the jurisdiction of the Court, in effect alleging that he was Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief of the island of Jamaica, and that the acts complained of were done by him as Governor of the island, and in the exercise of his reasonable discretion as such. The plea did not aver, even generally, that the seizure of the plaintiff's ship was an act which the defendant was empowered to do as Governor, nor even that it was an act of state. It was held that a Governor of a colony (in ordinary cases) cannot be regarded as Viceroy; nor can it be assumed that he possesses general sovereign power. His authority is derived from his commission, and is limited to the powers thereby expressly or impliedly entrusted to him. It is within the province of municipal courts to determine whether any exercise of power by a Governor is within the limits of his authority, and, therefore, an act of state. On these grounds it was decided that the plea was not a sufficient answer to the action.

MODE OF APPOINTMENT.—The constitutional position of the Governor-General, as a component of the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, will be considered in detail in our notes to Chapter II. (§ 271). Under this section allusion can appropriately be made (1) to the practice which originally prevailed in connection with the creation of the office of Colonial Governor; the method of appointment to such office, and the assignment of official powers and functions of a stereotyped character to the holder of the office for the time being; and (2) to the changes which, in recent years, have been made in the direction of emancipating the Governor from the restraint and embarrassment of antiquated instructions, and enabling him to act as a constitutional ruler, in accordance with the recognized principles of Responsible Government.

Colonial Governors were formerly appointed by letters patent, under the Great Seal, which defined the scope of their powers, duties, and functions. Pending the preparation of the authoritative instruments it was the practice, before 1875, to issue a minor commission under the Royal Sign Manual and Signet, to a new Governor, authorizing him to act under the commission and instructions given to his predecessor in the same office. The validity of this practice having been doubted, the Imperial Government decided in 1875 to abandon it, and thereafter, as soon as practicable, to make permanent provision by letters patent under the Great Seal in every colony of the empire for the constitution of the office of Governor therein, and it was further decided to fill the office as it became vacant, by appointment to be made, by special commission, under the Royal Sign Manual and Signet, which commission should recite the letters patent, and direct the appointee to fulfil the duties of the office according to the permanent instructions issued in connection therewith. (Todd, Parl. Gov. in Col., 2nd ed., p. 109.) There are therefore, now, three important documents associated with the office of Governor:—

- (1.) The Letters-Patent.
- (2.) The Commission.
- (3.) The Instructions.

The Letters Patent.—By the letters-patent constituting the office of Governor in each colony, the powers and duties of the Governor were formerly defined as follows :—

- (i.) To do and to execute all things that belong to the said command and the trust reposed in him according to the Letters-patent, Commission and Instructions.
- (ii.) To keep and use the Public Seal of the Colony.
- (iii.) To appoint an Executive Council.
- (iv.) To make and execute grants of land according to law.
- (v.) To appoint Judges, Commissioners, Justices, Ministers, and other officers.
- (vi.) To grant a pardon to any offender who has committed a crime and to remit fines and forfeitures.
- (vii.) To remove or suspend from office any person upon sufficient cause appearing.
- (viii.) To summon, prorogue, or dissolve any legislative body established within the colony.
- (ix.) To grant licenses for marriages, letters of administration, probate of wills, and to deal with the custody and management of idiots, lunatics, and their estates.
- (x.) To appoint a deputy to act in his occasional absence from the colony.
- (xi.) Before entering on the duties of his office to cause his commission to be read and published, and to take the Oath of Allegiance and the usual oath for the due execution of the office of governor and for the due and impartial administration of justice.

The Commission.—This document contains the appointment to the office constituted by the letters-patent, and the usual form of it is as follows :—

Draft of a Commission passed under the Royal Sign Manual and Signet, to be Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Colony of and its Dependencies.

Dated.....

VICTORIA R.

VICTORIA, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, Empress of India : To Our trusty and well-beloved.....

Greeting :

We do by this Our Commission under Our Sign Manual and Signet appoint you, the said....., until Our further pleasure shall be signified, to be Our Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over Our Colony ofand its Dependencies during Our Will and pleasure, with all and singular the powers and authorities granted to the Governor of Our said Colony in Our Letters-patent under the Great Seal of Our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland constituting the Office of Governor, bearing date at Westminster, the.....day of.....in the.....year of Our Reign, which said powers and authorities We do hereby authorize you to exercise and perform, according to such Orders and Instructions as Our said Governor for the time being hath already or may hereafter receive from Us. And for so doing this shall be your Warrant.

And We do hereby command all and singular Our Officers, Ministers, and loving subjects in Our said Colony and its Dependencies, and all others whom it may concern, to take notice hereof, and to give their ready obedience accordingly. Given at Our Court at Windsor, this.....day of.....in the.....year of Our Reign.

By Her Majesty's Command.

The Instructions.—The powers and functions of the governor partially enumerated in the letters-patent were formerly more fully detailed in the Instructions, and may be summarized as follows:—

- (i.) To administer the oath of allegiance to persons holding office or place of trust.
- (ii.) To communicate these instructions to the Executive Council of the Colony.
- (iii.) To summon the Executive Council for the despatch of business.
- (iv.) To preside at the meetings of the Executive Council.
- (v.) To see that a full and exact record is kept of the votes and proceedings of the Executive Council.
- (vi.) To consult the Executive Council in all cases, excepting in cases where the Queen's service would sustain material prejudice by consulting the Council, or when the matters to be decided should be too unimportant to require their advice or too urgent to admit of their advice being given within the time available; provided that in such urgent cases he should inform the Executive Council, as soon as possible, of the measures adopted.
- (vii.) To act in opposition to the advice which may in any case be given by the Executive Council, provided that in such case he should fully report to the Secretary of State for the Colonies any such proceeding, with the grounds and reasons thereof.
- (viii.) To transmit to the Secretary of State for the Colonies twice in each year a copy of the minutes of the Council for the preceding half-year.
- (ix.) To assent to or dissent from or reserve for the Queen's pleasure such bills as may be passed by the colonial parliament subject to certain rules—
 - (a) That each different matter be provided for by a different law without intermixing different matters in the same Act having no relation to one another.
 - (b) That no clauses be inserted in an Act foreign to the title of such Act.
 - (c) That no perpetual clause be made part of any temporary law.
- (x.) To reserve for the Queen's pleasure bills dealing with the following:—
 - (a) Divorce.
 - (b) Grants to the Governor.
 - (c) Bills affecting the currency.
 - (d) Bills imposing differential duties other than as allowed by the Australian Colonies Duties Act, 1873.
 - (e) Bills apparently inconsistent with treaty obligations.
 - (f) Bills interfering with the discipline of the land and sea forces of the Colony.
 - (g) Bills of an extraordinary nature and importance prejudicially affecting—(1) The Royal prerogative, or (2) the rights and property of British subjects not residing in the Colony, or (3) the trade and shipping of the United Kingdom and its Dependencies.
 - (h) Bills containing provisions to which the Royal assent has been once refused.
- (xi.) To transmit abstracts of all laws assented to by the Governor or reserved for the Queen's pleasure, with explanatory observations.
- (xii.) To transmit fair copies of the journals and minutes of the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament "which you are to require from the clerks or other proper officer in that behalf."

- (xiii.) After reciting the Commission authorizing and empowering a Governor to grant a pardon to any offender the instructions formerly proceeded as follows :—

“ Now, we do hereby direct and enjoin you to call upon the judge presiding at the trial of any offender who may from time to time be condemned to suffer death by the sentence of any court within our said colony, to make to you a written report of the case of such offender, and such report of the said judge shall by you be taken into consideration at the first meeting thereafter which may be conveniently held of our said Executive Council, where the said judge shall be specially summoned to attend, and you shall not pardon or reprove any such offender as aforesaid unless it shall appear to you expedient so to do upon receiving the advice of our Executive Council therein, but in all such cases you are to decide either to extend or to withhold a pardon or reprove, according to your own deliberate judgment, whether the members of our said Executive Council concur therein or otherwise ; entering, nevertheless, on the minutes of the said Council a minute of your reasons at length, in case you should decide any such question in opposition to the judgment of the majority of the members thereof.”

- (xiv.) To promote religion and education among the native inhabitants of the colony, and to protect them from violence and injustice.
- (xv.) Not on any pretence whatever to quit the colony without having first obtained official leave from the Queen.

The new practice above referred to (p. 391) was framed to meet the views of Canada, but was first brought into operation in February, 1877, on the occasion of the appointment of Sir H. Bartle Frere to the office of Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Cape of Good Hope, and it was followed in April, 1877, on the appointment of Sir W. F. D. Jervois as Governor and Commander-in-Chief of South Australia. The instructions accompanying the letters-patent in each of these cases were, in the main, an embodiment of the instructions previously issued for the guidance of Governors, no alteration in substance then being made. Indeed, they were practically the same in effect as those issued to the Governor of New South Wales in the year 1829, when that colony ceased to be a military settlement, and acquired a rudimentary form of civil government. A comparison of the instructions issued to Australian Governors up to the year 1887, with the commission and instructions issued to Sir Charles A. Fitzroy as Governor-in-Chief of New South Wales in the year 1850, would show that no substantial alteration had been made during that interval of 37 years. (Chief Justice Higinbotham's letter to Sir Henry Holland, 28 Feb., 1887 ; Professor Morris, Memoir of George Higinbotham, p. 211.)

For some time previous to the initiation of the new practice, the Government of the Dominion of Canada had been in communication with the Secretary of State for the Colonies on the subject of an alteration in the terms of the royal instructions.

“ It was contended by Mr. Blake on behalf of the Dominion that the peculiar position of Canada, in relation to the mother country, entitled her to special consideration, and that the existing forms, while they might be eminently suited to other colonies, were inapplicable and objectionable in her case. For Canada is not merely a colony or province of the empire, she is also a Dominion, composed of seven provinces federally united under an imperial charter or Act of Parliament, which expressly recites that her constitution is to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.” (Todd, Parl. Gov. in the Col., 2nd ed., p. 110.)

“ As a foundation principle, necessary to be asserted and maintained in any instrument which might be issued for the purpose of defining the powers of a Governor-General in Canada, Mr. Blake contended that it ought to be clearly understood that, ‘ as a rule, the governor does and must act through the agency (and upon the advice) of ministers ; and ministers must be responsible for such action ;’ save ‘ only in the rare instances in which owing to the existence of substantial Imperial as distinguished from Canadian interests, it is considered that full freedom of action is not vested in the Canadian people.’” (Id., p. 111.)

“ Mr. Blake's contention, ‘ that there is no dependency of the British Crown which is entitled to so full an application of the principles of constitutional freedom as the Dominion of Canada,’ was admitted to be correct by her Majesty's Government ; and the official instruments made use of, in the appointment, on the 7th October, 1878, of the Marquis of Lorne to be Governor-General of Canada, clearly indicate, in their substantial omissions, as well as in their positive directions, the larger measure of self-government thenceforth conceded to the new Dominion. This increase of power, to be exercised by the government and Parliament of Canada, was not merely relatively greater than that now enjoyed by other colonies of the empire, but absolutely more than had been previously intrusted to Canada itself, during the administration of any former Governor-General." (Id., p. 116.)

The Canadian Letters-Patent.—By letters-patent, 5th October, 1878, the office of Governor-General of Canada was formally constituted, and the Governor-General was thereby authorized and commanded by the Queen:—

- (i.) To do and to execute all things that belong to the said command and the trust reposed in him according to the Letters-patent, Commission and Instructions.
- (ii.) To keep and use the Public Seal of the Colony.
- (iii.) To appoint an Executive Council.
- (iv.) To remove or suspend from office any person holding any office under the Crown in Canada, so far as the same may lawfully be done.
- (v.) To exercise all powers lawfully belonging to the Crown in respect of the summoning, proroguing, or dissolving the parliament of Canada.
- (vi.) To appoint any person or persons, jointly or severally, to be his deputy or deputies within any part of Canada, to exercise such of the powers or functions of the Governor-General as he may please to assign to him or them.

The Canadian Commission.—On 7th October, 1878, the Marquis of Lorne was appointed by Royal Commission to be the Governor-General of Canada. This Commission recited the letters-patent aforesaid and conferred the office upon Lord Lorne with all the powers and authorities belonging to it, according to such orders and instructions as have already been, or may hereafter be, communicated to him from the sovereign; and commanded "all and singular our officers, ministers, and loving subjects in our said Dominion, and all others whom it may concern, to take due notice hereof, and give their ready obedience accordingly." (Todd, 2nd ed., p. 122.)

The Canadian Instructions.—The Royal Instructions accompanying the letters-patent constituting the office of Governor-General of Canada recited the letters-patent aforesaid and enjoined the Governor-General for the time being:—

- (i.) To cause his commission to be read and published in the presence of the Chief Justice or other judge of the Supreme Court, and of the members of the Dominion Privy Council, and to be duly sworn upon entering upon the duties of his office.
- (ii.) To administer, or cause to be administered, the necessary oaths to all persons who shall hold any office or place of trust in the Dominion.
- (iii.) To communicate these and any other instructions he may receive to the Dominion Privy Council.
- (iv.) To transmit to the Imperial Government copies of all laws assented to by him in the Queen's name, or reserved for signification of the Royal pleasure; with suitable explanatory observations and copies of the journals and proceedings of the Parliament of the Dominion.
- (v.) When any crime has been committed for which any offender might be tried within the Dominion, "to grant a pardon to any accomplice, not being the actual perpetrator of such crime, who shall give such information as shall lead to the conviction of the principal offender; and, further, to grant any offender convicted of any crime, in any court, or before any judge, justice, or magistrate, within our said Dominion, a pardon, either free or subject to lawful conditions, or any respite of the execution of the sentence of any such offender, for such period as to our said Governor-General may seem fit, and to remit any fines, penalties, or forfeitures which may become due, or payable to us. Provided always, that our said Governor-General shall not in any case, except where the offence has been of a political nature, make it a condition of any pardon or remission of sentence that the offender shall be banished from, or shall absent himself from, our said Dominion. And we do hereby direct and enjoin that our said Governor-General shall not pardon or relieve any such offender without first receiving, in capital cases, the advice of the Privy Council for our said Dominion, and in other cases, the advice of one, at least, of his ministers, and in any case in which such pardon or relieve might directly effect the interests of the empire, or of any country or place beyond the jurisdiction of the government of our said Dominion, our said Governor-General shall, before deciding as to either pardon or relieve, take those interests specially into his own personal consideration, in conjunction with such advice as aforesaid."

(vi.) Not to quit the Dominion without leave first obtained.

It will be seen that the Canadian Instructions differed in several material respects from those which were, at that time, applicable to other self-governing colonies, in which the old instructions remained unaltered for several years longer. One of the most prominent critics, and certainly the most uncompromising assailant, of the old instructions, was the Hon. Geo. Higinbotham, once Attorney-General of Victoria, and subsequently Chief Justice of that colony. In a letter, dated 28th February, 1887, addressed by him to the Right Hon. Sir Henry T. Holland, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, Chief Justice Higinbotham expressed and summarized the views which he had long held concerning the unconstitutionality of some of these instructions.

"The radical vice of the Governor's letters patent, commission and instructions, both public and private, appears to me to be this—that they studiously and persistently refuse to take note of the fundamental change made in the public laws of the Australian colonies by the Constitution Acts of 1854-5. In particular, they pretend to confer powers and authorities which have been already conferred with others by the Constitution Statutes; they decline to recognize the dual character of the Governor, and applying a misleading title to the advisers of the Governor in one of his two characters, they affect to ignore altogether the existence of responsible government. I will refer to particular clauses which present the most striking illustrations of a violation in these respects of constitutional law.

"Clause II. of the letters patent.—'We do hereby authorize, empower, and command our said Governor and Commander-in-Chief (hereinafter called the Governor) to do and execute all things that belong to his said office, according to the tenor of these our letters patent, and of such commission as may be issued to him under our sign manual and signet, and according to such instructions as may from time to time be given to him under our sign manual and signet, or by our order in our Privy Council, or by us through one of our principal Secretaries of State, and to such laws as are now or shall hereafter be in force in the colony.'

"This purports to grant, subject to limitations, certain authorities and powers already vested in the Governor by the Constitution Statute. The grant is, in my opinion, void, and the limitations and the commands founded thereon are also void and illegal.

"Clause VI. of instructions.—'In the exercise of the powers and authorities granted to the Governor by our said letters patent, he shall in all cases consult with the Executive Council, excepting only in cases which are of such a nature that, in his judgment, our service would sustain material prejudice by consulting the said Council thereupon, or when the matters to be decided are too unimportant to require their advice, or too urgent to admit of their advice being given by the time within which it may necessary for him to act in respect to any such matters—in all such urgent cases, he shall, at the earliest practical period, communicate to the said Council the measures which he may so have adopted, with the reasons thereof.'

'This is an instruction which a Governor does not, and cannot obey. The Executive Council, in the proper sense of this expression, has never been convened in Victoria. Like the Privy Council, it could not be convened, except by the direction of the Victorian Premier. If by the words 'Executive Council,' the 'Cabinet' is intended to be referred to, this instruction is unmeaning and void. It is, doubtless, the duty of the representative of the Sovereign to consult his advisers, and it is their duty to advise him in all matters connected with local affairs, but the duty in neither case springs from this royal instruction. If it be intended to direct the Governor to consult his advisers in matters connected with his duty as an officer of the Imperial Government, this is an indirect instruction, offensive in form and without either legal authority or means of enforcement, to Her Majesty's Ministers to do something which they are not required by their duty as Ministers of the Crown to do.

'Clause VII. of instructions.—'A Governor may act in the exercise of the powers and authorities granted to him by our said letters patent in opposition to the advice given to him by the members of the Executive Council, if he shall in any case deem it right to do so, but in any such case he shall fully report the matter to us by the first convenient opportunity, with the grounds and reasons of his action.'

'I think that this instruction can only be characterized as a distinct denial of the fundamental principle of the existing public law of Victoria. As a direct instigation to Her Majesty's representative to violate that law, it offers a grave indignity and conveys an unmistakable menace to him and to his advisers, who are here and elsewhere misnamed the Executive Council.

'Clause XI. of instructions.—'Whenever any offender shall have been condemned to suffer death by the sentence of any court, the Governor shall call upon the judge who presided at the trial to make to him a written report of the case of such offender, and shall cause such report to be taken into consideration at the first meeting thereafter which may be conveniently held of the Executive Council, and he may cause the said judge to be specially summoned to attend at such meeting and to produce his notes thereat. The Governor shall not pardon or reprieve any such offender unless it shall appear to him expedient so to do upon receiving the advice of the said Executive Council thereon; but in all such cases he is to decide either to extend or to withhold a pardon or a reprieve according to his own deliberate judgment, whether the members of the Executive Council concur therein or otherwise; entering nevertheless on the minutes of the said Executive Council a minute of his reasons at length in case he should decide such action in opposition to the judgment of the majority of members thereof.'

'This instruction presents a glaring instance of not less flagrant illegality. The prerogative of mercy is a prerogative essentially necessary to the administration of criminal law. The exercise of it in Victoria is therefore a matter in which the representative of the Crown can and ought to act solely upon the advice of his responsible advisers, and neither the Crown nor the Crown's Imperial advisers are legally competent to dictate or advise upon his action. By this instruction the Governor is personally ordered to call upon the judge to make to him a written report—an order which, if it were conveyed otherwise than through and by the advice of the Minister, it would be, I conceive, the duty of the judge to refuse to comply with. The Governor is further required to decide 'either to extend or to withhold a pardon or a reprieve, according to his own deliberate judgment, whether the members of the Executive Council concur therein or otherwise.' This unjust and cruel as well as illegal order is not obeyed, and could not be obeyed by any Governor in the only cases to which it could apply. It has been attempted to excuse this instruction on the ground that it is virtually obsolete, yet on two separate occasions long subsequent to the passing of the Australian Constitution Acts, the Colonial Office has expressed its approval of this instruction, and has repeated the injunction to the Governor to obey it.

'Clauses VIII. and X. of instructions.—VIII. 'In the execution of such powers as are vested in the Governor by law for assenting to or dissenting from or of reserving for the signification of our pleasure, bills which have been passed by the Legislature of the colony, he shall take care as far as may be practicable that in the passing of all laws each different matter be provided for by a different law without intermixing in one and the same law such things as have no proper relation to each other ; and that no clause be inserted in or annexed to any law which shall be foreign to what the title of such law imports, and that no perpetual clause be part of any temporary law.' X. 'The Governor is to take care that all laws assented to in our name or reserved for the signification of our pleasure thereon, shall, when transmitted by him, be fairly abstracted in the margins, and be accompanied, in such cases as may seem to him necessary, with such explanatory observations as may be required to exhibit the reasons and occasions for proposing such laws ; and shall also transmit fair copies of the journals and minutes of the proceedings of the legislative bodies of the colony, which he is to require from the clerks or other proper officers in that behalf of the said legislative bodies.'

"These clauses are not illegal because they relate to the reservation of bills for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure. I refer to them only as showing the almost contemptuous disrespect and want of consideration displayed by the Colonial Office towards Australian Parliaments and Imperial officers in Australia. To order a Governor to take care that in the passing of all laws each different matter shall be provided for by a different law may at one time have been proper and not unnecessary. Addressed, as the order indirectly is, to Legislatures consisting of two Houses of Parliament like the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of the various Australian colonies, it is an insult to all of those bodies. And it has proved on one occasion, at least, a cause of actual embarrassment to Her Majesty's Government in Victoria. When the Governor is ordered to require from the clerks in Parliament fair copies of the journals and minutes of the proceedings of the Legislative bodies, he is humiliated by being needlessly instructed to make a requirement which, if disputed, he could not enforce, and for the fulfilment of which he is in any and in every case indebted to the aid—which is, of course, never withheld—of a Minister of the Crown."

One of the immediate results of this important letter was that Sir Henry Holland, afterwards Lord Knutsford, consulted the Imperial law officers with reference to the points so forcibly raised by the Chief Justice, and in July, 1888, he re-drafted the instructions with a view of meeting many of the points brought under his notice and of bringing the instructions more into conformity with the existing state of things. Lord Knutsford went out of office in 1892, and one of his last official acts was the promulgation of the re-drafted royal instructions for the guidance of colonial governors. Referring to this important event, Professor Morris writes :—

"The improvement was enormous. For the first time Responsible Government is recognized. For the first time the Governor is instructed to accept the advice of his ministers, whereas all earlier editions seem to imply that he is to be careful about accepting such advice and ready to oppose them." (Professor Morris, Memoir of George Higinbotham, p. 202.)

"The measure of the victory with respect to Downing Street is to be found in the altered instructions. The Home law officers told Lord Knutsford that it was not illegal for governors to correspond with the Colonial Office ; but the tone of that office is not now the tone of Mr. Cardwell, nor of the Duke of Buckingham, but rather this ' involves no question calling for the intervention of the Imperial Government ; it is not one on which it seems to me incumbent to express an opinion.' Contrast the instructions to Sir Charles Darling, signed ' V. R.,' of June 23rd, 1863, with those published in the Victoria Government Gazette of September 2nd, 1892, signed, July 9th of that year, ' V. R. I.' The difference is enormous. The Victorian newspapers of that September commented on the change, and praised the wisdom of the Colonial Office in making it ; but no one remembered the Victorian politician whose persistent efforts were at last successful. That number of the Gazette was published only four months before his death." (Id. p. 229.)

The New Instructions.—The re-drafted instructions, approved by Her Majesty on the advice of Lord Knutsford, contained a complete recognition of the principle of responsible government, in form as well as in practice, in all self-governing colonies. All the old and obsolete provisions which were really only applicable to Crown colonies, and particularly those complained of by Chief Justice Higinbotham, were now eliminated. As portions of these new instructions will be the basis of the "powers and functions of the Queen" which may be assigned by Her Majesty to the Governor-General under sec. 2 of this constitution, they may be here appropriately inserted:—

- (i.) In these Our Instructions, unless inconsistent with the context, the term 'the Governor' shall include every person for the time being administering the Government of the Colony, and the term 'the Executive Council' shall mean the members of Our Executive Council for the Colony who are for the time being the responsible advisers of the Governor.
- (ii.) The Governor may, whenever he thinks fit, require any person in the public service to take the Oath of Allegiance, together with such other Oath or Oaths as may from time to time be prescribed by any Law in force in the Colony. The Governor is to administer such Oaths or cause them to be administered by some Public Officer of the Colony.
- (iii.) The Governor shall forthwith communicate these Our Instructions to the Executive Council, and likewise all such others, from time to time, as he shall find convenient for Our Service to impart to them.
- (iv.) The Governor shall attend and preside at the meetings of the Executive Council, unless prevented by some necessary or reasonable cause, and in his absence such member as may be appointed by him in that behalf, or in the absence of such member the senior member of the Executive Council actually present shall preside; the seniority of the members of the said Council being regulated according to the order of their respective appointments as members thereof.
- (v.) The Executive Council shall not proceed to the despatch of business unless duly summoned by authority of the Governor, nor unless two members at the least (exclusive of the Governor or of the member presiding) be present and assisting throughout the whole of the meetings at which any such business shall be despatched.
- (vi.) In the execution of the powers and authorities vested in him, the Governor shall be guided by the advice of the Executive Council, but if in any case he shall see sufficient cause to dissent from the opinion of the said Council he may act in the exercise of his said powers and authorities in opposition to the opinion of the Council, reporting the matter to Us without delay, with the reasons for his so acting.
- In any such case it shall be competent to any member of the said Council to require that there be recorded upon the Minutes of the Council the grounds of any advice or opinion that he may give upon the question.
- (vii.) The Governor shall not, except in the cases hereunder mentioned, assent in Our name to any Bill of any of the following classes:—

- (1.) Any Bill for the divorce of persons joined together in holy matrimony.
- (2.) Any Bill whereby any grant of land or money, or other donation or gratuity, may be made to himself.
- (3.) Any Bill affecting the currency of the Colony.
- (4.) Any Bill imposing differential duties (other than as allowed by the Australian Colonies' Duties Act, 1873).
- (5.) Any Bill the provisions of which shall appear inconsistent with obligations imposed upon Us by Treaty.
- (6.) Any Bill interfering with the discipline or control of Our forces in the Colony by land or sea.
- (7.) Any Bill of an extraordinary nature and importance, whereby Our prerogative or the rights and property of Our subjects not residing in the Colony, or the trade and shipping of the United Kingdom and its Dependencies, may be prejudiced.
- (8.) Any Bill containing provisions to which Our assent has been once refused, or which has been disallowed by Us.

Unless he shall have previously obtained Our Instructions upon such Bill, through one of Our Principal Secretaries of State, or unless such Bill shall contain a clause suspending the operation of such Bill until the signification in the Colony of Our pleasure thereupon, or unless the Governor shall have satisfied himself that an urgent necessity exists requiring that such Bill be brought into immediate operation, in which case he is authorized to assent in Our name to such Bill, unless the same shall be repugnant to the law of England, or inconsistent with any obligations imposed upon Us by Treaty. But he is to transmit to Us by the earliest opportunity the Bill so assented to, together with his reasons for assenting thereto.

- (viii.) The Governor shall not pardon or reprieve any offender without first receiving in capital cases the advice of the Executive Council, and in other cases the advice of one, at least, of his Ministers; and in any case in which such pardon or reprieve might directly affect the interests of our empire, or of any country or place beyond the jurisdiction of the Government of the colony, the Governor shall, before deciding as to either pardon or reprieve, take those interests specially into his own personal consideration in conjunction with such advice as aforesaid.
- (ix.) All commissions granted by the Governor to any persons to be Judges-Justices of the Peace, or other officers shall, unless otherwise provided by the law, be granted during pleasure only.
- (x.) The Governor shall not quit the colony without having first obtained leave from us for so doing under our Sign Manual and Signet, or through one of our principal Secretaries of State, except for the purpose of visiting the Governor of any neighbouring colony for periods not exceeding one month at any one time, nor exceeding in the aggregate one month for every year's service in the colony.
- (xi.) The temporary absence of the Governor for any period not exceeding one month shall not, if he have previously informed the Executive Council, in writing, of his intended absence, and if he have duly appointed a Deputy in accordance with our said letters-patent, be deemed a departure from the colony within the meaning of the said letters-patent.

V.R.I."

Special Instructions.—Every colonial governor, after his appointment to office, is subject to the control of the Crown, as an Imperial officer. In addition to the permanent and general instructions which he receives in connection with his commission, he may, from time to time, be charged with any further instructions, special or general, which the Crown may lawfully communicate to him under particular circumstances. The medium of communication between the sovereign and her representative in any British colony is the Secretary of State. (Todd, 2nd ed., p. 122.)

In the absence of special appointment, the governor of a British possession is also ex-officio Vice-Admiral thereof. (26 and 27 Vic. c. 24, sec. 3, and 30 and 31 Vic. c. 45, s. 4; repealed and re-enacted by the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, 53 and 54 Vic. c. 27, s. 10.)

Salary of Governor-General.

3. There shall be payable to the Queen out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the Commonwealth, for the salary of the Governor-General⁵⁷, an annual sum which, until the Parliament otherwise provides, shall be ten thousand pounds.

The salary of a Governor-General shall not be altered during his continuance in office.

UNITED STATES.—The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.—Const. (Art. II. sec. 1, 7).

SWITZERLAND.—The President of the Confederation and the other members of the Federal Council receive an annual salary from the Federal Treasury.—Const. (Art. 99).

CANADA.—Unless altered by the Parliament of Canada, the salary of the Governor-General shall be ten thousand pounds sterling money of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, and the same shall form the third charge thereon.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 105.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 3, Chap. I., of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“The annual salary of the Governor-General shall be fixed by the Parliament from time to time, but shall not be less than ten thousand pounds, and shall be payable to the Queen out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the Commonwealth. The salary of a Governor-General shall not be diminished during his continuance in office.”

In Committee, Sir Harry Atkinson moved the omission of the words "but shall not be less than £10,000;" but after discussion he withdrew the amendment. Sir John Bray moved to omit "but shall not be less than," and insert "and until so fixed shall be." This was negatived by 24 votes to 12. An amendment by Sir George Grey, to substitute "altered" for "diminished," was also negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 578-85.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced as follows:—"The annual salary of the Governor-General shall be ten thousand pounds, and shall be payable to the Queen out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the Commonwealth." In Committee, on the motion of Mr. Higgins, the words "Until the Parliament otherwise provides" were prefixed. An amendment by Mr. Howe, to substitute "seven" for "ten," was negatived. On Mr. Barton's motion, the second paragraph was added. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 629-33.)

At the Sydney session, suggestions by the Legislative Assembly and Legislative Council of South Australia, to reduce the salary to £7,000 and £8,000 respectively, were negatived, as was also an amendment by Mr. Glynn to omit the second paragraph. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], p. 254.) Drafting amendments to the first paragraph brought it into its present shape.

§ 57. "Salary of the Governor-General."

"On May 22, 1868, at the close of the first session of Parliament of the new Dominion of Canada, an Act passed by the Senate and House of Commons 'to fix the salary of the Governor-General' was reserved for the consideration of Her Majesty's pleasure thereon. It was proposed, by this Act, to reduce the salary of the Governor-General from £10,000, at which rate it had been fixed by the Imperial Act of Union, in 1867 (subject to alteration by the Parliament of Canada), to £6,500. But on July 30, 1868, the Secretary of State for the Colonies notified Lord Monck (the Governor-General) that while it was 'with reluctance, and only on serious occasions, that the Queen's government can advise Her Majesty to withhold the royal sanction from a bill which has passed two branches of the Canadian Parliament,' yet that a regard for the interests of Canada, and a well-founded apprehension that a reduction in the salary of the Governor which would place the office, as far as salary is a standard of recognition, in the third class among colonial governments, obliged Her Majesty's Government to advise that this bill should not be permitted to become law. In accordance with the opinions entertained by the Imperial Government on this subject, and with the right to legislate thereon, which was expressly conferred upon the Parliament of Canada by the 105th section of the British North America Act, the Dominion Parliament, in 1869, re enacted, by their own authority, the clause of the Imperial statute which fixed the salary of the Governor-General at £10,000 sterling, the same to be payable out of the consolidated revenue of Canada. This Act was necessarily reserved, under the royal instructions: but it received the assent of Her Majesty in council on August 7, 1869. From this date, no further attempt has been made to reduce the salary of the Governor-General." (Todd, Parl. Gov. in the Col., 2nd ed., p. 177.)

"The present compensation of the President of the United States, as fixed by statute, is $50,000 per annum, together with the use, as a residence, of the executive mansion, and of the furniture and effects kept therein." (Burgess, Political Sc., II. p. 244.)

"I think we might trust the Federal Parliament with fixing the amount, and then, of course, there will be an after-clause that the salary of no Governor-General is to be changed during his term of office. That is only fair. But we might trust the Federal Parliament with saying from time to time how much salary should be paid to the Governor-General." (Mr. H. B. Higgins, Conv. Deb., Adel. [1897], p. 629.)

"I beg to say that the object of the Constitutional Committee was to lift this question of the salary of the Governor-General above that incessant nagging and criticism which has given rise to some of the most discreditable episodes in our political life. We have had in our various Parliaments all sorts of questions as to the value of a Governor, or the value of our connection with the British Crown, with a view to diminish his salary. The Governor-General is the only constitutional link we have between the mother-country and ourselves, and £10,000 is not too small a sum; indeed, everyone will admit that it is a fair salary. This is the salary of the President of the United States, and the object of the Constitutional Committee was to lift the office of the Governor-General, and the person himself, above the attacks to which I have referred—attacks which are made by persons who either despise the British Crown, or wish to subvert the position of the Governor-General. Under cover of these arguments, attacks are made upon the individuals who represent the Queen in the different colonies. As the Governor-General is to be a visible link between the British empire and ourselves, we should place him beyond the possibility of any trafficking being indulged in about the question of salary.^b (Mr. G. H. Reid, id., p. 629.)

“I feel as strongly as Mr. Reid does the undesirability of frequent attacks upon the Governor, or his salary, or his perquisites, or anything else that belongs to him; but I am afraid that liability to attack would not be at all lessened if people were disposed to make it by inserting this provision for a fixed salary. My own inclination is that the reverse would be the case, because if people were disposed to cast unpleasant aspersions upon the Governor-General they would be more likely to do so if they could not relieve any antagonistic feeling they had by reducing his salary or that of his successors. There is a great deal of human nature in man, and if people, however fair they might wish to be, felt they could not gratify in any other way the criticism they may wish to indulge in, they would indulge in it with a great deal more acerbity if they could not touch the salary of the Governor-General or his successor. We may very fairly leave it with the Federal Parliament we are going to constitute, and the men who will compose this Senate and House of Representatives, to deal fairly and honourably with the Governor-General and his salary.” (Mr. J. H. Symon, id., p. 630.)

Provisions relating to Governor-General.

4. The provisions of this Constitution relating to the Governor-General extend and apply to the Governor-General for the time being, or such person as the Queen may appoint⁵⁸ to administer the Government of the Commonwealth; but no such person shall be entitled to receive any salary from the Commonwealth in respect of any other office⁵⁹ during his administration of the Government of the Commonwealth.

CANADA.—The provisions of this Act referring to the Governor-General extend and apply to the Governor-General for the time being of Canada, or other the Chief Executive Officer or Administrator for the time being carrying on the Government of Canada on behalf and in the name of the Queen, by whatever title he is designated.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 10.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 4, Chap. I., of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced as follows:—

“The provisions of this Constitution relating to the Governor-General extend and apply to the Governor-General for the time being, or such other person as the Queen may appoint to be the Chief Executive Officer or Administrator of the Government of the Commonwealth; but no such person shall be entitled to receive any salary in respect of any other office under the Crown during his administration of the Government of the Commonwealth.”

In Committee the words “under the Crown” were omitted, and “from the Commonwealth” inserted after “salary.” (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 633-5) At the Melbourne session, drafting amendments were made after the fourth report.

§ 58. “Such Person as the Queen may Appoint.”

These words refer to the appointment of an acting Governor-General or Administrator of the Government of the Commonwealth, appointed under commission by the Queen. This officer, when so appointed, is authorized to exercise all the powers and functions of the Governor-General. He is not to be confused with the Deputy Governor-General, provided for by sec. 126. A Deputy Governor-General can only be appointed by the Governor-General himself under the authority of the Queen, and can only exercise such powers and functions as are assigned to him by the Governor-General, subject to any limitations imposed by the Queen; and the appointment of a Deputy does not affect the exercise by the Governor-General himself of those powers. (See sec. 126.)

“During the temporary absence of a Governor from his colony, it was formerly the general practice for the Crown, by a dormant commission under the sign-manual, to empower the Chief Justice or senior judge therein to act as administrator of the government; but difficulties having sometimes arisen in carrying out an arrangement of this kind, it is not now invariably resorted to, at least, in the first instance. Instead of this provision to supply the place of an absent Governor, it is now customary either to appoint a Lieutenant-Governor or Administrator of the Government under the royal sign-manual; or else that the senior officer for the time being of Her Majesty’s regular troops in the colony shall be empowered to act in this capacity. But where no such provision has been made, it is usual and appropriate for the Chief Justice or senior judge to be authorized to act as Administrator of the Government, in the event of the death, incapacity, removal or departure from the Government of the Governor and (if there be such an officer) of the Lieutenant-Governor of the colony.” (Todd, Parl. Gov. in the Col., 2nd ed. p. 123.)

§ 59. “Salary . . . in Respect of any other Office.”

At the Adelaide session of the Convention, a section was inserted in Chapter III. providing that no person holding any judicial office should be appointed to or be capable of holding the office of Governor-General, Lieutenant-Governor, Chief Executive Officer, or Administrator of the Government. (Adel. Bill, sec. 80; Conv. Deb. Adel. pp. 1174-6) At the Melbourne session, this section was eliminated on the ground that it contained an undue limitation of the prerogative of the Crown, and that it might prejudicially restrict the choice of the Crown in the appointment of an Administrator of the Government for the time being. The Queen has now, therefore, unfettered discretion in the selection and appointment of an Administrator of the Federal Government; he may be an Imperial officer; he may be an officer of the Commonwealth, such as President of the Senate or a Judge of the High Court; he may be a Governor of a State or other State officer; or he may not occupy any official position whatever at the time of his appointment. No qualification or disqualification for the office is prescribed, the Queen’s choice, in conformity with the advice of her Imperial Ministers, being considered a sufficient guarantee for the appointment of a suitable and acceptable Federal Administrator, as well as for that of Governor-General himself. No mention is made in this section of the salary to be paid to the Administrator for his services in that capacity. It may be assumed that he will be paid out of the £10,000 per year payable to the Queen out of the consolidated fund of the Commonwealth for the maintenance of the Governor-Generalship, and that the amount will be apportioned in some manner satisfactory to the Imperial Government. There is, however, a distinct provision that no person acting as Administrator shall be entitled to receive any salary from the Commonwealth in respect of any other office during his administration of the Government of the Commonwealth. This inhibition will prevent a Federal Judge, should he be appointed Administrator, or the President of the Senate, should he be so appointed, from receiving the salary annexed to those respective offices during his administration of the Government. But should the Governor of a State or other State officer be so appointed, it will be competent for him to receive the salary of his State office as well as the salary for the Federal office.

Sessions of Parliament. Prorogation and dissolution. Summoning Parliament.
First Session.

5. The Governor-General may appoint such times⁶⁰ for holding the sessions of the Parliament⁶¹ as he thinks fit, and may also from time to time, by Proclamation or otherwise, prorogue⁶² the Parliament, and may in like manner dissolve⁶³ the House of Representatives.

After any general election the Parliament shall be summoned⁶⁴ to meet not later than thirty days after the day appointed for the return of the writs⁶⁵.

The Parliament shall be summoned to meet not later than six months after the establishment of the Commonwealth.

UNITED STATES.—The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.
—Const., Art. 1., sec. 4, subs. 2.

CANADA.—The Parliament of Canada shall be called together not later than six months after the union.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 19.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, the first and third paragraphs of this section were contained, in almost identical words, in Clause 6 of Chap. I.; whilst the substance of the second paragraph was added to clause 42 in Committee, on the motion of Sir John Bray. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 585, 643-62.)

At the Adelaide session, the same provisions were introduced almost verbatim. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 635.) At the Sydney session, the question of dissolving the Senate was raised, and the clause was postponed till the deadlock question had been settled. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 254-6, 987.)

At the Melbourne session, drafting amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report; the second paragraph being brought up from the "Duration of House of Representatives" clause (sec. 23).

§ 60. "May Appoint such Times."

This is the first section in the Constitution in which a specific power to perform executive acts is vested in the Governor-General. It will be noticed that the section states that the Governor-General may perform these acts, and there is no reference to his so acting by the advice of the Federal Executive Council. The powers conferred on the Governor-General by this, and other sections similarly worded, may be here summarized for the purpose of comparing them with other powers conferred on the Governor-General in Council.

STATUTORY POWERS OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.—The Governor-General may appoint the times for the holding the sessions of Parliament (sec. 5).

The Governor-General may prorogue Parliament (sec. 5).

The Governor-General may dissolve the House of Representatives (sec. 5).

The Governor-General shall notify to the Governor of a State interested the happening of a vacancy in the Senate (sec. 21).

The Governor-General may recommend to Parliament the appropriation of revenue or money (sec. 56).

The Governor-General may dissolve the Senate and the House of Representatives simultaneously (sec. 57).

The Governor-General may convene a joint sitting of members of both Houses (sec. 57.)

The Governor-General may assent in the Queen's name to a proposed law, or withhold assent, or reserve the law for the Queen's pleasure (sec. 58).

The Governor-General may recommend to Parliament amendments in proposed laws (sec. 58.)

The Governor-General may exercise, as the Queen's representative, the executive power of the Commonwealth (sec. 61).

The Governor-General shall choose and summon members of the Federal Executive Council, and may dismiss them (sec. 62).

The Governor-General may appoint officers to administer departments of State, and may dismiss them (sec. 64).

The Governor-General may, in the absence of Parliamentary provision, direct what offices shall be held by Ministers of State (sec. 65).

The Governor-General as the Queen's representative has the command-in-chief of the naval and military forces (sec. 68).

The Governor-General may proclaim dates when certain departments shall be transferred to the Commonwealth (sec. 69).

The Governor-General may, "in respect of matters which, under this Constitution, pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth," exercise all powers and functions which at the establishment of the Commonwealth are vested in the Governor of a colony (sec. 70).

STATUTORY POWERS OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL IN COUNCIL.—On the other hand there are numerous sections in which authority to do executive acts is vested expressly in the Governor-General in Council, thus :—

The Governor-General in Council may issue writs for general elections of the House of Representatives (sec. 32).

The Governor-General in Council may issue writs for elections to fill vacancies in the House of Representatives (sec. 33).

The Governor-General in Council may establish departments of State (sec. 64).

The Governor-General in Council may appoint and remove all officers except Ministers of State (sec. 67).

The Governor-General in Council may exercise, "in respect of matters which under this Constitution pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth," all powers and functions which at the establishment of the Commonwealth are vested in the Governor of a colony with the advice of his Executive Council (sec. 70).

The Governor-General in Council shall appoint the Justices of the High Court, and may appoint Justices of other Federal Courts (sec. 72).

The Governor-General in Council may, on addresses from both Houses, remove Justices of the High Court and of other Federal Courts (sec. 72).

The Governor-General in Council may draw money from the Federal Treasury and expend the same until the first meeting of the Parliament (sec. 83).

The Governor-General in Council may appoint members of the Inter-State Commission (sec. 103).

The Governor-General in Council may, on addresses from both Houses, remove members of the Inter-State Commission (sec. 103).

MODE OF EXERCISING THESE POWERS.—Without anticipating our general comments on the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, which naturally appear under the heading of Chapter II. (note § 271) it may be advisable here to make a preliminary observation in explanation of the two groups of executive powers, so classified.

The first group includes powers which properly or historically belong to the prerogatives of the Crown, and survive as parts of the prerogative; hence they are vested in the Governor-General, as the Queen's representative. The second group includes powers either of purely statutory origin or which have, by statute or custom, been detached from the prerogative; and they can, therefore, without any constitutional impropriety, be declared to be vested in the Governor-General in Council. But all those powers which involve the performance of executive acts, whether parts of the prerogative or the creatures of statute, will, in accordance with constitutional practice, as developed by the system known as responsible government, be performed by the Governor-General, by and with the advice of the Federal Executive Council. (See Note § 275.) If the section now under review had been made to read "the Governor-General in Council may appoint such times for holding the sessions of the Parliament," &c, the words "in Council" would have been an invasion of the Royal prerogative; because it is invariably recognized as a prerogative of the Crown to summon, prorogue and dissolve Parliament. The words would moreover have been mere surplusage; nothing would have been gained, since parliamentary government has well established the principle that the Crown can perform no executive act, except on the advice of some minister responsible to Parliament. Hence the power nominally placed in the hands of the Governor-General is really granted to the people through their representatives in Parliament. Whilst, therefore, in this Constitution some executive powers are, in technical phraseology, and in accordance with venerable customs, vested in the Governor-General, and others in the Governor-General in Council, they are all substantially in pari materia, on the same footing, and, in the ultimate resort, can only be exercised according to the will of the people.

"There are certain prerogative rights which have been long demitted or got rid of by statute or by other practice—generally by statute—and in any statute drafted the words "in Council" are inserted. There are certain other prerogative rights which, not having been the subject of such demission, as it is sometimes called, I believe, not having been given up in any way, apparently, are not so described in a statute. There are certain prerogative rights—this was all gone into at Adelaide, and decided by the Convention according to the contention I am advocating—which are not described in a statute as rights of the Governor in Council, simply because no statute has ever dealt with them, and because they belong to that part of the prerogative which has never been nominally given up by the Crown. Of such is the power to summon and dissolve Parliament, to which no one who understood these matters would dream of adding the words 'in Council.' But yet these rights can never be exercised without the advice of a responsible Minister, and if that advice is wrongly given it is the Minister who suffers." (Mr. E. Barton, Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 2253-4.)

The executive powers referred to, however, must not be confounded with the authority vested in the Governor-General to assent to a proposed law or withhold his assent or to reserve it for the Queen's pleasure. (See Note, § 267.) This is not an executive, but a legislative power entrusted to him as the Queen's representative and one which he may exercise "according to his discretion." That is the only section in which a discretionary power is clearly and unequivocally given to the Governor-General; it is in reference to matters of legislation and not matters of administration. (See Note, § 271, "The Executive Government.")

§ 61. "Holding the Sessions of the Parliament."

"It is by the act of the Crown alone that Parliament can be assembled. The only occasions on which the Lords and Commons have met by their own authority, were previously to the restoration of King Charles II., and at the Revolution in 1688. The first Act of Charles the Second's reign declared the Lords and Commons to be the two houses of Parliament, notwithstanding the irregular manner in which they had been assembled; and all their Acts were confirmed by the succeeding Parliament summoned by the king, which however qualified the confirmation of them, by declaring that 'the manner of the assembling, enforced by the difficulties and exigencies which then lay upon the nation, is not to be drawn into example.' In the same manner, the first Act of the reign of William and Mary declared the Convention of Lords and Commons to be the two houses of Parliament, as if they had been summoned according to the usual form; and the succeeding Parliament recognized the legality of their Acts." (May, Parl. Prac., 10th ed., p. 38.)

§ 62. "Prorogue."

Prorogation is the continuance of the Parliament from one session to another, as an adjournment is a continuance of the session from day to day. Prorogation puts an end to the session, and quashes any Bills which are begun and not perfected. According to the practice of the Imperial Parliament, such Bills must be resumed de novo (if at all) in a subsequent session, as if they had not previously been introduced. (See Tomlins, Vol. II. Parliament, viii.; May, Parl. Prac. 10th ed. p. 43.) The Houses may, however, by standing orders provide for the resumption of such Bills, upon motion, at the stage at which they were interrupted. (See, for instance, Standing Orders, 200-2, of Legislative Council, New South Wales; Standing Orders, 295-7, of Legislative Assembly, New South Wales.) A prorogation may be effected by commission, but the usual course is by proclamation.

"Both Houses are necessarily prorogued at the same time, it not being a prorogation of the House of Lords or Commons, but of the Parliament. The session is never understood to be at an end until a prorogation; though, unless some Act be passed or some judgment given in Parliament, it is in truth no session at all." (Tomlins, vol. 11, Parliament.)

"All orders of Parliament determine by prorogation, and one taken by order of the Parliament after their prorogation, may be discharged on an habeas corpus, as well as after a dissolution; but it was long since determined that the dissolution of a Parliament did not alter the state of impeachments brought up by the Commons in a preceding Parliament." (Id.)

"The Crown may bring the session to an end by a prorogation, which has the effect of quashing all proceedings, except impeachments and appeals before the House of Lords. Parliament is prorogued by the sovereign in person in the House of Lords, or by commission; it may also be prorogued by proclamation from the day for which it was summoned, or to which it had been previously prorogued." (Encyclopedia, Laws of England IX. p. 401.)

This section confers upon the Governor-General the power to dissolve the House of Representatives before the expiration of the three years for which it is elected. By section 57 the Governor-General, in the circumstances therein specified, is further authorized to dissolve the Senate and the House of Representatives simultaneously.

GRANTING A DISSOLUTION.—It is the prerogative of the Crown to dissolve an existing Parliament subject only to the constitutional rule that this great power, described by Sir Charles G. Duffy as "the most popular of all the prerogatives," and one of immense utility, can be exercised only on the advice and approval of a Minister of State directly responsible to the national chamber. The granting of a dissolution is, of course, an executive act, the ministerial responsibility for which can be easily established. The following have been suggested as the leading considerations which should reasonably support and justify ministerial advice in favour of a dissolution (Todd, 2nd ed. p. 771):

- (i.) When a vote of "no confidence" is carried against a government which has not already appealed to the country.
- (ii.) When there are reasonable grounds to believe that an adverse vote against the government does not represent the opinions and wishes of the country, and would be reversed by a new Parliament.
- (iii.) When the existing Parliament was elected under the auspices of the opponents of the government.
- (iv.) When the majority against a government is so small as to make it improbable that a strong government can be formed from the opposition.

REFUSING A DISSOLUTION.—The refusal of a dissolution, recommended by a Minister of State, is not an executive act; it is a refusal to do an executive act. It seems to be generally admitted by constitutional authorities that the Crown has still an undoubted constitutional right to withhold its consent to the application of a minister for permission to dissolve Parliament. The sovereign, it is said, ought not to be a mere passive instrument in the hands of ministers: it is not merely the right but the duty of the sovereign to exercise his judgment on the advice so tendered.

"And though, by refusing to act upon that advice, he incurs a serious responsibility, if they should in the end prove to be supported by public opinion, there is, perhaps, no case in which this responsibility may be more safely and more usefully incurred than when ministers have asked to be allowed to appeal to the people from a decision pronounced against them by the House of Commons. For they might prefer this request when there was no probability of the vote of the House being reversed by the nation, and when the measure would be injurious to the public interests. In such a case, the sovereign ought clearly to refuse to allow a dissolution." (Todd, Parl. Govt. in Eng., II., 2nd ed., 510.)

"The power of dissolution is, of all the trusts vested in His Majesty, the most critical and delicate." (Burke, Works, III., p. 525.)

"It is a great instrument in the hands of the Crown, and it would have a tendency to blunt the instrument if it were employed without grave necessity." (Sir Robert Peel, Speeches, IV., p. 710.)

"It seems to be generally supposed that a defeated minister is entitled, if he think fit, at once to 'appeal to the country.' The concurrence of the Crown is assumed as a matter of course. But although ministers may advise a dissolution, the King is by no means bound to follow that advice. The refusal to grant the dissolution would indeed be a sufficient ground for the resignation of ministers; but, on the other hand, compliance with the request can only be meant to assist them against the hostility of Parliament. Such assistance the King cannot and ought not indiscriminately to give. The question therefore arises in what circumstances, according to modern constitutional usage, ought the prerogative of dissolving Parliament to be exercised." (Hearn's Gov. of Eng., p. 162.)

"Except where some organic change has been effected in the construction of Parliament, the only reason which can induce the King prematurely to dismiss his Great Council must be either that the advice that he obtains from it is unacceptable to him, or that he can obtain no definite and decided advice, or that the two portions of his Council are discordant. In other words, either there is a difference of opinion between the Crown and the House of Commons on the subject of some ministry; or the different parties in the Commons are so equally divided that business is obstructed; or the two Houses cannot on some material question come to an agreement." (Hearn's Gov. of Eng., p. 163-4.)

"If the minister to whom a dissolution has been refused is not willing to accept the decision of the sovereign, it is his duty to resign. He must then be replaced by another minister, who is prepared to accept full responsibility for the act of the sovereign, and for its consequences, in the judgment of Parliament." (Todd, Parl. Govt. in Eng., vol. ii., p. 408.)

"It is evident, therefore, that the sovereign—when, in the exercise of this prerogative, a dissolution is either granted or refused—must be sustained and justified by the agreement of a responsible minister. If this be constitutionally necessary, as respects the sovereign, it is doubly so in the case of a Governor. For the sovereign is not personally responsible to any earthly authority; but a Governor is directly responsible to the Crown for every act of his administration." (Todd, Parl. Govt. in the Col., 2nd ed., p. 761.)

"As the representative of the Crown in the dominion, colony, or province, over which he is commissioned to preside, the power of dissolution rests absolutely and exclusively with the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor for the time being. He is personally responsible to the Crown for the lawful exercise of this prerogative, but he is likewise bound to take into account the welfare of the people, being unable to divest himself of a grave moral responsibility towards the colony he is commissioned to govern." (Todd, id., p. 800.)

"Whilst this prerogative, as all others in our constitutional system, can only be administered upon the advice of counsellors prepared to assume full responsibility for the Governor's decision, the Governor must be himself the judge of the necessity for a dissolution. The 'constitutional discretion' of the Governor should be invoked in respect to every case wherein a dissolution may be advised or requested by his ministers; and his judgment ought not to be fettered, or his discretion disputed, by inferences drawn from previous precedents, when he decides that a proposed dissolution is unnecessary or undesirable." (Todd, id., p. 800.)

"It is the duty of a Governor to consider the question of a dissolution of the parliament or legislature solely in reference to the general interests of the people and not from a party standpoint. He is under no obligation to sustain the party in power if he believes that the accession to office of their opponents would be more beneficial to the public at large. He is, therefore, justified in withholding a dissolution requested by his ministers, when he is of opinion that it was asked for merely to strengthen a particular party, and not with a view to ascertain the public sentiment upon disputed questions of public policy. These considerations would always warrant a governor in withholding his consent to a dissolution applied for, under such circumstances, by a ministry that had been condemned by a vote of the popular chamber. If he believes that a strong and efficient administration could be formed that would command the confidence of an existing Assembly, he is free to make trial thereof instead of complying with the request of his ministers to grant them a dissolution as an alternative to their enforced resignation of office. On the other hand, he may at his discretion grant a dissolution to a ministry defeated in Parliament and desirous of appealing to the constituencies, notwithstanding that one or both branches of the legislature should remonstrate against the proposed appeal, if only he is persuaded that it would be for the public advantage that the appeal should be allowed." (Todd, id., p. 801.)

"Parliament is usually dissolved by proclamation under the great seal, after having been prorogued to a certain day. This proclamation is issued by the Queen, with the advice of her Privy Council; and announces that the Queen has given order to the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to issue out writs in due form, and according to law, for calling a new Parliament; and that the writs are to be returnable in due course of law." (May's Parl. Prac., 10th ed., p. 46.)

"On the 17th July, 1837, Parliament was prorogued and dissolved on the same day. On the 23rd July, 1847, the Queen, in proroguing Parliament, announced her intention immediately to dissolve it; and it was accordingly dissolved by proclamation on the same day, and the writs were despatched by that evening's post; and this course is now the ordinary, but not the invariable practice." (May's Parl. Prac., 10th ed., p. 47.)

§ 64. "The Parliament shall be Summoned."

The first Federal Parliament will have to be elected and summoned to meet for the despatch of business not later than six months after the establishment of the Commonwealth. This part of the section refers to two important events—(1) the establishment of the Commonwealth, and (2) the summoning of the first Parliament. Several intervening events are assumed to have taken place; such as the appointment by the Governor-General of Ministers of State to constitute the first administration of the Commonwealth, and the election of the first Parliament. A Federal Ministry will have to be appointed immediately upon the establishment of the Commonwealth, for on the accomplishment of the union the departments of Customs and Excise, in the several States, are by the terms of the Constitution transferred to the Commonwealth, and the Executive Government will be at once required for the purpose of administering those departments as well as for the purpose of supervising the issue of writs, appointing returning officers, and generally making arrangements necessary for the election of members of the House of Representatives. The writs for the election of Senators are issued by the Governors of States. The various successive steps and stages in the inauguration of the new regime may be here recapitulated for general survey—

THE PASSING OF THE ACT. (9th July, 1900.)

THE ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THE ELECTION OF SENATORS.

THE RETURN OF THE WRITS.

THE SUMMONING OF THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

THE MEETING OF THE NEW PARLIAMENT NOT LATER THAN SIX MONTHS AFTER THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

§ 65. "Day Appointed for the Return of the Writs."

The provision of this Section, that after any general election the Parliament shall be summoned to meet not later than thirty days "after the day appointed for the return of writs" would seem to refer to the day appointed by the Governor-General in Council under section 32, under which writs are issued for general elections of members of the House of Representatives; such writs would of course appoint the day upon which they are required to be returned. The passage in this section, now under consideration, was taken from a paragraph in ch. I., pt. III., sec. 41 of the Draft Bill of 1891, which under the heading of "Duration of the House of Representatives," provided that "The Parliament shall be called together not later than thirty days after the day appointed for the return of the writs for the general election." From this it appears "that the day appointed" means the time specified for the return of the writs issued by the Federal Government for the election of the House of Representatives; and that it has no reference to the times which may be appointed by the Governors of States for the return of writs issued by them for the election of Senators for their respective States. It does not seem to suggest that the Governor-General in Council could limit the time within which the election of Senators would have to be held, and their names certified by the Governors of States. The Governor-General in Council could issue no mandate to the Governors of States on this subject. On the contrary, the State authorities can fix their own times for the election of senators, without reference to the Federal Government (sec. 9). Should any of the States omit to provide for their representation in the Senate, that body could proceed to the despatch of business in the absence of senators from such State (sec. 11), provided that there was a quorum present, consisting of at least one-third of the whole number of the senators (sec. 22).

Yearly Session of Parliament.

6. There shall be a session of the Parliament once at least in every year⁶⁶, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Parliament in one session and its first sitting in the next session.

CANADA.—There shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada once at least in every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Parliament in one session and its first sitting in the next session.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, s. 20.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—This provision, which occurs in the Constitutions of all the Australian colonies, was contained, verbatim, in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, and was adopted by the Convention of 1897-8, without debate or amendment.

§ 66. "Once at Least in Every Year."

The annual meeting of the Federal Parliament is secured by this section of the Constitution, in accordance with numerous colonial precedents. In the United Kingdom, however, the Queen is only bound by statute to issue writs within three years after the expiration of a Parliament. The guarantee of an annual session is the necessity of providing money for the public service.

“The annual meeting of Parliament, now placed beyond the power of the Crown by a system of finance, rather than by distinct enactment, had, in fact, been the law of England from very early times. By the statute 4 Edward III., c. 14, ‘it is accorded that Parliament shall be holden every year once, [and] [or] more often if need be.’ And again, in the 36 Edw. III., c. 10, it was granted ‘for redress of divers mischiefs and grievances which daily happen [a Parliament shall be holden or] be the Parliament holden every year, as another time was ordained by statute.’ It is well known that by extending the words, ‘if need be,’ to the whole sentence instead of to the last part only, to which they are obviously limited, the kings of England constantly disregarded these laws. It is impossible, however, for any words to be more distinct than those of the 36 Edward III., and it is plain from many records that they were rightly understood at the time. In the 50 Edward III., the Commons petitioned the king to establish, by statute, that a Parliament should be held each year; to which the king replied, ‘In regard to a Parliament each year, there are statutes and ordinances made, which should be duly maintained and kept.’ So also to a similar petition in the 1 Richard II., it was answered, ‘So far as relates to the holding of Parliament each year, let the statutes thereupon be kept and observed; and as for the place of meeting, the king will therein do his pleasure.’ And in the following year the king declared that he had summoned Parliament, because at the prayer of the Lords and Commons it had been ordained and agreed that Parliament should be held each year. In the preamble of the Act 16 Chas. I., c. 1, it was also distinctly affirmed, that ‘by the laws and statutes of this realm, Parliament ought to be holden at least once every year for the redress of grievances: but the appointment of the time and place of the holding thereof hath always belonged, as it ought, to his majesty and his royal progenitors.’ Yet by the 16 Chas. II., c. 1, a recognition of these ancient laws was withheld: for the Act of Charles I. was repealed as ‘derogatory of his majesty’s just rights and prerogative’: and the statutes of Edward III. were incorrectly construed to signify no more than that ‘Parliaments are to be held very often.’ All these statutes, however, were repealed, by implication, by this Act, and also by the 6 and 7 Will. and Mary, c. 2, which declares and enacts ‘that from henceforth Parliament shall be holden once in three years at the least.’” (May’s Parl. Prac., pp. 38-40.)

PART II.—THE SENATE.

The Senate.

7. The Senate⁶⁷ shall be composed of senators for each State⁶⁸, directly chosen by the people of the State, voting, until the Parliament otherwise provides, as one electorate⁶⁹.

But until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the Parliament of the State of Queensland⁷⁰, if that State be an Original State⁷¹, may make laws dividing the State into divisions and determining the number of senators to be chosen for each division, and in the absence of such provision the State shall be one electorate.

Until the Parliament otherwise provides there shall be six senators for each Original State. The Parliament may make laws increasing or diminishing the number of senators for each State, but so that equal representation of the several Original States shall be maintained⁷² and that no Original State shall have less than six senators.

The senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the senators chosen for each State shall be certified by the Governor to the Governor-General.

UNITED STATES.—The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof.—Const., Art. I., sec. 3, sub-sec. 1.

CANADA.—The Senate shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, consist of seventy-two members, who shall be styled Senators.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 21.

In relation to the Constitution of the Senate, Canada shall be deemed to consist of Three Divisions:—

1. Ontario;

2. Quebec;

3. The Maritime Provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; which Three Divisions shall (subject to the provisions of this Act) be equally represented in the Senate as follows:—Ontario by twenty-four Senators; Quebec by twenty-four Senators; and the Maritime Provinces by twenty-four Senators, twelve thereof representing Nova Scotia, and twelve thereof representing New Brunswick.—Id., sec. 22.

The Governor-General shall from time to time, in the Queen's name, by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, summon qualified persons to the Senate; and, subject to the provisions of this Act, every person so summoned shall become and be a member of the Senate and a Senator.—Id., sec. 24.

Such persons shall be first summoned to the Senate as the Queen by Warrant under Her Majesty's Royal Sign Manual thinks fit to approve, and their names shall be inserted in the Queen's Proclamation of Union.—Id., sec. 25.

If at any time on the recommendation of the Governor-General the Queen thinks fit to direct that three or six members be added to the Senate, the Governor-General may by summons to three or six qualified persons (as the case may be), representing equally the Three Divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.—Id., sec. 26.

In case of such addition being at any time made, the Governor-General shall not summon any person to the Senate, except on a further like direction by the Queen on the like recommendation, until each of the Three Divisions of Canada is represented by twenty-four Senators, and no more.—Id., sec. 27.

The number of Senators shall not at any time exceed seventy-eight.—Id., sec. 28.

A Senator shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, hold his place in the Senate for life.—Id., sec. 19.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 9, Chap. I., of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“The Senate shall be composed of eight members for each State, directly chosen by the Houses of the Parliament of the several States during a session thereof, and each senator shall have one vote. The senators shall be chosen for a term of six years. The names of the senators chosen in each State shall be certified by the Governor to the Governor-General.”

In Committee, the debate opened with a warning by Mr. Wrixon that, if the Senate were given large powers, the clause must be reconsidered; “it will never do to give equal representation to the smallest, as well as to the largest States, if the Senate is to be a large and determined power in the Constitution.” An amendment by Mr. Munro, to substitute “six” for “eight,” was negatived. Mr. Kingston proposed to omit the words “directly chosen by the Houses,” &c., so as to leave each State to determine the mode of election. The arguments in favour of a uniform mode of election, however, were too strong; and the time was not yet ripe for the plan of direct election. Mr. Kingston's amendment was negatived by 34 votes to 6. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 588-99.)

At the Adelaide session, the provision was introduced as follows (part of clause 9):—

“The Senate shall be composed of six senators for each State, and each senator shall have one vote.

“The senators shall be directly chosen by the people of the State as one electorate.

“The senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the senators chosen by each State shall be certified by the Governor to the Governor-General.

“The Parliament shall have power, from time to time, to increase or diminish the number of senators for each State, but so that the equal representation of the several States shall be maintained and that no State shall have less than six senators.”

The discussions upon this clause at the Adelaide and Sydney sessions may be most conveniently referred to under separate subject-headings.

Equal Representation.—At the Adelaide session, Mr. Higgins proposed that representation in the Senate should be according to a sliding scale, intermediate between equal and proportionate representation. This was negated by 32 votes to 5. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 641-68, 1190.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion by both Houses of the New South Wales Parliament, providing for proportionate representation, with a minimum of three senators for each State, and a minimum total number of 40 senators, was negated by 41 votes to 5. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 256-355.) In the re-draft of the clause proposed at Sydney, doubts as to the construction of the clause, read with the clause providing for the representation of new States (sec. 121), were removed by restricting the right of equal representation to "Original States." (See Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 257-8.) The same principle was affirmed by a suggestion of the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, declaring that the provision for the maintenance of equal representation should not apply to new States admitted on other terms. This was opposed by those who claimed that equal representation was an essential principle of Federation, but was supported by those who defended equal representation as a necessary compromise. It was agreed to by 25 votes to 20. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 394-415.)

Direct Election by People.—At the Adelaide session, Mr. Dobson protested against the direct election of senators on the same suffrage as the House of Representatives, but moved no amendment. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 670-2.) At the Sydney session, Sir John Forrest announced his preference for election by the Legislatures. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], p. 361.)

As one Electorate.—At the Adelaide session, Mr. Lyne criticized the policy of making each State one electorate, and advocated single-member constituencies. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 668-9.) At the Sydney session, suggestions by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, and by both Houses of all the other colonies, to omit the words "as one electorate," were discussed. Sir John Forrest suggested three electorates, seeing that three members for each State were to retire periodically. Mr. Fraser suggested six electorates. After debate, the words "until the Parliament otherwise provides" were inserted by 29 votes to 19; and the words "as one electorate" were retained by 29 votes to 18. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 360-91.)

Term of Office.—At the Adelaide session, Mr. Higgins proposed to reduce the senators' term of office from six to four years. This was negated. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 670.)

Certifying Names.—At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria to omit this provision—on the ground that the States should have nothing to do with the electoral machinery of the Senate—was negated. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 391-4.)

At the Sydney session, the clause was re-drafted in the following form:—

"The Senate shall be composed of senators for each State, directly chosen by the people of the State, voting, until the Parliament otherwise determines, as one electorate, and each senator shall have one vote. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, there shall be six senators for each Original State. The Parliament may, from time to time, increase or diminish the number of senators for each State, but so that equal representation of the several Original States shall be maintained, and that no Original State shall have less than six senators. The Senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the senators chosen by each State shall be certified by the Governor to the Governor-General."

At the Melbourne session, before the first report, the words "and each Senator shall have one vote" were transferred to another clause (sec. 23); and the words "chosen for each State" were substituted for "chosen by each State." After the second report, Mr. Isaacs proposed to allow each State, provisionally, to divide the State into electorates. This was negated by 27 votes to 16. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1922-8.) Verbal amendments were made after the fourth report.

At the Premiers' Conference, 1899, the paragraph enabling the Parliament of Queensland, in the absence of federal legislation, to divide the State into electoral divisions, was agreed to.

The Senate is one of the most conspicuous, and unquestionably the most important, of all the federal features of the Constitution, using the word federal in the sense of linking together and uniting a number of co-equal political communities, under a common system of government. The Senate is not merely a branch of a bicameral Parliament; it is not merely a second chamber of revision and review representing the sober second thought of the nation, such as the House of Lords is supposed to be; it is that, but something more than that. It is the chamber in which the States, considered as separate entities, and corporate parts of the Commonwealth, are represented. They are so represented for the purpose of enabling them to maintain and protect their constitutional rights against attempted invasions, and to give them every facility for the advocacy of their peculiar and special interests, as well as for the ventilation and consideration of their grievances. It is not sufficient that they should have a Federal High Court to appeal to for the review of federal legislation which they may consider to be in excess of the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament. In addition to the legal remedy it was deemed advisable that Original States at least should be endowed with a parity of representation in one chamber of the Parliament for the purpose of enabling them effectively to resist, in the legislative stage, proposals threatening to invade and violate the domain of rights reserved to the States.

That the Senate is the Council of States in the Federal Parliament is proved by the words of this section. There are to be six senators for each Original State. That the States, and not the people, are actually represented in the Senate is shown by the requirement that the "equal representation of the several Original States shall be maintained." Equality of representation, it is argued, is a natural corollary of State representation, because the colonies were, prior to federation, politically equal; equal in constitutional power and status, although not necessarily equal in territory or population. Territory and population afford no absolute test of political status. The true test is the power to govern. Crown colonies would not have been admitted members of the Federal Partnership, on terms of equality with the responsible-government colonies. Further, it was one of the terms of the federal bargain that, in consideration of the transfer of general powers to the Commonwealth, each colony represented in the Convention should, on becoming a State, maintain its original relative equality and individuality unimpaired. That could only be done by equality of representation in the Council of States. Without the adoption of that principle the federation of the Australian colonies would not have been accomplished.

After prolonged and exhaustive debates the Federal Convention, by decisive majorities, accepted the principle of equal representation of Original States in the Senate, as a positive and indispensable condition of the Federal scheme. The question had to be considered, not so much from its logical and symmetrical aspect—not so much as a principle capable of satisfactory dialectical analysis and vindication—but rather as one of the terms of the Federal compact, which is based on compromise. The problem to be solved in the case of the Australian colonies desiring to federate was similar to that which had to be solved by the framers of the American Constitution; it was—how to reconcile the creation of a strong national government with the claims and susceptibilities of separate, and, in their own eyes, quasi-sovereign States. The solution of the problem was found in a Parliament partly national and partly Federal. The national part of the Parliament is the House of Representatives—the organ of the nation. The Federal part of the Parliament is the Senate—the organ of the States, the visible representative of the continuity, independence, and reserved autonomy of the States, linking them together as integral parts of the Federal union. As quasi-sovereign entities, it was contended that they were entitled to equal representation, because they were constitutionally and politically equal; inequality in the number of people within their jurisdiction did not constitute inequality in their quasi-sovereignty; in sovereignty there were no degrees. This was the only logical ground suggested. Whether it was sound or unsound is not so material as the fact that a majority of the Australian communities affirmed that they would not agree to transfer a part of their political rights and powers to a central Legislature except on the condition that, as States, they should be equally represented in one of the Chambers of that Legislature.

The functions and basis of the Senate are fully explained and vindicated in the annexed quotations from standard authorities and extracts from speeches delivered in the Federal Convention. The fact that equal State representation cannot be taken away, even (as may be contended) by an amendment of the Constitution, fully warrants the presentation of the case for the Senate in the language of some of its strongest advocates.

“ Whatever may now be thought of the reasoning of the contending parties, no person who possesses a sincere love of country and wishes for the permanent union of the States can doubt that the compromise actually made was well founded in policy, and may now be fully vindicated upon the highest principles of political wisdom and the true nature of the government which was intended to be established. It may not be unprofitable to review a few of the grounds upon which this opinion is hazarded. In the first place, the very structure of the general government contemplated one partly federal and partly national. It not only recognized the existence of State governments, but perpetuated them, leaving them in the enjoyment of a large portion of the rights of sovereignty, and giving to the general government a few powers, and those only which were necessary for national purposes. The general government was, therefore, upon the acknowledged basis, one of limited and circumscribed powers; the States were to possess the residuary powers. Admitting, then, that it is right, among a people thoroughly incorporated into one nation, that every district of territory ought to have a proportional share of the government; and that among independent States, bound together by a simple league, there ought, on the other hand, to be an equal share in the common councils, whatever might be their relative size or strength (both of which propositions are not easily controverted); it would follow that a compound republic, partaking of the character of each, ought to be founded on a mixture of proportional and equal representation. The legislative power, being that which is predominant in all governments, ought to be above all of this character; because there can be no security for the general government or the State governments without an adequate representation, and an adequate check of each in the functions of legislation. Whatever basis, therefore, is assumed for one branch of the legislature, the antagonist basis should be assumed for the other. If the House is to be proportional to the relative size, and wealth, and population of the States, the Senate should be fixed upon an absolute equality, as the representative of State sovereignty. There is so much reason and justice and security in such a course than it can with difficulty be overlooked by those who sincerely consult the public good, without being biased by the interests or prejudices of their peculiar local position. The equal vote allowed in the Senate is, in this view, at once a constitutional recognition of the sovereignty remaining in the States, and an instrument for the preservation of it. It guards them against (what they meant to resist as improper) a consolidation of the States into one simple republic; and, on the other hand, the weight of the other branch counterbalances an undue preponderance of State interests tending to disunion. Another and most important advantage arising from this ingredient is the great difference which it creates in the elements of the two branches of the legislature.” (Story, Comm. on the Const. §§ 697-9.)

“ The state legislatures ought to have some means of defending themselves against encroachments of the national government. And what better means can we provide than to make them a constituent part of the national establishment? No doubt there is danger on both sides; but we have only seen the evils arising on the side of the state governments. Those on the other side remain to be displayed; for congress had not power to carry their acts into execution, as the national government will now have.” (Geo. Mason, in the Philadelphia Convention, 7th June, 1787.)

“ The Senate of the United States is the only upper legislative chamber in the world that has the strength to resist the will of the electorate for a considerable period of time. It represents the Federal principle in the government, and, besides its legislative, has important executive functions.” (Foster, Comm. I. p. 457.)

“ The name of Senate is taken from a body which ruled ancient Rome; and its prototype was the body of senior warriors with whom the king or chieftain held his councils of war; but in its legislative functions it resembles the Roman tribunate more closely than its name-father, and its immediate model was the House of Lords.” (Id. p. 459.)

“ We may imagine very easily in a moment's reflection what would have been the condition of this country at this moment had the Senate of the United States been constituted on a different principle. If the size and populations of the several States had been the test of representation in the Senate of the United States, I think it is not too much to say, in sober minded truth, that this Republic would not have endured until now. Many and many have been the times when, if the right of the Senators of each State to resist and defeat the current of popular passion and prejudice which arises sometimes in the action of the popular body, the House of Representatives, had failed to exert itself, as it would have failed if the Senate had been constituted as the national House of Representatives, discord and revolution would almost certainly have caused the dismemberment of the Union." (Senator George F. Edmunds, cited in Foster, Comm. vol. I. p. 467.)

"Although there has been no need of its interposition to protect the small from any encroachment by the larger States, until the Civil War the Senate was more conspicuously the guardian of State rights in general. Their advocates maintained the position that the body was an assembly of ambassadors from sovereign States. During Washington's administration, North Carolina directed her senators to execute a deed ceding land to the United States: Senator Tazewell, of Virginia, declined Jackson's offer of a place in the cabinet, and said:—'Having been elected a senator, I would as soon think of taking a place under George IV. if I was sent as minister to his court, as I would to take a place in the cabinet.' Insistence has frequently been made upon the right of State legislatures to instruct their senators in Congress. In 1808, John Quincy Adams resigned after voting for the embargo in opposition to the wishes of his constituents. A senator, in 1828, after arguing against the Tariff of Abominations, said, 'as the organ of the State of Kentucky he felt himself bound to surrender his individual opinion, and express the opinion of his State.' John Tyler, in 1836, before he was President, resigned his place in the Senate because the Virginia legislature had instructed him to vote in favour of the expunging resolution, which he could not conscientiously approve. These doctrines are now abandoned. The Senators consider themselves as members of an ordinary legislative body. They pay no more attention to the instructions of State legislatures than do members of the House; and in fact, since their terms are longer, they are more inclined to disobey them." (Foster, Comm. I. pp. 494-6.)

"A survey of its position throughout the history of the United States shows that the Senate has maintained, almost without interruption, the respect of the American people, and that it has vindicated the wisdom of its creation; while State senates are usually more despised than State houses of assembly. It has been shorn of but a single power, that to originate general appropriation bills, which the House has, by their continuous rejection when sent there, refused to permit it to exercise successfully, although the Senate has more than once recorded a protest asserting its prerogative: but in practice, through its power of amendment, the loss is rather nominal than real." (Id. 496.)

"What I mean is an upper chamber, call it what you may, which shall have within itself the only conservatism possible in a democracy—the conservatism of maturity of judgment, of distinction of service, of length of experience, and weight of character—which are the only qualities we can expect to collect and bring into one body in a community young and inexperienced as Australia." (Sir Henry Parkes, in the Federal Convention, 1891; Convention Debates, p. 26.)

"If the Australian people desired unity, it would, perhaps, be a question open to discussion whether the Senate should or should not be an elected body, but when they desire Union only, it is essential that there should be in the Federal Government some body representing the Provinces as such; some body sufficiently strong, from the nature of its constitution, to uphold the rights of the Provinces whom it represents. What other body than an elected Senate can be suggested? It is no answer to point out objections to an elected Senate, unless you are prepared to suggest some other mode of appointment which is open to less objections. If there is to be some outward and visible sign of recognition of State rights, if the 'natural' desire of the small States is to be given effect to, how can it be better effected than by equal representation in the Senate? Their 'desires' will have to be ascertained, and consent obtained before any Union can be formed, and we must never forget the saying of Solon, who, when asked if he had given the Athenians the best possible laws, replied, 'I have given them the best they can bear.' As Mr. Bagehot himself remarks, a Federal Senate, a second House which represents State unity, has this advantage: it embodies a feeling at the root of society—a feeling which is older than complicated politics, which is stronger a thousand times over than common political feeling; the local feeling, 'my shirt,' says the Swiss State patriot, 'is nearer to me than my coat.' An elected Senate in which each State is equally represented is a guarantee that no law will be passed, not only without the consent of the majority of the people, but also without the consent of a majority of the States. By the election of Senators by each State for each State you insure the respect and attachment of the State as a whole, not only for the particular Senators they have elected, but also for the whole federal constitution of which they form a part." (Sir R. C. Baker; Manual for use of Convention of 1891, p. 61.)

“All Federal Governments have their Senates or Councils of the States, and in all of them the Senate is based upon the principle that in a Federation the States must be represented as well as the people. The principle, if not as old as the hills, goes as far back as the Achaean League, where each city, independent of its size, had one vote. And the reason why the principle is universal is not far to see. It is probable that no small States would care to link their fortunes with large States if they were liable to be out-voted and ignored by virtue of the superior population of their greater brethren. Certainly the American States would never have set aside their loose confederation, unworkable as it was, if it had not been for this method of alleviating their fears, and of extinguishing their jealousies. In their Senate each State, the great and the pigmy, is equal. We shall undoubtedly to a large extent have to recognize this principle here.” (Mr. Howard Willoughby, Australian Federation [1891] p. 58.)

“The individualism of the States after Federation is of as much interest to each colony as the free exercise of national powers is essential to that aggregation of colonies which we express in the term Federation. If the one trenches upon the other, then, so far as the provinces assert their individuality overmuch, the fear is an approach to a mere loose confederation, not a true Federation. The fear on the other hand is, if we give the power to encroach—that is if we represent the federated people only, and not the States in their entities, in our Federation—then day by day you will find the power to make this encroachment will be so gladly availed of that, day by day and year by year, the body called the Federation will more nearly approach the unified or ‘unitarian’ system of government. We cannot adopt any form of government the tendency of which will be, as time goes on, to turn the constitution towards unification on the one hand, and towards a loose confederacy on the other. We must observe that principle, or else we do not observe the charge laid upon us by the enabling Act, which lays on us the duty to frame a ‘Federal’ Constitution under the Crown. So, therefore, I take it there must be two Houses of Parliament, and in one of these Houses the principle of nationhood, and the power and scope of the nation, as constituted and welded together into one by the act of Federation, will be expressed in the National Assembly, or House of Representatives, and in the other Chamber, whether it is called the Council of the States, the States Assembly, or the Senate, must be found not the ordinary checks of the Upper House, because such a Chamber will not be constituted for the purposes of an Upper House; but you must take all pains, not only to have a Parliament consisting of two Chambers, but to have it constituted in those two Chambers in such a way as to have the basic principle of Federation conserved in that Chamber which is representative of the rights of the States; that is that each law of the Federation should have the assent of the States as well as of the federated people. If you must have two Chambers in your Federation, it is one consequence of the Federation that the Chamber that has in its charge the defence of State interests will also have in its hands powers in most matters co-ordinate with the other House.” (Mr. Edmund Barton, Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 21-23.)

“In all four legislatures [England, Germany, France and the United States] the distribution of the representation in the upper houses is made with but little regard to the census of the population. In England and in the United States, no regard at all is paid to the principle of proportionality: in Germany, not much: in France, considerable. If there is any one controlling principle applicable to all these cases, it is the representation of local governmental organizations. In the Senate of the United States, this is the exclusive principle. In the German Federal Council, it is the dominant principle. In the French Senate, considerable regard is paid to the census of the population in determining the number of senatorial seats to be assigned to each département; but within the département the effect of this concession to proportionality is modified by a very great discrimination in favour of the less populous communes as regards the number of representatives accorded them in the electoral colleges. In England alone no regard seems at present to be paid to local governmental or administrative organizations in the distribution of the seats in the upper house. If we look, however, to history, we find that the representation of England in the House of Lords was originally very closely connected with the local organizations; while the number of seats in that house now occupied by representative peers from Scotland and Ireland is fixed by statute, and is thus defended against the power of the Crown on the one side, and the accidents of extinction on the other. These statutes are based far more upon territorial considerations than upon the idea of proportionality. We may say then, I think, that the principle controlling the distribution of seats in the upper houses of the legislatures of these typical systems is the representation of the local governmental or administrative organizations. This is a most valuable principle. It tends to preserve the real fruits of the historic development of the State. It gives opportunity for the exertion of a larger influence by the cultured minority; and it gives more security to the rights of that minority. Many of the greatest statesmen have been brought forward through the influence of this principle. The organizations which have not the strength of numbers have been compelled to search diligently for their best talent in order to maintain, in fact, their legal equality. The principle, however, is frequently assailed as medieval and contradictory to the doctrine of popular sovereignty. From the view which we take of the province of legislation, viz., the interpretation of the reason of the State rather than the registration of the popular will, this objection appears irrelevant. Something more conclusive than the demand for proportionality must be adduced before we can be called upon to admit that this system of distributing representation is faulty. If the less populous community were always the more cultured, this would certainly be a better distribution than the principle of numbers could afford. It is because the less populous community may chance to be also the less cultivated that the system is in some degree unreliable. It would not, therefore, serve as the exclusive system of distribution, i.e., the system for both legislative chambers. When, however, it is balanced by the principle of distribution according to population in the other house, there is every reason to believe that it contributes powerfully to the production of sound legislation, and that it is a most wholesome check upon the radical tendencies of mathematical politics." (Burgess, Political Sc. II. pp. 114-116.)

§ 68. "Chosen by the People of the State."

The senators for a State are to be chosen by those of "The People of the State" possessed of the qualifications prescribed by section 8. This provision marks a great advance in a democratic direction. The Commonwealth Bill of 1891, following the precedent of the Constitution of the United States, provided that the Senators for each State should be directly chosen by the Houses of the Parliament of the State. In the Canadian Constitution the Senators are appointed by the Governor-General for life. The principle of popular election, on which the Senate of the Commonwealth is founded, is more in harmony with the progressive instincts and tendencies of the times than those according to which the Senate of the United States and the Senate of Canada are called into existence. In the Convention which drafted the Constitution of the Commonwealth not a single member was found in favour of a nominated Senate. It was generally conceded, not only that a chamber so constituted would be of an obsolete type and repugnant to the drift of modern political thought, but that, as a Council of States, it would be an infirm and comparatively ineffective legislative body. A few members were, indeed, for a time in favour of a Senate elected by the State legislatures; but they eventually abandoned that view as the debate progressed, and as the strong volume of authoritative opinion, and the overwhelming mass of evidence opposed to the manner in which the Senate of United States is chosen, was presented and developed.

The mode of choosing Senators embodied in the American Constitution was adopted in times and under circumstances quite different from those of the present; but even in the Philadelphia Convention which drafted that Constitution there were wise and far-seeing men who advocated the election of Senators directly by the people. "The States," contended James Wilson, one of the Representatives of Pennsylvania, "are in no danger of being devoured by the national government; I wish to keep them from devouring the national government. Their existence is made essential by the great extent of our country. I am for an election of the second branch by the people in large districts, subdividing the districts only for the accommodation of voters." (Bancroft's History of the Constitution of the U.S. 2nd vol. p. 30.)

As we have already seen, the functions of the Senate are of a double kind: first as a chamber of revision and review in matters of general legislation; and, secondly, as a chamber to represent the particular views, opinions, and interests of the States, in matters admittedly within the sphere of the federal authority but respecting which differences might arise, as well as for the purpose of resisting proposals not within the sphere of the federal authority. For the purpose of exercising powers such as these it was contended, with unanswerable force, that the Senate of the Commonwealth could and should be chosen by the process of popular election, and that there was no occasion to vest the choice in the State legislatures. In Australia there was a particular reason, in addition to the democratic one, why the American precedent should not be followed. In two of the six Australian colonies, namely, Queensland and New South Wales, the Upper Houses were nominated by the Crown, and not elected by the people; and the same was the case in New Zealand. It would be highly undesirable for Federal Senators to be elected by any Legislature, one branch of which would not be elected by the people, and, therefore, would not be responsible to the people. It would also be highly desirable that the senators representing the various States should be elected on a uniform basis, but there would be no such uniformity if some senators were elected by nominated Chambers and others by Chambers deriving their existence directly from the people. The struggle in Queensland over the Federal Enabling Bill was an object lesson of the difficulties to be encountered where there were two Chambers of a different basic Constitution. In Queensland the Legislative Assembly distinctly denied the right of the nominated Upper House to take part in the election of members to be sent to the Federal Convention. That was the whole contest. In the same way we might expect even more formidable objections to be taken to the Constitution of a Federal Senate partly elected by nominee Chambers. In addition to these considerations there was a gathering mass of testimony before the Convention as to the unsatisfactory manner in which the American system of senatorial elections was conducted.

"In one respect alone is there any sign of a popular demand for a change in either the functions or the construction of the Senate. A movement is now on foot to secure a constitutional amendment transferring the election of senators from the State legislatures to the people; and on account of the facilities for intrigue and bribery which are afforded by the present method, it is not unlikely that such a change would be beneficial. But the Senate of the United States will probably endure as long as any second legislative chamber upon the earth" (Foster, Comm. I. p. 49S.)

"A proposal recently made to amend the Federal Constitution by taking the election of senators from the legislatures in order to vest it in the people of each State, is approved by some judicious publicists, who think that bad candidates will have less chance with the party at large and the people than they now have in bodies apt to be controlled by a knot of party managers. A nomination made for a popular election will at least be made publicly, whereas now a nomination for an election by a legislature may be made secretly." (Bryce, The American Commonwealth, I. pp. 96 and 97; Senator Mitchell's article in the Forum, June 6, 1896.)

"The method of election to the Senate or second Chamber is a matter that will be thrashed out in the Committee and upon the discussion of the Bill. There are some who think the only way to preserve definite responsibility is to have the election by the people of the quota of each State to the Senate. There are others who think that could be well and best done by the election of the quota of each State by its legislature; there are others, too, who think that there should be a difference in suffrage between the electorate which chooses the States Council and the National Assembly. It should not be our purpose now to lay down definite lines upon any one of those subjects, because they are really questions which should be decided only after we become acquainted with each others' views in this debate and upon the discussion in Committee, and when the Bill is being discussed. It is then, and then only, that we shall be fully in possession of the reasons which underlie each others' views, and be able to say how far we can demand concessions in return." (Mr. Edmund Barton, Conv. Deb., Adél., p. 22.)

§ 69. "One Electorate."

One of the arguments in favour of the election of senators by the State Legislatures was that thereby the corporate and undivided representation of the States in the Senate was secured. It was, however, considered that the advantage of unified State representation in the Senate could be secured quite as effectually by the system, now provisionally embodied in the Constitution, of "one State one Senatorial electorate." As soon as it was decided that the senators should be elected by the people and not by the legislatures, the view was pressed with great force that the people of each State, in choosing senators for the State, should vote as one constituency. If a State were divided into electorates, and if locality became the guiding principle of selection, the special purpose for which the Senate was constituted would be obscured. That purpose is that each State should be represented as a whole, as one entity, and not in divisions or sections. Voting as electors of one great constituency, it is contended, the people of a State will not be influenced by local sympathies and parochial interests; at any rate not to the same extent as if they were required to vote in provincial groups. It is believed that the process of voting in one common electorate is calculated to promote the selection of the best men whose services are available—men of broad views, established reputations, and extended experience, such as should be elected members of the Senate. There would be a better chance of giving effect to what Sir Henry Parkes, in 1891, described as the only conservatism possible in a democracy—the conservatism which arises from official position, length of experience, and weight of character. (Mr. E. Barton, Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 669; Mr. H. B. Higgins, Conv. Deb., Syd., pp. 369-70.)

A serious objection raised to the system of "one State one Senatorial electorate" was, that the expense necessarily involved in contesting an election extending over a whole State would be so great that only rich men would become candidates for the Senate, and that poor men of talent and capacity would be excluded. It was, however, denied that such would be the case. On the contrary, it was contended that the largeness of the electorate and the vast number of voters to be canvassed or appealed to would render it impossible for even a rich man to secure a seat in the Senate by lavish expenditure; he would have a better chance of doing so in a small or moderately large electorate. A man of limited means who had the confidence of the public would have a better chance of being successful than a millionaire who did not possess that confidence. It was mentioned during the debate that, on the occasion of the election of members for the Federal Convention, it was found that democratic candidates of moderate means had no difficulty in taking part in the campaign, on equal terms with conservative candidates, backed by wealth and social position. If the well-to-do candidates spent more money, it was because they were expected to do so; it did not follow that the expenditure of money gained them many more votes. Mr. Trenwith was proud to mention the fact that his expenses in connection with the Federal Convention election did not exceed £4.

The next objection was that the election of senators was a matter of State concern, and that each State should be allowed to decide whether its senators should be chosen by the people voting in one or several divisions. It was also feared that popular election would tend to place in large cities, towns, and centres of population the dominating influence in Senatorial elections, to the prejudice of the people in the country districts who, through want of organization, would not be able to exercise an influence proportionate to their numbers. It was accordingly proposed at the Sydney sittings of the Convention to amend the "one State one electorate" plan adopted at Adelaide, and to allow each State, if it thought fit, to split its territory into as many senatorial electorates as would be consistent with the application of the rotation principle.

The proposed modification was strongly opposed by most of the leading members of the Convention. It was pointed out that the amendment, if adopted, might endanger the principle of State representation in the Senate, with which the sectional election of Senators would be inconsistent. Local representation was adequately provided for in the House of Representatives. In the Senate the principle of locality, as the basis of representation, should be ignored, and corporate representation should be insisted upon. Under no circumstances, it was argued, should the matter be left to the discretion of the State Parliaments. It was not a matter of solely local concern. It was absolutely necessary that there should be uniformity in the electoral system by which senators were to be chosen; because the mode in which senators were chosen in one State might substantially affect the people in other States. If the power to cut up a State into senatorial districts were granted to the State Parliaments it might lead to "gerrymandering;" by a careful adjustment of the boundaries of districts, and the grouping of populations in those districts, a State Parliament would be able to unduly colour the political principles of the senators returned for the State. (Mr. H. B. Higgins, Conv. Deb., Syd., p. 369.)

With reference to the suggested possibility of cities, towns, and centres of population exercising a predominating influence as against voters in rural districts, it was pointed out that the Parliament of each State was empowered to make laws prescribing the method of choosing Senators for that State (sec. 9). In the exercise of that power the State Parliaments, if they thought fit, would be able to introduce a system of preferential voting, providing for the representation of minorities, which would completely dispose of the objection referred to. (See Note § 77, "Methods of choosing Senators")

§ 70. "Queensland."

The circumstances which conspired to prevent the representation of Queensland in the Federal Convention are detailed in the Historical Introduction, pp. 162, 187, 193. At the Conference of Premiers which met at Melbourne in January, 1899 (see Historical Introduction, p. 218, supra), Mr. Dickson, the Premier of Queensland, pleaded hard for an amendment in the Constitution enabling the Parliament of that colony, if it became an Original State, to divide it into divisions for the election of Senators and to determine the number of Senators for each division. The Conference decided that, although this concession would involve a departure from the fundamental principle, yet the Conference, considering the special circumstances of Queensland, its vast territory and scattered population, coupled with the fact that its population seemed to be naturally growing and developing in three divisions which may hereafter become separate States, and considering also that Queensland had not been represented in the Convention and was therefore deprived of the opportunity of having her views and interests adequately considered, decided to recommend the insertion of the special provision which now stands as the second paragraph of the section.

That Queensland would be an Original State was ensured by the affirmative vote of the people of that colony on 2nd September, 1899, and confirmed by the Address to the Queen subsequently passed by both Houses of the Queensland Parliament.

This power of the Parliament of Queensland only exists "until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides." The Parliament of the Commonwealth has, therefore, the power to require that the State of Queensland shall be represented in the Senate as a corporate whole.

§ 71. "Original State."

An Original State is defined by Clause 6 as a State which is part of the Commonwealth at its establishment. An Original State is entitled, as a constitutional right, to equal representation in the Senate and other special privileges which need not necessarily be conceded to new States. The Federal Parliament may admit to the Commonwealth or establish new States, and may upon such admission or establishment make or impose such terms and conditions, including the extent of representation in either House of the Parliament, as it thinks fit (sec. 121). The fact that new States are not entitled as of right to equal representation shows that the system is not founded on a logical principle, but that it is a political compromise or contrivance regarded as one of the conditions precedent to the establishment of the Commonwealth.

§ 72. "Equal Representation . . Shall be Maintained."

The immobility of the principle of the equal representation of Original States in the Senate is assumed to be secured by the combined operation of this section and section 128, which provides that no alteration diminishing the proportionate representation of any State in either House of the Parliament, shall become law unless the majority of the electors voting in that State approve the proposed law. Referring to the corresponding section of the Constitution of the United States, Dr. Burgess says:—

"The principle of representation in the Senate is State-equality. The Constitution secures this equality even against amendment in the ordinary manner. That is, the state, the sovereignty, as it was organized back of the Constitution, undertakes to secure the principle of State-equality in the Senate, against the state, the sovereignty, as organized within the Constitution. This is confused and unnatural. It is not possible that this restriction could stand against a determined effort on the part of the state within the Constitution to overthrow it. It is a relic of confederatism, and ought to be disregarded. It may be good political science now and in the future that the principle of State-equality should prevail in the Senate, but the state as organized in the Constitution must be the final judge of this. No Constitution is complete which undertakes to except anything from the power of the state as organized in the Constitution. Such a Constitution invites the reappearance of a sovereignty back of the Constitution, i.e., invites revolution." (Burgess, Pol. Sc. II. p. 49.)

§ 73. "Chosen for a Term of Six Years."

The members of the Senate of the United States are elected by the State Legislatures for a fixed term of six years, subject to the rotation system by which one-third retire every two years. In Canada the senators, appointed by the Governor-General, hold their seats for life. In Switzerland the cantons determine the tenure of the members of the Council of States. Members of the Federal Council of Germany hold their seats at the will of the Executive Governments of the States. The Commonwealth Bill of 1891 proposed that the tenure of senators to be elected by the Legislatures should be six years, subject to the retirement of one-half the senators every three years. The same term and tenure for Senators have been embodied in the present Constitution. The length of the legal term of a senator is, therefore, twice that of the potential term of a member of the House of Representatives. The reason for this difference in length of term is that, in theory, the Senate is designed to be a continuous body, and that Senators ought to have a longer duration of membership, in order to give them greater independence and better opportunities for deliberation in dealing with proposed legislation, so that they may, if necessary, even protect the people themselves. (Foster, Comm. I. 469.)

§ 74. "Certified by the Governor."

EXECUTIVE CONTROL OF SENATE ELECTIONS.—By sec. 12, the Governor of each State is charged with the duty of issuing writs for the election of senators; and this section enacts that the names of the senators chosen for each State must be certified by the Governor to the Governor-General. This provision was supported in the Convention as helping to preserve the essence of State unity. (Sir John Downer, Conv. Deb., Syd., 393; see also note, § 94, infra.)

The Constitution, while it gives the Federal Parliament wide legislative powers in respect of the mode of election and laws relating to elections of senators, seems to vest the administrative conduct of the elections wholly in the States. The State Parliaments are to fix the times and places of the elections; the State Governments are to issue the writs and certify the result of the polls. The power to issue the writs involves the power to appoint returning officers, who will be State officials, and whose duty will be to appoint deputies, to fix polling places, to advertise, to hold the elections at the times and places prescribed by State laws, and to return the writs to the Governors of their respective States. The method of election (sec. 9) and the laws relating to elections (sec. 10), except as to the times and places of elections, may be prescribed by the Federal Parliament; but the executive control remains constitutionally vested in the States.

EXPENSES OF SENATE ELECTIONS.—From the proposition that the Senate elections are conducted and controlled by State officials, it seems to follow logically that the expenditure in connection with these elections must be defrayed by the States. The returning officers, being State officials, must look to their own Governments for their expenses; and if the States have a free hand as to the number of polling-booths, the advertisement of the elections and so forth, it would be manifestly unreasonable that the Federal Government should be under an obligation to pay any bills which may be incurred, however extravagant; and no such obligation appears to be imposed by the Constitution.

At the same time, the Constitution does appear to contemplate that the Federal Government shall have the power to defray these expenses. Sec. 83 provides that the Governor-General in Council may draw from the Treasury and expend such moneys as may be necessary "for the holding of the first elections for the Parliament," not merely for the House of Representatives. It would seem, therefore, that the Federal Government, though it is under no obligation to defray the expenses of senate elections, has the power to re-imburse the States for expenses reasonably incurred. Whether it exercises this power, or leaves each State to bear its own expenses, is perhaps not of much moment, because the aggregate amount of the re-imbursement would come out of the surplus divisible among the several States. The re-imbursement to each State would probably be made, if made at all, on a uniform population basis; and as it would then be charged against each State as federal expenditure on the same basis, the result would be unaltered.

In connection with elections for the members of the House of Representatives, the Federal Government will appoint returning officers and make arrangements for the conduct of electoral proceedings throughout the Commonwealth, and pay the necessary expenses. It will be possible on certain occasions—for instance, at the first election and after a double dissolution—for the Federal authorities and the State authorities to concur in the holding of elections for both Houses on the same day. As the election of representatives in a State will be conducted on the same suffrage as the election of senators for the State, it may be possible for the Federal authorities and the State authorities to join in the expense of providing one common electoral roll for Federal elections in each State.

Qualification of electors.

8. The qualification of electors⁷⁵ of senators shall be in each State that which is prescribed by this Constitution, or by the Parliament, as the qualification for electors of members of the House of Representatives; but in the choosing of senators each elector shall vote only once.⁷⁶

HISTORICAL NOTE.—This provision (except the words prohibiting plural voting) was introduced at the Adelaide session in the same form, as part of the preceding clause. In Committee, the words "but in the choosing of senators each elector shall have only one vote" were added on Mr. Barton's motion. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 670.) Lest it should be contended that this would prevent an elector from casting votes for two or more candidates, this was afterwards amended by adding the words "for as many persons as are to be elected"—a phrase which later on was rejected in favour of "each elector shall vote only once." A provision was also added that "if any elector votes more than once, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour." (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 675, 1189-90, 1210.)

At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia, to the effect that senators should be elected in all the States on the basis of one adult one vote, was negatived by 32 votes to 13. A suggestion by the Legislative Council of Tasmania, to leave out the provision as to misdemeanour, was supported on the ground that the words were unnecessary, because a breach of a statutory prohibition was always a misdemeanour. Moreover, it was thought inadvisable to load the Constitution with penal provisions. The amendment was agreed to by 28 votes to 16. A suggestion by the Legislative Council of Victoria, to prevent disfranchisement of existing voters, was formally negatived, with a view to making Mr. Holder's clause (sec. 41) apply to both Houses. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 416-20.) At the Melbourne session, after the fourth report, the provision was placed as a separate clause.

§ 75. "Qualification of Electors of Senators."

The qualification of electors of senators in each State is the same as the qualification of electors of representatives in each State. This qualification is defined in sec. 30, a reference to which is necessary to explain the meaning of the expression "That which is prescribed by this Constitution or by the Parliament." In sec. 30 the Constitution prescribes that the qualification of electors of representatives shall be, in each State, that which is prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification of electors of the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State. This therefore is the Constitutional provision for the qualification of electors of both Houses. But by virtue of the words "Until the Parliament otherwise provides" this constitutional provision may be altered by the Parliament, without the necessity of recourse to the process of amendment of the Constitution under sec. 128. The Parliament may pass a suffrage law for the Commonwealth, superseding at all Federal elections the State suffrages, subject to the restriction prescribed by section 41. The Parliament cannot, however, prescribe one suffrage for the Senate and another for the House of Representatives. Whatever suffrage it prescribes for the House of Representatives will, by virtue of this section, be the suffrage for the Senate also. (For Notes on Suffrage see § 122, infra.)

§ 76. "Each Elector shall Vote only Once."

By this provision a federal elector is forbidden to vote more than once at any senatorial election. Without such an inhibition it might have been possible for an elector to record his vote in every electoral division throughout a State, in which his name was registered in the State rolls, and to which he could journey on the day of polling. The possibility of plural voting at a senatorial election would not, owing to the magnitude of the constituency, be so great as at a general election of members of the House of Representatives in which the constituencies would necessarily be smaller and more numerous. The application of the restriction to the election of members of both Federal Chambers is a strong proof of the liberal policy which guided and influenced the deliberations of the Federal Convention.

The mode of enforcing the inhibition formed the subject of some debate in the Convention. At the Adelaide session a provision was added to the effect that if an elector voted more than once at the same election he should be guilty of a misdemeanour. At the Sydney session a recommendation was received from both Houses of the Tasmanian Legislature that the penalizing words should be omitted, as being foreign to a Constitution, although no objection was raised to another section (46) which created an offence and provided a penalty. In supporting the omission of the words, Sir P. O. Fysh urged, at the Sydney Convention, that the bill should not embrace anything except what was necessary for the framing of the Constitution, and that any matters which belonged to the criminal law, or the electoral laws of the States, had better be left as they were. As far as the criminal law was concerned, it should not be part of the Constitution. (Conv. Deb., Syd., p. 417.)

"There seemed to be a considerable number of members at Adelaide who wished to have this provision about a misdemeanour inserted, and it was inserted in accordance with the wish of the majority. I am, myself, of opinion that so far as you can you should leave the Constitution to deal simply with matters of necessary machinery. I am not, myself, strongly in favour of a provision of this kind, and I think it can otherwise be provided for; but I am entirely in the hands of the Committee. If there is such a desire on the part of the Committee, I shall not object to the retention of these words, although I admit the force of the argument that the Constitution Act is not the place for making offences against the criminal law, or for prescribing penalties. That is perfectly true; but the object in the first instance seemed to be to obtain a statement of this kind in the Constitution. The object seemed to make it plain on the face of the Constitution that whoever offended against the law of one man one vote should be in danger of the police. I think I pointed out in Adelaide, and hon. members mostly agreed with me, that where a man does wilfully and deliberately what is against the express provisions of an Act, it is a misdemeanour, and there is no necessity to place that in an Act of Parliament." (Mr. Edmund Barton, id. p. 417.)

On a division the words declaring plural voting at a senatorial election to be a misdemeanour were struck out. A breach of a direct statutory prohibition, however, is a misdemeanour. (See Note, § 123, infra.)

Method of election of senators. Times and places.

9. The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws prescribing the method of choosing senators⁷⁷, but so that the method shall be uniform for all the States⁷⁸. Subject to any such law, the Parliament of each State may make laws prescribing the method of choosing the senators for that State.

The Parliament of a State may make laws for determining the times and places of elections of senators⁷⁹ for the State.

UNITED STATES.—The times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators.—Const., Art. 1, Sec. iv., subs. 1.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 10, Chap. 1., of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws prescribing a uniform manner of choosing the senators. Subject to such laws, if any, the Parliament of each State may determine the time, place, and manner of choosing the senators for that State by the Houses of Parliament thereof.” (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], p. 599.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the same clause was adopted with the omission of the words “by the Houses of Parliament thereof.” In Committee, Mr. Deakin suggested “method” as preferable to “manner,” but no amendment was moved. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 672-4.)

At the Sydney session, a suggestion by both the Houses of the Parliament of Tasmania, to leave the manner of choosing senators to the States altogether, was negatived. A suggestion by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, to insert “the times, places, and” before “a uniform manner,” in order to enable the Federal Parliament to legislate as to the times and places of elections, was agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 987-8.)

At the Melbourne session, after the fourth report, the clause was altered to its present shape, the determination of times and places being again left to the States. In Committee, Mr. Symon pointed out that this was an alteration in substance; but no amendment was moved. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 2445-7.)

§ 77. “Method of Choosing Senators.”

The method of choosing senators in each State may, in the first instance, be prescribed by the Parliament of each State. The Parliament of the Commonwealth, however, may at any time after the first election of senators pass laws prescribing the “method of choosing senators,” subject to the restriction that such method shall be uniform for all the States. The question which at once presents itself for consideration is the meaning of the expression “method of choosing.”

“Method of choosing” clearly does not include the sub-division of the State into electorates, because sec. 7 gives this power solely to the Federal Parliament. Nor does it include the fixing of the times and places of elections; because sec. 9 reserves this power absolutely to the State Parliaments. The power to prescribe the method of choosing senators is also limited by the constitutional provision that “each elector shall vote only once.”

Subject to these express constitutional provisions, it would seem that the power to prescribe the method of choosing senators extends to the regulation of the whole process of election, including the mode of nomination, the form of writs and ballot papers, the mode of voting, the mode of counting votes, &c. The section would thus enable the State Parliaments provisionally, and the Federal Parliament ultimately, to prescribe the mode in which an elector should record his vote, e.g., whether he should vote for as many candidates as there are vacancies to be filled at the election, or whether he should have the option of "plumping" for a less number of candidates or of concentrating his vote, or whether he should mark some or all of the candidates in the order of his preference. Provision could thus be made for the introduction of some system of preferential or alternative voting and the representation of minorities.

"Method of choosing" would probably also include general regulations as to the conduct of elections. Under the power conferred on the Congress of the United States to prescribe the "times and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives," a statute has been passed providing for the holding of federal revision courts and the appointment of "supervisors of elections" to attend and scrutinize the registration of electors and the recording of votes, with power to arrest persons guilty of fraud against the election laws, and if necessary to summon the posse comitatus to their aid. (Burgess, Political Sec. ii. 44.)

In the absence of State or federal laws prescribing the "method of choosing senators," the senators for a State would be chosen according to the method prescribed by "the law relating to elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State." (See Notes, § 124, infra.)

"I take it this deals more with the manner in which you carry out your elections, and that the provision in a Constitution that a State shall be one electorate in voting as an entity of the Constitution is not a matter of minor degree as are these summed up in the phrase 'manner of choosing.' If these matters come before the courts the courts cannot have any difficulty." (Mr. Edmund Barton, Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 673.)

"The definition which Mr. Barton has rather implied than given of the word 'manner' raises a doubt in my mind as to whether the word 'manner' is also wide enough to cover all alteration in the system of voting, if so desired. If 'manner' relates rather to the conduct of an election and the general provisions made for taking votes, is it wide enough to cover also, and to a certainty, a variety of systems of voting which might perhaps be indicated by the word 'method?' Would it not be desirable to take care that those States which think fit to adopt a system of proportional voting for the representation of minorities shall have power to do so, and that the Parliament of the Federal Commonwealth shall also be able to adopt such a system if it thinks desirable?" (Mr. A. Deakin, id. p. 673.)

"There are only two limitations to the subjects which may come under the head of 'manner of choosing.' One is that the member is to be chosen by the people of the States as one electorate. That cannot be altered. The other is that the qualification shall be as stated for the House of Representatives, and one man shall have one vote. Those two things are expressly provided for, and therefore the 'manner' cannot touch them. They really put the very basis upon which the Senate is elected. But the manner of conducting elections must embrace everything else, and the manner of choosing, surely, would include the method in which the votes are to be recorded. The method in which votes are recorded must allow for representation of minorities, alternative votes, or any other system." (Mr. R. E. O'Connor, id. p. 673.)

"It would be perfectly open, for instance, for every Parliament to provide for the Hare system of election. The tenth clause provides that the Parliament may, in the first instance, prescribe an uniform manner applicable to every State, of choosing members for the Senate; but, subject to such provision, the Parliament of each State may decide how to choose members of that body. It reserves such a power to the Parliaments of the States. But there is reserved to the Federal Parliament a power of control, which might well be exercised, in the case of certain difficulties or misdeeds arising, to take the matter into its hand." (Mr. Edmund Barton, id. p. 673.)

§ 78. "Uniform for all the States."

"Uniform" means the same in all the States; not different methods in different States. (Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580.) Where a Federal Legislature is authorized to pass "uniform laws" it is not merely enabled to pass laws the operation of which shall be uniform, but to establish uniform laws on the subject throughout the union. This uniformity is incompatible with state legislation on that part of the subject to which the federal law may extend. (Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 123-194.)

§ 79. "Times and Places of Elections of Senators."

This sub-section further strengthens the control of the States over the election of senators. The Parliament of a State may, by legislation, determine the times when, upon the occasions arising under the Constitution, elections of senators for the State shall take place; it may also determine the places at which polling booths for the reception of votes for the election of senators shall be held. These powers are permanently and exclusively vested in the States. The election of senators will, of course, take place on the occurrence of the events prescribed by the Constitution, such as the triennial election of senators, when half the number of senators retire according to the process of rotation defined by section 13; and such as a general election of the Senate following a dissolution thereof under section 57. Under a similar section in the American Constitution it has been held that when the legislature of a State has failed to "prescribe the times, places and manner" of holding elections, the Governor may, in case of a vacancy, designate in his writ of election the time and place, when and where such election will be held; but that a reasonable time should be allowed for the promulgation of the notice. (Hoge's Case, Cl. and Hall [U.S.], 135; cited Baker Annot. Const. 6.)

Application of State laws.

10. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, but subject to this Constitution, the laws in force in each State, for the time being, relating to elections⁸⁰ for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections of senators for the State.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—At the Adelaide session, the following words (taken from the corresponding clause of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, relating to the House of Representatives) were introduced as paragraph 2 of the preceding clause:—

"Until such determination, and unless the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the laws in force in the several States for the time being, relating to the following matters, namely: The manner of conducting the elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, the proceedings at such elections, returning officers, the periods during which elections may be continued, and offences against the laws regulating such elections, shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the several States of members of the Senate." (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 674-6.)

At the Sydney session, a suggestion by both Houses of the Parliament of Tasmania, to omit "and unless the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides," so as to make the power of the States permanent, was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, pp. 988-9.)

At the Melbourne session, the paragraph was omitted, with a view to placing the provision as to both Houses in a single clause (44 AA). (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1827, 1855.) After the fourth report, however, it was determined to deal with each House separately; the clause was restored in shorter and more general terms, and clause 44 AA was omitted. (See also sec. 31.)

§ 80. "Laws in Force in Each State . . . Relating to Elections."

This section provides that in the election of senators for a State the laws for the time being in force in such State relating to elections for the more numerous House of Parliament of the State shall, so far as practicable, be applied. To this general enactment there are two limitations; one being that such electoral machinery laws are to be applicable to senatorial elections only until the Parliament otherwise provides; and the second being that the operation of the section is to be "subject to this Constitution." The latter phrase seems to cover two cases; (1) express provisions in the Constitution relating to elections—such as the prohibition against plural voting, and the provision that until the Parliament otherwise provides, each State shall be one electorate; and (2) laws passed by the States under the authority of the Constitution—such as laws determining the time and places of elections and provisional laws prescribing the method of choosing senators. Accordingly the section is merely provisional and temporary. It may be superseded in part by State legislation, under sec. 9, and superseded altogether by federal legislation.

The words "until the Parliament otherwise provides," seem, by virtue of sec. 51—xxxvi., to give the Federal Parliament (subject of course to the express limitations imposed by the Constitution) a general power to legislate as to "laws relating to elections" for the Senate—words which have a wider scope than the words "laws prescribing the method of choosing senators." The executive conduct of the elections, however, will remain with the States. (See Note, § 74, supra.)

Section 31 of the Constitution, making preliminary application of State election laws to the choice of members of the House of Representatives, is the same in substance as the section now under review. Both sections, as originally framed, enumerated in detail the particular branches of the electoral law, to which they were intended to apply (see Historical Note, supra); but at the Melbourne session of the Convention this enumeration was replaced by general words.

The omission of the particular words, instead of weakening, rather strengthens the section by rendering it more general, and less restricted than the original one. The section, as it stands, is most comprehensive, and applies, to senatorial elections in a State, all State laws relating to the conduct of and proceedings at elections of members of the popular Chamber in that State; the appointment of returning officers, their deputies and assistants, and their respective powers and duties; the publication of the mandate contained in the senatorial writs; the preparation of voters' rolls; the preparation of ballot papers; the nomination of candidates; the conditions of nomination—such as the signature of nomination papers by a certain number of electors, and the lodging of a deposit with each nomination paper as a guarantee of bona fides; the withdrawal of nominations; the notification of the time and places of polling as fixed by State laws under section 9; the recording of votes by secret ballot on the day of polling; the proof of qualification and proof of identity of voters; questions to be answered or oaths taken by persons seeking to vote whose qualification or identity may be challenged; the maintenance of order at the polling places; the time of opening and closing thereof; the counting of votes, the certification of returns, and the declaration of the poll.

Failure to choose senators^{s1}.

11. The Senate may proceed to the despatch of business, notwithstanding the failure of any State to provide for its representation in the Senate.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 11, chap. I., of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“The failure of any State to provide for its representation in the Senate shall not affect the power of the Senate to proceed to the despatch of business.”

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was adopted in the same words; and at the Melbourne session, after the fourth report, it was altered to its present form.

§ 81. “Failure to Choose Senators.”

This section must be read in conjunction with the quorum section, which enacts that the presence of at least one-third of the whole number of senators shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers (sec. 22). Accordingly the Senate will be capable of being duly constituted for the despatch of business if at least one-third of the States under the system of equal representation have provided for their representation in that body; the failure of two-thirds of the States to return the quota of senators to which they are entitled under the Constitution would not paralyse the legislative action of the Senate, and the absent and unrepresented States would be bound by laws passed whilst the statutory quorum was present, just as legally as if they were fully represented. The Constitution of the United States of America requires an absolute majority of the members of the Senate to constitute a quorum (Art. I. sec. 5, sub-sec. 1), and there is no section corresponding to the above one stipulating that unrepresented States are bound as effectively as those which have elected Senators. In the case of Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, it was said that if a majority of States should refuse to elect senators the government of the United States of America would necessarily come to an end. Applying that principle to the Constitution of the Commonwealth it might be contended that there would be a deadlock in the Federal Government if more than two-thirds of the States failed to elect senators. The risk of such a failure, however, is very remote.

This section contains the only legal and effective provision made by the Constitution for the prompt and regular return of senators by the States. The whole carriage of senatorial elections is vested in the State authority; the Federal Government can exercise no control or supervision over them. The Governor of each State issues the writ for a senatorial election; the election is conducted by State officers; the Governor of the State, on the return of the senatorial writ to him, has to certify to the Governor-General the names of senators duly chosen for his State. There is no time limited within which the certification has to be made. The fact that a quorum of the Senate may proceed to the despatch of business, notwithstanding any neglect or delay on the part of a State to provide for its representation, will be a strong inducement and incentive for the prompt holding of elections and the return of senators to fill vacancies as they arise.

Issue of writs.

12. The Governor of any State may cause writs to be issued⁸² for elections of senators for the State. In case of the dissolution of the Senate⁸³ the writs shall be issued within ten days from the proclamation of such dissolution.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—At the Adelaide sessions, 1897, in committee, Mr. Barton introduced a clause (11A) as follows:—

“For the purpose of holding elections of members to represent any State in the Senate, the Governor of the State may cause writs to be issued by such persons in such form and addressed to such returning officer as he thinks fit.”

Mr. Isaacs thought that the writs ought to be issued by the Governor-General, as in the case of writs for the House of Representatives. Mr. Holder moved an amendment to provide that the writs should be issued by the Governor-General in Council; but this was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 1149-50.)

At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria to omit the clause was not adopted. (Conv., Syd., 1897, p. 989; and see id. pp. 391-4.) At the Melbourne session, drafting amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 82. "Writs to be Issued."

As we have already seen, the whole executive supervision and conduct of a senatorial election in each State, from the issue of the writ to the certification of returns, is, subject to certain restraints, vested in the State authority. The only restrictive mandate imposed on the Governor of a State is, that in case of a dissolution of the Senate, he must issue the writ within ten days from the proclamation of such dissolution. No express provision has been made as to the limit of time within which the writ issued by the Governor of a State should be returned to him. Section 5 provides that the Parliament shall be summoned to meet, after a general election, not later than thirty days after "the day appointed" for the return of the writs. As we have pointed out in our notes on that section, "the day appointed" there referred to means the time fixed by the Governor-General in Council for the return of the writs for the election of members of the House of Representatives. There is no express or implied power vested in the Governor-General in Council to appoint a day for the return of the senatorial writs or for the certification of names of senators chosen.

§ 83. "Dissolution of the Senate."

The liability of the Senate of the Commonwealth to dissolution, in the circumstances and under the conditions stipulated in section 57, is an important feature in its constitution, which strikingly differentiates it from its great model and prototype—the Senate of the United States of America. It has been said that the American Senate is a continuous body, always in existence, and that its permanency and the length of the terms of its members have given it a dignity possessed by no other legislative body now in existence. (Foster's Comm. I. 493.) The Senate of the Commonwealth has been deprived of that principle of undisturbed continuity. The system of retirement by rotation makes the Senate of the Commonwealth, in theory, a continuous body; but its liability to dissolution is, to some extent, inconsistent with that theory. At the same time, when the conditions prescribed by section 57 and the various safeguards surrounding the exercise of the power therein conferred are considered, it will appear that the dissolubility of the Senate is quite consistent with the teachings of political science and the drift of modern political thought, and that what it loses by an occasional break in continuity it will gain in representative character, public esteem and legislative usefulness.

Rotation of senators.

13. As soon as may be after the Senate first meets, and after each first meeting of the Senate following a dissolution thereof, the Senate shall divide the senators⁸⁴ chosen for each State into two classes, as nearly equal in number as practicable; and the places of the senators of the first class shall become vacant at the expiration of the third year, and the places of those of the second class at the expiration of the sixth year, from the beginning of their term of service; and afterwards the places of senators shall become vacant at the expiration of six years from the beginning of their term of service.

The election to fill vacant places shall be made in the year at the expiration of which the places are to become vacant.

For the purposes of this section the term of service of a senator⁸⁵ shall be taken to begin on the first day of January following the day of his election, except in the cases of the first election and of the election next after any dissolution of the Senate, when it shall be taken to begin on the first day of January preceding the day of his election.

UNITED STATES.—Immediately after they shall be assembled, in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year: so that one third may be chosen every second year.—Const., Art. I., sec. 3, sub-sec. 2.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 13, Chap. I., of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was substantially the same except that it was provided that the Senators for each State “shall be divided by lot into two classes.” (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 589-603.) At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause of 1891 was adopted almost verbatim, and in Committee verbal amendments were made. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 676-9, 1190.) At the Sydney session, Mr. Glynn objected to the principle of rotation, as preventing the Senate ever being in touch with public opinion. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], p. 989.) Drafting amendments were also made. At the Melbourne session, Mr. Deakin moved the omission of the words “by lot.” He thought that either provision should be made for the three lowest on the poll to retire first, or the Senate should be left to manage the matter itself. The amendment was carried. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1928-9.) Drafting amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

The Senate will be a continuous body so far as its continuity is not broken by a dissolution under sec. 57. It may be assumed that such a break will only occur on rare and abnormal occasions in the history of the Commonwealth. Permanency of succession being its natural condition, arrangements have to be made for the periodical retirement of batches of senators so as to give effect, as far as possible, to the provisions of the Constitution; which provides that whilst senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, half of them shall retire every three years. Six years of service is the maximum term for which all senators are elected, but the policy of the Constitution is to cause the retirement of half the senators for each State every three years instead of all the senators every six years. If all the senators were to retire at the same time there would be no element of continuity in the constitution of the Senate. By the rotation principle that advantage is secured, whilst there will also be, at short intervals, an infusion of either fresh blood or restored vitality in the personnel of the Senate by the return, every three years, of newly chosen senators, or by the re-election of former senators strong in the confidence of their respective States. As the members of the first Senate, and of every Senate elected after a dissolution, are elected at the same time, they would, but for this section, be all entitled to six years tenure of office so far as not interfered with by a dissolution. For the purpose of securing the retirement every three years of a moiety of the senators for each State, an arbitrary provision has been adopted that one-half of the senators for each State in the first Senate, and every Senate succeeding a dissolution, shall vacate their seats at the expiration of three years from the beginning of their term of service. The Constitution does not itself specify the method of determining which half of the senators, for each State, shall retire at the end of half their terms of service. It requires the Senate to divide the senators for each State into two classes, as nearly equal in number as practicable, and declares that the places of senators of the first class shall become vacant at the expiration of the third year, and the places of those of the second class at the end of the sixth year; the Senate may divide them by lot or it may divide them according to some recognized principle; it may place the three senators for each State who stood highest on the poll in one class, entitled to six years, and place the other three senators for each State in the other class entitled to three years of office.

The words "as nearly equal in number as practicable" are intended to include the possible contingency of the number of senators for each State being altered, under section 7, to an odd number; or of a new State being accorded an odd number of senators. So long as the number of senators for each State remains even, the equality will of course be exact.

In the Draft Bill of 1891, as well as in the Bill as settled in the Adelaide and Sydney sessions, the Senate was authorized to divide the senators into two classes by lot. At the Melbourne session, the words "by lot" were omitted. The Senate has now, therefore, the unrestricted right to divide the senators for each State into two classes in such manner as it thinks fit. The purpose of the amendment is shown by the following extracts from the debates of the Convention:—

"The amendment I suggest need not occupy more than a moment or two in discussion. It is a blot on the face of a measure of this kind to require that the division of the senators into two classes after the first election shall be made by lot. I could understand that device being adopted in the absence of any other means of determining which senators should have the longer period. But the poll itself ought to afford, or be taken to afford, a reasonable indication of the wishes of the electors in this respect, and it is a probable injustice, as well as a mistake, to fall back on the antique method of settling questions of the kind. I move, therefore, the omission of the words 'by lot,' which will leave it absolutely at the discretion of the Senate itself to determine, after it meets, on what method the division shall take place. If the Drafting Committee think fit, they can adopt the method of providing that the three highest on the poll should have the six years' tenure. If that be the sense of the Convention, I will now simply submit my motion." (Mr. Alfred Deakin, Conv. Deb., Melb., p. 1928.)

"I think a great deal can be said in favour of the view the Hon. Mr. Deakin has placed before the Convention. In a constitutional matter of this kind we ought not to resort to deciding a question by lot unless there are no other means of determining the matter. If the Convention are willing to agree to the amendment, it might be left to the Drafting Committee to decide whether any provision for the division of the Senate should take place, or whether the matter should be left to the senators themselves." (Mr. R. E. O'Connor, id. p. 1928.)

Under the corresponding section of the Constitution of the United States of America the following procedure was adopted:—

"On the original organization of the Senate, May 14th, 1789, a committee was appointed to consider and report a mode of carrying into effect this constitutional provision. In accordance with their report, the senators then sitting were arbitrarily divided into three classes, the first including six members, and the second and third seven each. Three papers, numbered 1, 2 and 3 respectively, were rolled up and put into a box by the secretary; and then one senator from each class drew a number. The class which drew number 1 vacated their seats at the expiration of the second, the class which drew number 2 vacated their seats at the end of the fourth, and those who drew number 3 at the end of the sixth year. This plan, on account of the number then present at the Senate, left the first class, who vacated their seats at the expiration of the second year, one less in number than each of the other two. To prevent any unnecessary inequality in the classes, when the senators from New York appeared, two lots, one numbered 3, that of the small class, and one blank, were placed in the box. After each senator had drawn a lot, the one who drew number 3 was placed in the small class; and the other drew again from the box containing numbers 1 and 2, taking his place in the class whose number he drew. When the senators from North Carolina appeared, there were then two classes of equal numbers, and one with a number in excess of each. The numbers of the equal classes were put in the box. Then each senator drew one and was classed according to the number he drew. The classes were then equal in number. Accordingly, when the senators from Rhode Island appeared, papers numbered 1, 2 and 3 respectively, were again placed in the box, from which each senator drew one. The proceedings continued according to these successive methods until the admission of the senators from Washington, North Dakota and South Dakota at the same time. The same three numbers were then placed in the box, and drawn by one senator from each of the new States. The secretary then placed in the ballot-box two papers of equal size, numbered 1 and 3 respectively. Each of the senators from the State which had thus drawn number 1 drew out a paper and was assigned in accordance with the number he drew. The secretary then placed in the ballot-box numbers 1, 2 and 3, and each of the senators from the State which had drawn number 2 drew a lot from the box. They were assigned in accordance with the number drawn by each; and the remaining lot with a blank was again placed in the box and the senators from the remaining State drew from them. He who drew a number was assigned to the class represented by it; and he who drew a blank drew again from the box, which then contained the other two numbers, and was assigned according to the number drawn. When the senators from Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming were admitted at the same time, the same proceedings took place. A custom has been thus established which will be followed in the future." (Foster's Comm. I. p. 483-4.)

"The classification is settled by lot when the senators first appear from the new States, in the mode adopted in the first classification, so as to prevent two vacancies occurring in the same State at the same time." (Journal Senate, May 15, 1789, 26th ed., 1820; Baker, A. C. p. 7.)

"The provision for the election of members by rotation was adopted unanimously at the suggestion of Gorham and Randolph. Penn's Frame of Government for Pennsylvania had provided that in the Council one-third of the members should be elected every year, and at the time of the Convention the upper houses of New York, Virginia, and Delaware, as well as of the first-named State, were filled in a similar manner. The idea is said to have been borrowed from the senates of the cities in the Netherlands, who had taken it from Venice." (Foster's Comm. I. p. 471.)

"The rotation principle was in great favour among the Republicans of the seventeenth century. The earliest mention of it in English political history occurs in a pamphlet published by James Harrington—author of 'The Commonwealth of Oceana'—in 1650, which he entitled 'The Rota: or a Model of a Free State, or Equal Commonwealth.' The nature of the scheme may be gathered from Anthony Wood's account of the Rota Club, established by Harrington and his friends:—'The model of it was that the third part of the Senate or House should rote out by ballot every year (not capable of being elected again for three years to come), so that every ninth year the Senate would be wholly altered. No magistrate was to continue above three years, and all to be chosen by ballot. This club of Commonwealthsmen lasted till about 1659.' (Athene Oxon. vol. 11, p. 591.) Milton, who favoured a perpetual Senate, pointed out an objection to this scheme in his pamphlet on 'The Ready and Easy Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth,' published shortly after Harrington's appeared:—'For it appears not how this (retirement by rotation) can be done without danger and mischance of putting out a great number of the best and ablest, in whose stead new elections may bring in as many raw, unexperienced, and otherwise affected, to the weakening and much altering for the worse of public transactions.'" (G. B. Barton, Notes on the Draft Bill, 1891, p. 25.)

"The Senate resembles the Upper Houses of Europe, and differs from those of the British colonies and of most of the States of the Union, in being a permanent body. It does not change all at once, as do bodies created by a single popular election, but undergoes an unceasing process of gradual change and renewal, like a lake into which streams bring fresh water to replace that which the issuing river carries out. This provision was designed to give the Senate that permanency of composition which might qualify it to conduct or control the foreign policy of the nation. An incidental and more valuable result has been the creation of a set of traditions and a corporate spirit, which have tended to form habits of dignity and self-respect. The new senators, being always in a minority, are readily assimilated; and though the balance of power shifts from one party to another, according to the predominance in the State legislatures of one or other party, it shifts more slowly than in bodies directly chosen all at once, and a policy is therefore less apt to be suddenly reversed." (Bryce, Amer. Comm. I. p. 99.)

After the Senate first meets, and after each first meeting following a dissolution, the senators are classified according to the scheme in the first paragraph in this section; thereupon the place or seat of each senator is identified with a term of service annexed to it. That term is not exhausted by the death, disqualification or resignation of the senator. His successor is elected to occupy the place or seat for the remainder of the term. By this paragraph of the section the precise date of the beginning of each term of service is defined. The beginning of a term does not depend upon such uncertain events as the date of the election, the return of the writs, or the swearing in of senators, but on the words of the section itself. On the occasion of the first election of senators, after the establishment of the Commonwealth, the term of service is deemed to have begun on the first day of January preceding the day of election. On the occasion of every general election of senators, the term of service is deemed to have begun on the first day of January preceding the day of election. But, in the case of senators elected to fill places or seats which will become vacant by effluxion of time, the term of service is deemed to begin on the first day of January following the day of election. The new term of service will thus begin at the expiration of the preceding term; although the elections will take place during the currency of the term. Hence it may arise that there will be senators actually in office, their term being unexpired, and senators elect, chosen to succeed the senators in office, but whose terms do not begin until the first day of January following their election.

Further provision for rotation⁸⁶.

14. Whenever the number of senators for a State is increased or diminished, the Parliament of the Commonwealth may make such provision for the vacating of the places of senators for the State as it deems necessary to maintain regularity in the rotation.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—A clause, in substantially this form, was inserted as a drafting amendment at the Melbourne session, before the first report. After the fourth report it was amended, by the substitution of “may” instead of “shall as soon as may be.”

§ 86. “Further Provision for Rotation.”

The number of senators for each State may be increased or diminished at any time by the Federal Parliament, subject to the condition that equal representation of the several Original States must be maintained, and that no Original State shall have less than six senators (sec. 7). Whenever this is done, such further arrangements must be made as may be necessary to maintain regularity in the rotation.

Casual vacancies.

15. If the place of a senator becomes vacant before the expiration of his term of service, the Houses of Parliament of the State⁸⁷ for which he was chosen shall, sitting and voting together, choose a person to hold the place until the expiration of the term⁸⁸, or until the election of a successor⁸⁹ as hereinafter provided, whichever first happens. But if the Houses of Parliament of the State are not in session at the time when the vacancy is notified⁹⁰, the Governor of the State⁹¹, with the advice of the Executive Council thereof⁹², may appoint a person to hold the place until the expiration of fourteen days after the beginning of the next session of the Parliament of the State, or until the election of a successor, whichever first happens.

At the next general election of members of the House of Representatives, or at the next election of senators⁹³ for the State, whichever first happens, a successor shall, if the term has not then expired, be chosen to hold the place from the date of his election until the expiration of the term.

The name of any senator so chosen or appointed shall be certified by the Governor⁹⁴ of the State to the Governor-General.

UNITED STATES.—And if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.—Const. Art. I. sec. 3, sub-sec. 2.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 (which provided for the election of Senators by the Parliament of States) clause 13, Chap. I., was as follows:—

“If the place of a Senator becomes vacant during the recess of the Parliament of the State which he represented, the Governor of the State, by and with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, may appoint a Senator to fill such vacancy until the next session of the Parliament of the State, when the Houses of Parliament shall choose a Senator to fill the vacancy.”

In Committee, it was suggested that it might be better that a vacancy should continue until the State Parliament met, rather than that the nominee principle should be allowed, even temporarily, to invade the Senate. Mr. Barton moved the omission of the provision for a temporary appointment, but this was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891]. pp. 600-5.) At the Adelaide session (the Bill having provided for the direct election of Senators) the clause was first drafted as follows:—

“If the place of a member of the Senate becomes vacant before the expiration of his term of service, the Houses of Parliament of the State he represented shall, sitting and voting together, choose a successor, who shall hold office only during the unexpired portion of the term. And if the Houses of Parliament of the State shall be in recess at the time when the vacancy occurs, the Governor of the State, with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, may appoint some person to fill the vacancy until the beginning of the next session of the Parliament of the State.”

In Committee, the clause was postponed, in order that the Drafting Committee might consider some suggestions that had been made for enabling a senator to be chosen by the people at the next general election, State or Federal, in the State. It was desired to have the vacancy filled by direct election as soon as possible; but the expense of holding a special election throughout the State was an obstacle. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 579-80.) Later on the clause was passed substantially in its present form. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 1948-9, 1101.) Drafting amendments were made at the Sydney session; and also at the Melbourne session before the first report, and after the fourth report.

§ 87. “The Houses of Parliament of the State.”

If a vacancy arises in the representation of any State in the Senate, the Houses of Parliament of the State, being in session at the time when the vacancy is notified, are enjoined to choose a person to hold the place provisionally, that is to say until (1) the expiration of the constitutional term or (2) the election of a successor at the next triennial election of senators or at the next election of representatives, whichever event first happens. The vacancies contemplated by this section are casual or extraordinary vacancies, arising from accidents, such as death, disqualification or resignation, and not those vacancies which take place at the regular expiration of senatorial terms. In thus choosing persons, to provisionally fill vacant places, the members of the Houses of Parliament of the State must sit and vote together—that is to say, the choice is made at a joint sitting of the Chambers, at which the vote of a majority prevails.

Under the Constitution of the United States of America (Art. I. sec. 3) which provides that the Senate “shall be composed of two senators from each State chosen by the legislature thereof,” it has been decided that the two Houses of the State Legislature might, by joint resolution adopted by both of them, without the consent of the State Governor, provide for the manner in which a senatorial election should take place; that the State Constitution could not limit the power of the legislature in that respect. The practice was adopted in several States of electing senators in joint convention of the two legislative Houses, in case the Houses acting separately had failed to make a choice. (Foster’s Comm. I. p. 473.)

In 1866 an Act of Congress was passed for the regulation of senatorial elections. It provides that, if the two Houses of a State legislature are unable to agree in the choice of a senator, a joint assembly of the two Houses shall be held, and the person who receives a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both Houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected. Under this statute it has been held that an election is valid when made in a joint convention by a majority of the members of both Houses, in the absence of a quorum of one of them. (Foster’s Comm. I. p. 475.)

§ 88. “The Expiration of the Term.”

This expression means the end of the period of service, whether it be the three years of a senator of the first class or the six years of a senator of the second class; it is an event that depends on no fortuitous circumstances, being determined by the Constitution itself, which provides that all terms shall expire on the thirty-first day of December, either three years from the beginning thereof or six years from the beginning thereof. The exact date on which the term, annexed to each senatorial seat, begins and ends is fixed by section 13. Every term, whether for three years or six years, begins on the first day of January of some year, and necessarily ends on the thirty-first day of December in some year, except when the terms of all senators are prematurely ended by a dissolution of the Senate. “The expiration of the term,” if it happens before a successor has been elected, renders the election of a successor unnecessary, because the senators elected for the ensuing term, at the ordinary triennial election, then take their seats.

§ 89. “Election of a Successor.”

The choice of a person, by the Houses of Parliament of a State, to take the place of a senator who has ceased to act, is not regarded by the Constitution as the election of a successor; it is merely a provisional arrangement to save the expense of a special State election. The time for the triennial election of senators might be close at hand, in which case the vacancy would be filled without any appreciable additional expense. If, however, the usual triennial election of senators is preceded by a general election of members of the House of Representatives, an equally convenient and prompt method of filling the extraordinary vacancy is available. The legislative selection is only operative until the expiration of the term or the election of a successor, whichever first happens; it is merely an ad interim appointment, in order to save the State from being short of a senator, on the one hand, and to save the State the cost of a special election, on the other; the legislative appointee is not a successor of the deceased, disqualified, or resigned, senator, but merely a temporary holder of the office, pending the election of a successor by the people of the State.

Triennial senatorial elections are held at times partly determined by the Constitution, and partly by the State legislatures. Those times are determined by the Constitution, to the extent that triennial senatorial elections to fill places to become vacant must be held during the last year of the term of service; sec. 13. The exact date, within that year, of such elections, is not fixed by the Constitution. The Parliament of each State is empowered to make laws determining the times of elections of senators for the State; sec. 9. The only restriction on the State power is the one above quoted.

§ 90. "When the Vacancy is Notified."

When a casual vacancy happens in the representation of a State in the Senate, it is the duty of the President to notify the occurrence of such vacancy to the Governor of the State interested. If the President is absent from the Commonwealth at the time it is the duty of the Governor-General to notify the vacancy. (Sec. 21.) The happening of this vacancy should, no doubt, be promptly notified by the Federal to the State authorities, so as to enable the latter to take steps at once to fill it. Until the receipt of the statutory notification, that cannot be done; hence a delay in the notification would delay a choice by the State legislature or an appointment by the State Executive to fill the place until the election of a successor. It is a principle of the Constitution that the representation of States in the Senate should be maintained, as far as possible, with unbroken continuity, and that no State should be, for any time longer than absolutely necessary, short in its representation and consequently deficient in its political strength in the Council of States.

§ 91. "The Governor of the State may . . . appoint."

If the Houses of Parliament of the State, in the representation of which a casual vacancy occurs, are not in session at the time when it is notified, the Governor of the State, with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, may appoint a person to hold the place for a temporary period; that is until the expiration of fourteen days after the beginning of the next session of the Parliament of the State, or until the election of a successor, under the power conferred by the second paragraph of this section. The clear limitations of this section should prevent many questions arising, such as have arisen under the Constitution of the United States. According to one American precedent the Executive of a State may appoint a senator to fill an anticipated vacancy before it actually occurs. (Case of Uriah Tracey, Taft's Senate Election Cases, p. 3; Foster, I. p. 488.) In Lanman's Case, however, it was held that the Governor of a State cannot, during the recess of the legislature, appoint a senator to fill an expected vacancy (Cl. and Hall [U.S.], 871; Baker, Annot. Const. 7.) It has also been held that the Governor of a State may receive the resignation of a member of the House of Representatives of the United States and cause a new election to be held to fill the vacancy without waiting to be notified of the vacancy by the House. (Mercer's Case, Cl. and Hall [U.S.], 44; Edwards' Case, id. 92; Baker, Annot. Const., p. 6.) No such controversies could arise under the Australian Constitution, under which it is obvious that the State Legislature would have no jurisdiction to choose, or the State Executive to appoint, a senator pro tempore until the actual receipt of a notification of the vacancy from the Federal authorities.

§ 92. "With the Advice of the Executive Council."

These words were inserted to make it plain that the provisional appointment of senators, though vested in the Governor of the State, as head of the State Executive, is not one which he should make according to his own personal judgment and discretion, but that it is, in fact, a political appointment to be made by the State Executive, according to the principle of ministerial responsibility. Such an appointment, made on the advice of a State ministry, having the confidence of the State Parliament, would probably be one which the Houses of the State Parliament would make if they were in session at the time. It may be pointed out, however, that even if the words at the head of this note had not been inserted in the clause the result would have been precisely the same; no State Governor would venture to make such an important appointment without the advice of his responsible ministers. The words have been inserted in strict conformity with constitutional usage: as the section creates a new power and function the addition of the words "with the advice of the Executive Council" could not possibly involve an infringement of any established prerogative of the Crown. (See § 60, supra.)

§ 93. "The Next Election of Senators."

These words refer to the next choice of senators, by the suffrages of the people of the State, on the occasion of a triennial election to fill places about to become vacant by effluxion of time. It is to be noted that there is no special section in the Constitution enacting, in so many words, that there shall be an election of senators, by popular vote, every three years; that follows as the necessary result of a combination of sections. Thus section 7 provides that senators shall be chosen for a term of six years. This is qualified by section 13, which provides for the classification of the senators for each State after every general election of senators, according to which half of them will retire every three years. By section 9 the Parliament of each State has exclusive power to make laws determining the times of elections of senators for the State, subject to the condition that elections to fill vacant places must be made in the year at the end of which the places are to become vacant. The expressions "choosing of senators," "choosing the senators," "election of senators," "next election of senators," which occur in Part II. of the Constitution, allude to the triennial elections to fill places about to become vacant, as well as to general elections consequent on a dissolution.

At "the next general election of members of the House of Representatives," or at "the next election of senators for the State," whichever first happens, if the senatorial term has not then expired, the provisional appointment of "a person to hold the place" is superseded by "the election of a successor" to hold the place from the date of his election until the expiration of the term. The election of a successor to a deceased or resigned senator, for the balance of the term, may thus possibly take place at a triennial election, at the same time when three senators of the class in which the vacancy has occurred are elected for the ensuing term which begins on 1st January of the following year. In such a case, it will of course be competent for the temporary holder of the place to be a candidate for the balance of the term and also a candidate for the new term which begins on the expiration of the current term.

§ 94. "Certified by the Governor."

In the United States, the returns from the State authorities, declaring that a certain person has been elected senator, are only prima facie evidence of qualification. (Spaulding v. Mead, Cl. and Hall [U.S.] 157; Reed v. Cosden, id. 353.) The refusal of the State executive to grant a certificate does not prejudice the right of a person entitled to a seat. (Richards' Case, Cl. and Hall [U.S.] 95; Baker, Annot. Const. pp. 10, 11. See Note, § 74, supra.)

Qualifications of senator.

16. The qualifications of a senator⁹⁵ shall be the same as those of a member of the House of Representatives.

UNITED STATES.—No person shall be a senator who shall not have attained the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.—Const. Art. I., sec. 3, sub-sec. 3.

CANADA.—The qualifications of a Senator shall be as follows:—

- (1.) He shall be of the full age of thirty years.
- (2.) He shall be either a natural-born subject of the Queen, or a subject of the Queen naturalized by an Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of one of the Provinces of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, before the Union, or of the Parliament of Canada after the Union:
- (3.) He shall be legally or equitably seised as of freehold, for his own use and benefit, of lands or tenements held in free and common socage, or seised or possessed for his own use and benefit of lands or tenements held in franc-alieu or in roture, within the Province for which he is appointed, of the value of four thousand dollars over and above all rents, dues, debts, charges, mortgages, and incumbrances due or payable out of or charged on or affecting the same:
- (4.) His real and personal property shall be together worth four thousand dollars over and above his debts and liabilities:
- (5.) He shall be resident in the Province for which he is appointed:
- (6.) In the case of Quebec, he shall have his real property qualification in the electoral division for which he is appointed, or shall be resident in that division.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 23.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 the qualifications prescribed for a Senator differed in three respects from those of a member of the House of Representatives:—(1.) He must have been of the age of 30 years—as against 21 years for the other House; (2.) He must have been resident in the Commonwealth for five years—as against three in the other House; (3.) He must, if not natural-born, have been naturalized for five years—as against three years for the other House. In Committee there was some debate as to the qualifications of residence and naturalization. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891] pp. 605-10.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced substantially in its present form. In Committee, Mr. Walker moved an amendment requiring that a Senator should be of the age of 25 years, but this was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 1191.)

At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Council of Victoria, to add “with the exception that he must be of the full age of 30 years” was negatived by 29 votes to 4; and a suggestion by both Houses of the Parliament of Tasmania, requiring that Senators should be of the age of 25 years, was also negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897] pp. 989-90.) The words “the same as” were added as a drafting amendment.

§ 95. “The Qualifications of a Senator.”

Until altered by the Parliament the qualifications of a senator, being the same as those of a member of the House of Representatives, will be as follows:—

- (i.) He must be of the full age of 21 years.
- (ii.) He must be an elector entitled to vote at elections of the House of Representatives, or qualified to become an elector.
- (iii.) He must have been for three years at least a resident within the limits of the Commonwealth as existing at the time when he is chosen.
- (iv.) He must be a subject of the Queen, either natural-born or for at least five years naturalized under a law of the United Kingdom, or of a colony which has become or becomes a State, or of the Commonwealth, or of a State.

In addition to these positive qualifications a senator must not be the subject of any of those disabilities enumerated in sections 44 and 45.

The federal constitution having fixed the qualification of members of the Federal Legislature, no additional qualification can be added by the State Legislatures. (Barney v. McCreery, Cl. and H. [U.S.] 176; Turney v. Marshall, 1 Cong. El. Cas. [U.S.] 167; Trumbull's Case, id. 618.) The constitution of Illinois (1848) provided that the judges of the Supreme and Circuit Courts of the States should not be eligible to any other office of public trust or profit in that state, or in the United States, during the term for which they should be elected, nor for one year thereafter. The Federal House of Representatives held this provision of the constitution of Illinois void, in so far as it applied to persons elected members of the said House. (Turney v. Marshall, supra; Trumbull's Case, supra. Baker, Annot. Const. p. 5.)

Returns from the State authorities, showing that a certain person has been elected senator, are prima facie evidence of qualification only. (Spaulding v. Mead, Cl. and Hall, 157; Reed v. Cosden, id. 353.) The refusal of the Executive of the State to grant a certificate does not prejudice the right of any person entitled to a seat. (Richards' Case, Cl. and Hall, 95; Baker, Annot. Const. pp. 10, 11.)

Election of President.

17. The Senate shall, before proceeding to the despatch of any other business, choose a senator to be the President⁹⁶ of the Senate; and as often as the office of President becomes vacant the Senate shall again choose a senator to be the President.

The President shall cease to hold his office if he ceases to be a senator. He may be removed from office by a vote of the Senate, or he may resign his office or his seat by writing addressed to the Governor-General.

UNITED STATES.—The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate.—Const. Art. I. sec. III. sub-sec. 4.

CANADA.—The Governor-General may from time to time, by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, appoint a Senator to be Speaker of the Senate, and may remove him and appoint another in his stead.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 34.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—The clause in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was substantially the same, with additional provisions that “The President shall preside at all meetings of the Senate; and the choice of the President shall be made known to the Governor-General by a deputation of the Senate.” In Committee, Sir John Bray moved to omit the words “by a deputation of the Senate,” but this was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1891, pp. 610-1.) At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause of 1891 was adopted verbatim. At the Melbourne session, drafting amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 96. “Choose a Senator to be the President.”

The Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England is the Prolocutor or Lord Speaker of the House of Lords by prescription. It is singular, says May, that the President of that deliberative body is not necessarily a member of it. It has even happened that the Lord Keeper has officiated for years as Speaker without being raised to the peerage. (May's Parl. Prac., 10th ed., 1893, p. 184.) Under the Constitution of the United States the Vice-President of the Republic is elected by popular suffrage, at the same time as the President; he is next in succession to the President, and is ex officio the presiding officer of the Senate. The Republican Senate, like the aristocratic House of Lords, has no voice in the selection of its official head. By the Canadian Constitution the Governor-General is authorized from time to time to appoint a senator to be Speaker of the Senate and to remove him and appoint another in his stead. The Constitution of the Commonwealth vests in the Senate itself the power of choosing and removing its President. The President is not elected for any particular term, but he will cease to hold office (1) if he ceases to be a senator; (2) if he is removed from office by a vote of the Senate; (3) if he resigns his office.

The duties of President are those usually assigned to and exercised by the presiding officers of legislative bodies; among these may be—to maintain order and decorum; to enforce the rules of debate; to recognize a senator who wishes to speak and thus to give him the floor; to put the question before the Senate; to ascertain and declare the will of the Senate, either on the voices, or as the result of a division; to appoint tellers to take a division; to supervise the officers of the House and see that the votes and proceedings are properly recorded, so far as those duties are not otherwise regulated by the standing orders of the Senate, passed in conformity with the Constitution. (Foster, Comm. I., p. 501.) One function in particular appears to be recognized as the particular privilege of the presiding officer of the Upper House of every Parliament constructed on the British model; it is the right to present to the representative of the Crown a joint address of both Houses. According to the English practice, when a joint address is to be presented by both Houses to the Queen, the Lord Chancellor and the House of Lords and the Speaker and the House of Commons proceed in state to the palace at the time appointed. On reaching the palace the two Houses assemble in a chamber adjoining the throne room, and when her Majesty is prepared to receive them the doors are thrown open and the Lord Chancellor and the Speaker advance, side by side, followed by the members of the two Houses respectively. The Lord Chancellor reads the address and presents it to her Majesty, who then returns an answer, and both Houses retire. (May, 10th ed. p. 430.) More important, however, than such ceremonial functions will be the duty of the President of the Senate to assist in the enforcement of the law of the Constitution, and in particular to see that the privileges of the Senate, such as those contained in sections 53, 54, 55, and 56, are not invaded.

The Constitution makes no express provision for the salary of the President. The Federal Parliament, however, has ample power to appropriate a salary for the office under section 51—xxxix.

Absence of President.

18. Before or during any absence of the President⁹⁷, the Senate may choose a senator to perform his duties in his absence.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, the clause began “In case of the absence of the President.” In the Adelaide Bill of 1897 these introductory words were omitted. At the Sydney session, the words “Before or during any absence of the President” were introduced as a drafting amendment.

§ 97. “Absence of the President.”

This section makes provision for the appointment of a senator to act during the absence of the President. The Constitution is silent on the subject of permanent executive officers of the Upper House. The Senate of the Commonwealth, unlike the Senate of the United States, has been assigned no voice in the appointment of the officials necessary to carry on the business of the House. Until federal legislation deals with the matter, such appointments can be made only by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth. The chief officers of the Upper House, generally, are the Clerk of the Parliaments, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, and the Assistant Clerk. The Clerk of the Parliaments has to make true entries and records of the things done and passed in the Parliaments. The Clerk Assistant has to attend to the table, with the Clerk. and to take minutes of the proceedings and orders of the House. The Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod has to assist in the introduction of members, and other ceremonies; he is sent to desire the attendance of the members of the Lower House at the opening and proroguing of Parliament. He also executes orders for the commitment of parties guilty of breaches of privilege and contempt. (May, 10th ed. p. 194.)

Resignation of senator.

19. A senator may, by writing addressed to the President, or to the Governor-General if there is no President or if the President is absent from the Commonwealth, resign⁹⁸ his place, which thereupon shall become vacant⁹⁹.

CANADA.—A senator may, by writing under his hand addressed to the Governor-General, resign his place in the Senate, and thereupon the same shall be vacant.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 30.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—A similar clause is in the Constitutions of all the Australian colonies. In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 the clause was substantially in the same words; at the Adelaide session of the Convention in 1897 it was introduced and passed as it now stands.

§ 98. “A Senator may . . . resign.”

The seat of a senator is vacated by a resignation addressed to, and delivered to, the Governor of his State. It does not depend upon notice of acceptance. (Bledsøe's Case, Cl. and Hall [U.S.], 869; Baker, Annot. Const. p. 7.)

§ 99. “Shall become Vacant.”

The Queensland Constitution Act, 1867, sec. 23, provides that if a member of the Legislative Council should, for two successive sessions of the Legislature of the colony, fail to give his attendance in the Council without the permission of Her Majesty or of the Governor of the Colony, signified by the Governor to the Council, his seat in the Council shall become vacant. A Councillor absented himself during the whole of three sessions, having previously obtained leave of absence for a year, which period of time, in the event, covered the whole of the first and part of the second session. The Privy Council held that his seat was vacated on the ground that the permission did not cover two successive sessions. (Att.-Gen. [Queensland] v. Gibbon, 12 App. Cas. 442.)

Vacancy by absence.

20. The place of a senator shall become vacant if for two consecutive months of any session of the Parliament he, without the permission of the Senate, fails to attend the Senate.

CANADA.—The place of a senator shall become vacant . . . if for two consecutive sessions of the Parliament he fails to give his attendance in the Senate.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 31.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—A similar clause is in the Constitutions of all the Australian colonies. In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, the clause was the same except that the absence specified was “for one whole session of the Parliament,” and that the permission of the Senate was to be “entered on its journals.” (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], p. 611.) At the Adelaide session, 1897, it was introduced in the same words. In Committee, on Mr. Gordon's motion, “two consecutive months of any session” was substituted for “one whole session" (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 680.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Tasmanian House of Assembly to substitute "thirty consecutive sitting days in any session" was negatived. At the Melbourne session, after the fourth report, the words "entered on its journals" were omitted.

Vacancy to be notified.

21. Whenever a vacancy happens in the Senate, the President, or if there is no President or if the President is absent from the Commonwealth the Governor-General, shall notify the same to the Governor of the State in the representation of which the vacancy has happened.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—The clause in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was substantially in the same words, and was adopted verbatim at the Adelaide session (1897). (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 680.) At the Sydney session Mr. Glynn suggested that there should be a resolution of the Senate declaring the vacancy. This, however, was thought unnecessary. The word "forthwith," before "notify," was omitted as unnecessary. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 990-1.) At the Melbourne session, before the first report, a drafting amendment was made.

Quorum¹⁰⁰.

22. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the presence of at least one-third of the whole number of the senators shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers.

UNITED STATES.—A majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide.—Const. Art. I, sec. 5, sub-s. 1.

CANADA.—Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, the presence of at least fifteen senators, including the Speaker, shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 35.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 the clause was in the same form, with the addition, after "senators," of the words "as provided by the Constitution." At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced in the same form, except that the words "until the Parliament otherwise provides" were omitted. In Committee, on Mr. Gordon's motion, the words "as provided by this Constitution" were omitted. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 682.) At the Sydney session, on the motion of Mr. Higgins, the words "until the Parliament otherwise provides" were inserted. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 991-2.)

§ 100. "Quorum."

"The [American] Constitution does not expressly provide as to how the presence of a quorum shall be determined; but it seems to me to imply, in the power of each House to force the presence of members in order to form a quorum, that physical presence is the test, whether or no the members present all act. Such has not been the general practice, however, to this time. It has been regarded as necessary that a quorum shall not merely be present, but shall also act." (Burgess, vol. II, p. 55.)

For discussion of the principle of the quorum, see Note, § 137, infra.

Voting in Senate.

23. Questions arising in the Senate shall be determined by a majority of votes, and each senator shall have one vote¹⁰¹. The President shall in all cases be entitled to a vote¹⁰²; and when the votes are equal the question shall pass in the negative.

UNITED STATES.—Each senator shall have one vote.—Const., Art. I., sec. 3, sub-s. 1.

[The President] shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.—Art. I., sec. 3, sub-s. 4.

CANADA.—Questions arising in the Senate shall be decided by a majority of voices, and the Speaker shall in all cases have a vote, and when the voices are equal the decision shall be deemed to be in the negative.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 36.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, the clause was substantially the same. In Committee, Sir Samuel Griffith explained that the provision that the President should have a vote was to secure the full representation of the State to which he belonged. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 611-2.) At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was adopted in the same form. In Committee there was a short discussion of the provision for the President's vote. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 682-3.) At the Melbourne session, before the first report, the words "and each senator shall have one vote" were transferred from clause 7.

"Members of the Senate vote as individuals, that is to say, the vote a senator gives is his own and not that of his State. It was otherwise in the Congress of the old Confederation before 1789; it is otherwise in the present Federal Council of the German Empire, in which each State votes as a whole, though the number of her votes is proportioned to her population. Accordingly, in the American Senate, the two senators from a State may belong to opposite parties; and this often happens in the case of senators from States in which the two great parties are pretty equally balanced, and the majority oscillates between them. Suppose Ohio to have to elect a senator in 1886. The Democrats have a majority in the State legislature; and a Democrat is therefore chosen senator. In 1888 the other Ohio senatorship falls vacant. But by this time the balance of parties in Ohio has shifted. The Republicans control the legislature; a Republican senator is therefore chosen, and goes to Washington to vote against his Democratic colleague. This fact has largely contributed to render the senators independent of the State legislatures, for as these latter bodies sit for short terms (the larger of the two Houses usually for two years only), a senator has during the greater part of his six years' term to look for re-election not to the present, but to a future State legislature." (Bryce, vol. i., 97.)

§ 102. "The President shall . . . be entitled to a Vote."

The object of providing that the President, unlike the Speaker of the House of Representatives, shall be entitled to a vote in all cases, is that the State which he represents may not be deprived of the benefit of the constitutional privilege of equal representation. He is not given a casting vote as well, because that would give his State more than equal representation. Some other provision had, therefore, to be made for the case of an equality of votes; so the Constitution declares that in that event the question shall be resolved in the negative. This is based upon the universally recognized principle that affirmative action, in any legislative body, must be supported by a majority.

PART III.—THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Constitution of House of Representatives.

24. The House of Representatives¹⁰³ shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the Commonwealth¹⁰⁴, and the number of such members shall be, as nearly as practicable¹⁰⁵, twice the number of the senators¹⁰⁶.

The number of members chosen in the several States shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people¹⁰⁷, and shall, until the Parliament otherwise provides¹⁰⁸, be determined, whenever necessary¹⁰⁹, in the following manner :—

- (i.) A quota shall be ascertained¹¹⁰ by dividing the number of the people of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by twice the number of the senators :
- (ii.) The number of members to be chosen in each State¹¹¹ shall be determined by dividing the number of the people of the State, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by the quota ; and if on such division there is a remainder greater than one-half of the quota¹¹², one more member shall be chosen in the State.

But notwithstanding anything in this section, five members at least¹¹³ shall be chosen in each Original State.

UNITED STATES.—The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.—Const. Art. I., sec. 2, sub-sec. 1.

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers. . . . The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative.—Id. Art. I., sec. 2, sub-sec. 3 ; and see Amendment xiv.

CANADA.—The House of Commons shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, consist of one hundred and eighty-one members, of whom eighty-two shall be elected for Ontario, sixty-five for Quebec, nineteen for Nova Scotia, and fifteen for New Brunswick.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 37.

On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four Provinces shall be re-adjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject, and according to the following rules :

- (1.) Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members :
- 2.) There shall be assigned to each of the other Provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained) :

- (3.) In the computation of the number of members for a Province a fractional part not exceeding one-half of the whole number requisite for entitling the Province to a member shall be disregarded; but a fractional part exceeding one-half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number:
- (4.) On any such readjustment the number of members for a Province shall not be reduced, unless the proportion which the number of the population of the Province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the Province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards:
- (5.) Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing Parliament.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 51.

SWITZERLAND.—The National Council is composed of representatives of the Swiss people, chosen in the ratio of one member for each 20,000 persons of the total population. Fractions of upwards of 10,000 persons are reckoned as 20,000. Every Canton, and in the divided Cantons every half Canton, chooses at least one representative.—Swiss Const., Art. 72.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Chapter I. of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 contained the following clauses:—

24. "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every three years by the people of the several States, according to their respective numbers; and until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, each State shall have one Representative for every 30,000 of its people.

"Provided that in the case of any of the existing colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the province of South Australia, until the number of the people is such as to entitle the State to four Representatives, it shall have four Representatives."

27. "When upon the apportionment of Representatives it is found that after dividing the number of the people of a State by the number in respect of which a State is entitled to one Representative there remains a surplus greater than one-half of such number, the State shall have an additional Representative."

29. "A fresh apportionment of Representatives to the States shall be made after each census of the people of the Commonwealth, which shall be taken at intervals not longer than ten years. But a fresh apportionment shall not take effect until the then next general election."

In Committee, the question of apportionment was shortly discussed. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1891, pp. 612-3, 639.) At the Adelaide session, 1897, the Bill as introduced provided for a quota based on a "two to one ratio" of the Houses, the clause being as follows:—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the several States, according to their respective numbers; as nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the House of Representatives for every one member of the Senate.

"Until the Parliament otherwise provides, each State shall have one member for each quota of its people. The quota shall, whenever necessary, be ascertained by dividing the population of the Commonwealth as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by twice the number of the members of the senate; and the number of members to which each State is entitled shall be determined by dividing the population of the State, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by the quota.

"But each of the existing colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the province of South Australia, shall be entitled to five Representatives at the least."

The "apportionment" clause of the Bill of 1891 was also introduced verbatim. On the motion to go into Committee, the new provision was explained by Mr. Barton. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 435-7.) In Committee, it was explained again by Mr. O'Connor. Sir Geo. Turner objected to the clause, both as being too rigidly mechanical, and as checking the due increase of representatives with the increase in population. Mr. Glynn approved of it, as the alternative of a fixed quota would soon lead to so large a House that the provision for a minimum representation of the smaller States would become valueless. Mr. Higgins argued that there was no possible connection between the numbers of the two Houses, and opposed the scheme because it seemed to be leading up to a proposal for a joint sitting. Mr. Reid approved of it for the same reason, and also because it would tend to prevent an inordinate growth of the size of the House. Mr. Isaacs' objection was that the States where the growth of population was least would suffer a decrease in their representation. Mr. O'Connor pointed out that the numbers of the House of Representatives might be increased at any time by increasing the number of senators for each State. Sir John Downer supported the clause as preventing the effacement of the Senate by an undue expansion of the House of Representatives. Mr. Deakin thought the ratio excellent to begin with, but thought that the clause might prove unduly rigid, and suggested that the words "Until the Parliament otherwise provides" should be placed at the beginning. Sir Geo. Turner accordingly moved to insert those words before the words "as nearly as practicable," but this was negated by 26 votes to 9. Mr. Solomon then proposed that representation in the House of Representatives should be upon a sliding scale, instead of according to population; but this was not taken seriously and was negated without division. Mr. Reid proposed to reduce the minimum from "five" to "four," but subsequently withdrew the amendment. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 683-715.) At a later stage the clause was verbally amended. (Id. p. 1191.)

At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Assemblies of New South Wales and Victoria, to omit the "two to one ratio," and insert a provision that, until the Parliament otherwise provides, each State shall have one representative for every 30,000 of its people, was negated, after considerable debate, by 26 votes to 17. A verbal correction was made. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 420-53.)

At the Melbourne session, before the first report, the clause was verbally amended. After the first report, an amendment was carried, on Mr. O'Connor's motion, by which the words "chosen by the people of the Commonwealth" were substituted for "chosen by the people of the several States;" and the quota and re-apportionment provisions were recast into a separate clause, 24A, but in substantially their present form. Sir George Turner then proposed again to omit the "two to one ratio," and substitute a provision that until the Parliament otherwise provides, each State shall have one Representative for every 50,000 of its people. This was negated, after debate, by 25 votes to 10. The re-apportionment clause was then struck out, being provided for in the quota clause. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1827-38.) After the fourth report, the two clauses (24 and 24A) were condensed into one, with verbal alterations.

§ 103. "The House of Representatives."

As the Senate is the legislative organ representing the States, so the House of Representatives is the legislative organ representing the nation. This appears from the exact words of the Constitution. The Senate is composed of an equal number of senators "for each State," directly chosen by the people of the State (sec. 7). The House of Representatives is composed of members directly "chosen by the people of the Commonwealth," and the number of members chosen in the several States is required to be in proportion to the respective numbers of the people. In one chamber the States are equally represented. In the other chamber the people are proportionately represented. The Senate represents the States as political units. The House represents the people as individual units.

In declaring that the House of Representatives is chosen by the "people of the Commonwealth," the Constitution follows the precedent of Switzerland, which declares that the National Council represents "the Swiss people;" whereas the House of Representatives in the United States is "chosen by the people of the several States"—a phrase which does not so clearly express its national element.

In our review of the meaning of the phrase, "Federal Commonwealth" (Note, § 27 supra), we have seen that the Commonwealth is a community created on the model of a national State with a federal structure;—National in uniting the people, Federal in uniting the States, and, for certain purposes, maintaining the autonomy and individuality of each State, and assigning to each State a share in the dual system of government. It is hardly necessary once more to emphasize the principle that the Commonwealth as a political State should not be confused with the Federal Government. The Federal Government, consisting of three divisions—the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary—is charged with the duty of exercising certain defined powers and functions, assigned to it by the Commonwealth in and through the Constitution.

The Federal Government is only one part of the dual system of government by which the people are ruled; the other parts of the dual system are the State Governments, charged with the duty of exercising the residuary powers and functions of government, reserved to them by the Commonwealth in and through the Constitution.

The House of Representatives is one of the two Chambers of the legislative organization of the Federal Government. It gives particular force and expression to what may be described as the national principle of the Commonwealth. In that great assembly the national principle will find full scope and representation. Its operation and tendency will be in the direction of the unification and consolidation of the people of the Commonwealth into one integrated whole, irrespective of State boundaries. In its constitution it represents “the people of the Commonwealth,” as distinguished from “the people of the States.” The natural bent and inclination of its policy will, therefore, be to regard its constituents as one united people; one in community of rights and interests; one in their title to the equal protection of the law; one in the claim to fair and beneficent treatment; one in destiny. On the other hand, the Senate, as well as the High Court, will tend to check any unconstitutional encroachments on the reserved realm of provincial autonomy. If in both chambers the people had been represented in proportion to their numbers, the practical result would have been the establishment of a unified government, in which the States, as political entities, would have been absolutely unrecognized, and would have been soon reduced to a subordinate position. The Convention was entrusted with no such duty, under the Enabling Acts by which it was called into existence; its mandate was to draft a Constitution in which the federal, as well as the national elements, were recognized.

The House of Representatives is not only the national chamber; it is the democratic chamber; it is the grand depository and embodiment of the liberal principles of government which pervade the entire constitutional fabric. It is the chamber in which the progressive instincts and popular aspirations of the people will be most likely to make themselves first felt. This characteristic is not founded on any difference in the franchise of the House of Representatives from that of the Senate, because both franchises are the same; it arises from the fact that, by the Constitution, it is expressly intended to be such a House, and that by its organization and functions it is best fitted to be the arena in which national progress will find room for development.

The House of Representatives of the Commonwealth bears a close resemblance to the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and occupies the corresponding position in the scheme of government.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES COMPARED.—We will now proceed to draw attention to certain features in the constitution and functions of the House of Representatives in which it resembles the House of Commons, and certain other features and functions in which it differs from that historic Chamber:—

Resemblance.—The members of both the House of Commons and the House of Representatives are elected by the people, voting in national constituencies, and consequently they represent national elements. They both exercise supreme supervision over the finances. This is secured by the exclusive power of originating proposed laws appropriating public money and imposing taxation, and in the inability of the House of Lords in all cases, and of the Senate with certain exceptions, to amend such proposed laws. This control of the finances will tend to carry with it the predominant control of the Executive, and hence the system known as Responsible Government.

Differences.—The House of Commons is the National Chamber of the Empire, exercising in conjunction with the other branches of the Imperial Parliament unlimited, unchallengeable sovereign authority. The House of Representatives is the National Chamber of the Commonwealth, which is merely an outlying portion of the Empire, the Parliament of which is endowed only with restricted and enumerated powers, delegated to it through the Federal Constitution by the parent Parliament. The House of Representatives is a division of a subordinate law-making body, whose mandates are of the nature of by-laws, valid whilst within the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the Constitution, but invalid if they go beyond the limits of such jurisdiction. (Dicey, Law of the Const. p. 137.)

Another important point of difference between the House of Commons and the House of Representatives has been pointed out by Dr. Burgess. Since the reform and revolution of 1832, the House of Commons, he says, has occupied a double position in the English system. It is one branch of the legislature, and it is also the sovereign organization of the State. In the former capacity it has no more power than the House of Lords; in the latter it is supreme over the King and the Lords. The great result of the reform movement of 1832 is, he contends, that the people became politically organized in the House of Commons. In other words, the organization of the State, within the Constitution, is now the same as was its organization back of the Constitution. The House of Commons, newly elected after a dissolution on a particular principle, or measure, is the political people organized through their representatives in that House. There is thus, he says, a correspondence between the revolutionary organization of the State, back of the Constitution, and its continuing organization within the Constitution. (Burgess, Political Sci. vol. i. p. 95; vol. ii. pp. 38-9.) At the beginning of its constitutional career, the House of Representatives will not occupy such a commanding relative position as the House of Commons, for the reason previously stated that its powers are limited by the Constitution. Its capacity to initiate reforms with a view to the acquisition of further power is, however, with the exceptions mentioned in sec. 128, unbounded. It cannot, like the House of Commons, through ministers having its confidence, intimidate or coerce the Upper House and the Crown to agree to a proposed amendment of the Constitution; the ultimate determination of all such constitutional proposals is vested in a body of persons, defined by the Constitution as a majority of the electors of the Commonwealth voting, including majorities in more than half the States. Such majorities constitute the quasi-sovereign organization of the Commonwealth, considered as a political State. But the House of Representatives can originate such constitutional proposals, and cause them to be submitted to the Federal electors for their decision; and it cannot be doubted that the influence of the members of such a strong chamber in securing an affirmative vote in favour of its proposals will be very powerful indeed.

§ 104. "The People of the Commonwealth."

Attention may be drawn to the above expression "the people of the Commonwealth" for the purpose of contrasting it with another, to be found in section 7, "the people of the States." (Note, § 68, supra.) A federation is, as we have already seen, defined by some authorities as a State having a dual system of government; (see "Federal," § 27, supra); hence, in a federation it is said there is a dual citizenship. It follows that each natural-born or naturalized subject of the Queen permanently residing within the limits of the Commonwealth is entitled to be considered as a citizen of the Commonwealth, and, at the same time, a citizen of the State in which he resides. Every such person thus owes a double duty, and can claim a double right; a duty to the Commonwealth, as the great community embracing all the people, to yield obedience to its laws, to assist in its defence, and to take part in promoting its interests; a right to claim from the Commonwealth the equal protection of its laws, and to share in the honour and advantage of its rule. Such a person also owes a duty to the particular State in which he resides, regarding that State as a part of the Commonwealth, guaranteed to possess and enjoy certain privileges and immunities; a duty to obey its laws, and at the same time to assist in defending the State domain against unconstitutional invasion ; a right to demand from the State the equal protection of the laws of the State. In one capacity such a person is described by the Constitution as one of "the people of the Commonwealth ;" in the other he is one of "the people of a State." From this dual citizenship, and, in order to assist in its preservation, every person living under such a form of government has a duality of political rights and powers. He is entitled, not only to assist in carrying on the government of his State, as a part of the Commonwealth, but to assist in the government of that wider organization of the nation itself. In the latter work, taken and considered by itself, he has also a dual right and power ; viz., to join in returning members to the House of Representatives in which centralizing, consolidating, nationalizing, and progressive elements of the community are represented, and also to assist in returning members to the Senate, in which the moderating, restraining, conserving and provincial elements of the community are represented. The duty of a citizen having these dual functions, and of the Federal Parliament so dually constituted, will be to reconcile and harmonize all these apparently conflicting yet necessary and inevitable forces.

§ 105. "As Nearly as Practicable."

These words are not intended to allow the Parliament a discretionary latitude in fixing the number of the members of the House of Representatives, but to provide for the slight variation that may be caused by the provision for the minimum representation of a State, and also by the provision for representing fractions of a quota. According to the mode provided in this section for determining the number of members, the "quota" of representation is to be ascertained by pure arithmetic. So far, the words, "as nearly as practicable" are unnecessary. But the quota so obtained, though it of course divides exactly into the population of the Commonwealth, is not likely to divide exactly into the population of each State. There will probably be fractions in each State, arithmetically entitled to a fraction of a member ; and whether these fractions are ignored altogether, or whether provision is made—as in this section—for assigning a member to any fraction greater than one-half the quota, the result may be to slightly disturb the "two to one ratio." A further, and, at present, more considerable element of disturbance is the provision that each State shall have at least five representatives. On a population basis, Tasmania is at present only entitled to three representatives ; and her two additional members, not being allowed for by the quota calculation, go to increase the number of members beyond the "two to one ratio."

The Parliament, when it makes "other provisions" for determining the number of members, will be bound by the constitutional provision to make their number "as nearly as practicable twice the number of the senators ;" and the clear intention is that the absolute ratio should only be departed from, so far as may be necessary to adjust fractional and minimum representation.

§ 106. "Twice the Number of the Senators."

There is a constitutional limit to the number of members of the House of Representatives, viz., that it shall be, as nearly as practicable, twice the number of the senators ; in other words there must be two representatives to one senator. This provision was described in the course of the Convention Debates as the "two to one ratio." In this respect, the rule regulating the numerical strength of the Australian House of Representatives differs both from that of the American House of Representatives and from that of the Canadian House of Commons.

Under the American Constitution the first House of Representatives consisted of 65 members, of which there was one for every 30,000 of the qualified inhabitants. Congress was given general power to apportion representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers, and could therefore increase the number of representatives without reference to the number of senators. This power was subject to one limitation; viz., that there should never be more than one representative for every 30,000 inhabitants. After the census of 1790 the first Congressional apportionment took place. The number of representatives was increased to 106, which, divided among the aggregate population, gave one representative for every 33,000. After the census of 1810 the number of representatives was raised to 183, which, divided among the population, gave one for every 35,000. In 1820 the number of representatives was brought up to 213, which gave one to every 40,000. In 1830 the representatives were increased to 242, or one for every 47,700. In 1840 the representatives were reduced to 223, or one for every 70,680. In 1850 the representatives were increased to 233, or one for every 93,000. (Sheppard's Constitutional Text Book, 1863.) In the latest Apportionment Act, based on the census of 1890, the number of representatives was fixed at 357, which gave one representative to every 173,900. (Statesman's Year Book, 1899, p. 1130.) So, as the population went on increasing, the number of members to divide among the population has from time to time increased. The increase of members, however, does not proceed in proportion to the increase of the population. The proportion of representatives to population has been gradually diminished, from one representative for every quota of 30,000 in 1789, to one representative for every quota of 173,900 in 1890.

The British North America Act, 1867, sec. 37, provided that the Dominion House of Commons should at first consist of 181 members, of whom 82 were assigned to Ontario, 65 to Quebec, 19 to Nova Scotia, and 15 to New Brunswick. By sec. 52 of the same Act power was given to the Parliament of Canada to increase the number of the members of the House of Commons, subject, however, to the condition that the proportionate representation prescribed by the Act should not be thereby disturbed. The basis for re-adjustment after each decennial census is that Quebec shall always have the fixed number of 65 members, and that each of the other Provinces shall be assigned the number of members which bears the same proportion to its population as the number 65 bears to the population of Quebec—a fractional part exceeding half a quota being regarded as a whole quota. (See p. 445, supra.)

On the basis of the census of the Dominion taken in April, 1891, and in accordance with a redistribution bill passed in 1892, the House of Commons consists of 213 members—92 for Ontario, 65 for Quebec, 20 for Nova Scotia, 14 for New Brunswick, 7 for Manitoba, 6 for British Columbia, 5 for Prince Edward Island, and 4 for the North-West Territories. The ratio of members to population is now one to 22,688. (Statesman's Year Book, 1899, p. 221.)

In the Draft Bill of 1891 it was provided (as in the Constitution of the United States) that there should be one representative for every 30,000 of the population of the Commonwealth, but that this quota should be alterable by the Federal Parliament; there was no provision made for any maximum number of members. As the population increased, the representation could be increased by an additional member for every 30,000.

It has been estimated that, if the Commonwealth had been established in 1897 and the House of representatives constituted on the basis of one member for every 50,000 of the population, that House would have consisted of about 71 members, of which New South Wales would have had 26, Victoria 24, Queensland 9, South Australia 7, Tasmania 3, Western Australia 2. In 1901, on the assumption that the past rates of increase of population continued, New South Wales would have 32, Victoria 27, Queensland 13, South Australia 9, Western Australia 4, and Tasmania 3, total 88. According to the same average of increase the House of Representatives would, by the year 1941, have a total of 446 members. (Mr. R. E. O'Connor, Conv. Deb., Adel., 1897, p. 685.)

This Constitution places no limit on the power of the Parliament to increase the size of the House of Representatives, except that the Senate must be increased in the same proportion, so as to preserve the "two to one ratio." It, however, effectually prevents any such rapid automatic increase as is foreshadowed in the calculations above referred to. The number of representatives depends upon the number of senators, and the number of senators does not increase automatically at all. The number of senators may, however, be increased in two ways—either by increasing the number of senators for each State or by increasing the number of States.

The Parliament may increase or diminish the number of senators for each State, provided that equal representation of the original States shall be maintained and that no Original State shall have less than six senators (sec. 7). The number of senators may also be increased by the admission or establishment of new States (sec. 121). There are thus two methods by which the number of senators may be increased; (1) by an Act of the Federal Parliament increasing the number of senators for each existing State, and (2) by an Act of the Federal Parliament, admitting or establishing a new State or States and thus introducing additional senators. Accordingly, though apparently the number of representatives is determined by the number of Senators, yet the fact that the number of senators may be increased to any extent by the Parliament makes the number of the House of Representatives equally elastic (see Note, § 116, infra).

This "two to one ratio" is a rigid element and basic requirement of much importance and significance; it is embedded in the Constitution; it is beyond the reach of modification by the Federal Parliament, and can only be altered by an amendment of the Constitution. It was adopted after due consideration and for weighty reasons. It was considered that, as it was desirable, in a Constitution of this kind, to define and fix the relative powers of the two Houses, it was also but fair and reasonable to define their relative proportions, in numerical strength, to each other, so as to give that protection and vital force by which the proper exercise of those powers could be legally secured. It was considered extremely necessary to prevent an automatic or arbitrary increase in the number of members of the House of Representatives, by which there would be a continually growing disparity between the number of members of that House and the Senate; and to give some security for maintaining the numerical strength, as well as the Constitutional power, of the Senate. It was argued that if the number of the members of the Senate remained stationary, whilst the number of the members of the House of Representatives were allowed to go on increasing with the progressive increase of population, the House would become inordinately large and inordinately expensive, whilst the Senate would become weak and impotent. It was said that to allow the proportion of the Senate towards the House of Representatives to become the merest fraction, would in course of time lead practically to the abolition of the Senate, or at any rate, to the loss of that influence, prestige, and dignity to which it is entitled under the Constitution. In reply to the argument founded on the danger of disparity, arising between the number of members of the Senate and the number of members of the House of Representatives, attention was drawn to the Constitution of the United States of America, under which Congress had unlimited power to increase the number of members of the House, without increasing the number of senators; which power had not been recklessly or improvidently exercised. The power and status of the Senate had not been prejudiced by the gradual increase in the number of representatives. In answer to this, it was contended that the Senate of the United States of America had maintained its position in the Constitution largely owing to its possession of certain important judicial, legislative and executive powers, which had not been granted to the Senate of the Commonwealth, such as the sole power of trying cases of impeachment; the power to ratify or to refuse to ratify treaties made by the President with foreign nations; and the power to refuse to confirm executive appointments made by the President. These powers were the main sources of the strength of the American Senate, which prevented any wide disparity in numbers between it and the House of Representatives from causing it to drift into the insignificance of a small committee or board. The Senate of the Commonwealth, being deprived of such powers, should be protected against the danger of disparity in numbers. As regards the necessity, which might hereafter arise, of increasing the number of representatives to meet the demands of an increased and increasing population, it was not likely that the Senate would deny an increase in the House of Representatives when it secured an increase itself. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 435-7, 683-98; Sydney, pp. 429-52.)

The number of members chosen by the people of the Commonwealth in the several States is to be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people. The words of the corresponding section in the Constitution of the United States of America (Art. I. sec. ii. sub-sec. 3), are, that representatives shall be apportioned among the several States of the Union "according to their respective numbers," provided that their representation should not be greater than the proportion of 1 to 30,000. In the Draft Bill of 1891, part III. sec. 24, it was proposed that representatives should be chosen by the people of the several States, "according to their respective numbers," provided that their representation should not be greater than 1 to 30,000. In the Constitution of the United States it was further provided that each State should have at least one representative; and, until the first enumeration was made, the number of members for each State was specified in the Constitution itself.

Every scheme of apportionment, founded on a fixed ratio, such as one representative for every 30,000 inhabitants, was open to the objection that in almost every State there would probably be thousands of persons constituting a fraction of the given number, who would be absolutely unrepresented in the House. This was the actual experience of the United States of America. Accordingly, different methods of providing for and dealing with these fractions were suggested and tried. The first apportionment Bill was introduced into the House of Representatives in 1790. It gave one representative for every 30,000 inhabitants, and made no provision for the representation of the remaining fractions; thus a State containing a population of one million would be assigned 33 representatives, representing 990,000 in the million, leaving 10,000 unrepresented. The Senate amended the Bill by allowing additional representatives to the States having the largest fractions; the House concurred in the amendment, but the Bill was eventually vetoed by President Washington. (Marshall's Life of Washington, vol. V. pp. 320, 323; cited Foster's Comm. vol. I. pp. 394-7; Webster's Report of the Senate, 1832, cited Foster, pp. 436-8.)

Accordingly, the basis of apportionment in the United States ignored fractions altogether until 1842, when a new rule was adopted on the lines of Daniel Webster's Report to the Senate, made ten years previously. The new rule made the provision as to fractions which is adopted by this Constitution, and the purpose of which cannot be explained more clearly than in the words of Webster's Report:—

"It may be clearly expressed in either of two ways. Let the rule be, that the whole number of the proposed House shall be apportioned among the several States, according to their respective numbers, giving to each State that number of members which comes nearest to her exact mathematical part, or proportion; or, let the rule be, that the population of each State shall be divided by a common divisor, and that, in addition to the number of members resulting from such division, a member shall be allowed to each State whose fraction exceeds a moiety of the divisor." (Webster's Report, cited Foster's Comm., vol. I. p. 445.)

§ 108. "Until the Parliament Otherwise Provides."

These words empower the Parliament to alter the provisions of sub-sections 1 and 2, which deal with the manner of determining the number of members chosen in the several States. This power of alteration is, however, confined within very narrow limits by the permanent and absolute provisions of the section. The rules which are determined absolutely by the section, and which the Parliament has no power to alter, are:—

- (1.) That the whole number of members shall be, as nearly as practicable, twice the number of the senators :
- (2.) That the number of members chosen in the several States shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people :
- (3.) That five members at least shall be chosen in each Original State.

The provisions for ascertaining the quota, and for dealing with the question of fractions, may only be altered subject to those absolute rules ; so that the power of the Parliament to alter the basis of apportionment is very small.

§ 109. "Be Determined Whenever Necessary."

The Constitution does not expressly say by whom this determination is to be made. Whenever it is "necessary" to re-apportion the members, the only data needed are the "latest statistics of the Commonwealth," showing the population of the Commonwealth, and of each State. Given those figures, the rest is mere arithmetic ; and according to the maxim—" Id certum est quod certum reddi potest"—the numbers are then already determined.

Parliamentary authority would, however, appear to be required for two purposes :—(1) To provide for the preparation of the latest statistics, and to identify those statistics by law ; and (2) to declare when re-apportionment is "necessary." As the statistics are at the root of the representative system, it is important that they should be clearly recognized and identified by Act of Parliament ; and even when that has been done, it would be most undesirable that the Executive should be left to decide for itself whether re-apportionment were necessary.

The Constitution does not prescribe any regular interval for re-apportionment, nor does it require that re-apportionment should take place at every general election, if later statistics are available ; it merely provides that apportionment shall be made "whenever necessary," and that when so made it shall be according to the latest statistics. The Parliament is apparently left to judge for itself when the necessity arises. The only reliable basis of population statistics is a census ; and it may be presumed that the Parliament will provide for a periodical—probably a decennial—census, and will require that after each census the number of members for each State shall be determined afresh. Such determination, when made, will of course not take effect till the next general election.

§ 110. "A Quota shall be Ascertained."

The quota is that number of the aggregate population of the Commonwealth which, considered as a unit, is entitled to one member in the House of Representatives. It is obtained by dividing the population of the Commonwealth by twice the number of senators. The population is that shown in the latest statistics. The number resulting from the division, the quotient, is called the quota. This is the ratio of representation, there being one representative for every quota of the population of the Commonwealth. The method of obtaining the quota may be shown as follows :—

Twice the number of senators.	Population of Commonwealth.	Quota
72	3,717,700	51,635 (or exactly, 51,634·72)

It seems clear that strict accuracy requires that the quota should be calculated out to an exact decimal fraction. To neglect the fraction might, in occasional instances, just make the difference of a representative more or less. Thus, suppose that the exact quota were 50,000·4, and that the population of one of the States were 1,025,001. If the quota were taken at its integral value, 50,000, the State would be entitled to 21 representatives—20 in respect of 1,000,000 inhabitants, and one more in respect of the remainder of 25,001, which is greater than one-half of the quota. But if the quota is taken at its exact value the remainder will only be 24,993, or less than one-half the quota, and the State will only be entitled to 20 representatives.

This method of ascertaining the quota may be altered by the Federal Parliament and another substituted. But the "two to one ratio," and the rule requiring the distribution of representatives chosen in the several States in proportion to the respective numbers of their people, cannot be interfered with except by an amendment of the constitution.

§ 111. "Members to be Chosen in each State."

The quota being ascertained, it becomes a mere matter of arithmetic to determine the number of representatives to be chosen in each State. The quota, say fifty thousand, is divided among the population of the State as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth. The result of the division is the number of representatives to be chosen in the State—subject, however, to the provision that each State shall have at least five representatives, and subject also to the provision as to fractions.

§ 112. "A Remainder Greater than One-half of the Quota."

It is provided that if, in any such division of the quota among the population of the State, the remainder left is greater than one-half of the quota, one more member shall be chosen in the State. This expresses, in a legal form, what has been the recognized practice in the United States of America, of late years, of dealing with such fractions of a quota. (See Webster's Report on Apportionment; Foster's Comm. I. p. 434; and note, § 107, supra.) The Canadian Constitution contains a similar direction.

§ 113. "Five Members at Least."

With fifty thousand as the quota, Tasmania and Western Australia would be entitled to only two or three members each in the National Chamber. This was considered such an insignificant representation that provision was made that there should be a minimum number of five members in each State.

Provision as to Races disqualified from Voting.

25. For the purposes of the last section, if by the law of any State all persons of any race are disqualified¹¹⁴ from voting at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, then, in reckoning the number of the people of the State or of the Commonwealth, persons of that race resident in that State shall not be counted.

UNITED STATES.—When the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.—Amendment XIV.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, clause 26, Chap. I., was as follows:—

"When in any State the people of any race are not entitled by law to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, the representation of that State in the House of Representatives shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of people of that race in the State bears to the whole number of the people of the State."

In Committee, Dr. Cockburn suggested that the reduction should extend, not only to alien races, but to all male adults disfranchised. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 637-9.) At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced and passed as follows :—

"In ascertaining the number of the people of any State, so as to determine the number of members to which each State is entitled, there shall be deducted from the whole number of the people of the State the number of the people* of any race not entitled to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State."

At the Sydney session, 1897, a suggestion by both Houses of the New South Wales Parliament, to omit the clause, was explained by Mr. Carruthers as not expressing any objection to the principle of the clause, but as directing attention to an ambiguity. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 453-4) At the Melbourne session, the clause was verbally amended before the first report. After the first report it was incorporated with clause 24. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1827-8.) After the fourth report, it was redrafted as it now stands. (Id. p. 2447.)

This section is based on the fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, cited above. That amendment was passed after the Civil War, in order to induce the Governments of the States to confer the franchise on the emancipated negroes, who were declared citizens of the United States. It was designed to penalize, by a reduction of their federal representation, those States which refused to enfranchise the negroes.

The effect of the section in this Constitution is that where, in any State, all the persons of any race—such, for instance, as Polynesians, Japanese, &c.—are disqualified from voting at elections for the popular Chamber in the State, the persons of that race resident in that State cannot be counted in the statistics used for ascertaining the quota.

Representatives in first Parliament.

26. Notwithstanding anything in section twenty-four, the number of members to be chosen in each State at the first election¹¹⁵ shall be as follows :—

New South Wales	...	twenty-three ;
Victoria	twenty ;
Queensland	eight ;
South Australia	six ;
Tasmania	five ;

Provided that if Western Australia is an Original State, the numbers shall be as follows :—

New South Wales	...	twenty-six ;
Victoria	twenty-three ;
Queensland	nine ;
South Australia	seven ;
Western Australia	...	five ;
Tasmania	five.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, the clause was as follows :—

“The number of members to be chosen by each State at the first election shall be as follows : [To be determined according to latest statistical returns at the date of the passing of the Act.]”

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced and passed as follows :—

“Notwithstanding anything in section 24, the number of members to be chosen by each State at the first election shall be as follows : [To be determined according to latest statistical returns at the date of the passing of the Act, and in relation to the quota referred to in previous sections.]”

At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria to omit reference to the quota was not put from the Chair, being consequential on other amendments already rejected. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, p. 454.) At the Melbourne session, verbal amendments were made after the fourth report. In the Bill as introduced into the Imperial Parliament, the blanks were filled in, with the alternative provision in the event of Western Australia being an Original State.

On 21st February, 1900, a Conference of Statisticians, representing the colonies which had agreed to accept the Constitution, was held at Sydney for the purpose of determining, according to the latest available information, the number of representatives to which each of those colonies, on becoming States, would be entitled. The Conference, which was convened by Sir William Lyne, the Premier of New South Wales, on the suggestion of Mr. Allan McLean, the Premier of Victoria, was composed as follows :—

Member of Conference.	Office.	Colony Represented.
T. A. Coghlan	Government Statistician ...	New South Wales
James J. Fenton	Government Statist	Victoria
J. Hughes	Registrar-General	Queensland
L. H. Sholl	Government Statist, &c. ...	South Australia
R. M. Johnston	Registrar-General, &c. ...	Tasmania

It was nine years since the last census had been taken in Australia, and consequently it was necessary that computations on a uniform basis should be made and concurred in as to the population of each colony. The total population of each colony having been ascertained it was then necessary to deduct therefrom disqualified races under Sec. 25, and aboriginals under Sec. 127. The Conference does not seem to have been called upon to make any deductions on account of “the people of any race” under the first named section. No difficulty was experienced in deducting the aboriginal element. The result was that the Conference agreed to a resolution affirming that the population of the colonies was, on 31st December, 1899, as follows :—

Colony.	Population 31st December, 1899.
New South Wales... ..	1,348,400
Victoria	1,162,900
Queensland... .. .	482,400
South Australia	370,700
Tasmania	182,300
Total	3,546,700

With five colonies forming parts of the Commonwealth the number of senators would be 30; twice the number of senators would be 60; 60 divided among the total population yielded a quota of 59,112 (or, to an exact fraction, 59,111·6). This quota divided among the population of each colony according to the provisions of sec. 24-ii., allowing for fractions and the minimum, gave the number of representatives for each as follows :—

State.	Population 31st December, 1899.	Number of Members.
New South Wales	1,348,400	23 (22·81)
Victoria	1,162,900	20 (19·67)
Queensland	482,400	8 (8·16)
South Australia	370,700	6 (6·22)
Tasmania	182,300	5 (3·08)
Total... ..	3,546,700	62

In the foregoing apportionment it will be seen that New South Wales was entitled to a 23rd member by virtue of the remainder left, after the division, being more than one-half the quota Victoria, for a similar reason, received a 20th member. According to the quota Tasmania was entitled to only three members; by the minimum provision two members were added, raising its representation to five.

On 27th February these numbers were cabled by the Lieutenant-Governor of New South Wales (Sir Frederick Darley) to Mr. Chamberlain, for insertion in sec. 26 of the Bill. Before the Bill was introduced into the House of Commons, however, Mr. Chamberlain decided to provide for an alternative plan of distribution of members on the basis of the whole of the six colonies, including Western Australia, forming parts of the Commonwealth.

On the 27th April, Mr. Chamberlain cabled to the Acting-Governor of Western Australia, informing him that the Premiers of the federating colonies had declared that they had no authority to accept amendments in the Commonwealth Bill. "I cannot, in these circumstances," continued the message, "press the matter further, and I would now urge your Ministers earnestly to consider whether they should not, in the best interests of the Colony, as well as of Australia, make a resolute effort to bring the Colony into Federation at once. Western Australia, unless it joins as Original State, can only enter later on condition of complete intercolonial free trade. It will thus lose the temporary protection offered by Clause 95, and looking to present population of Colony, it may also be found difficult to secure such large representation as it would receive as Original State, and which will enable Colony to secure adequate protection for all its interests in Federal Parliament. Your Ministers will also, of course, take into consideration effect of agitation of the Federalist party, especially in goldfields, if Western Australia does not enter as Original State. In the circumstances, it appears to me of utmost importance to future of Western Australia that it should join at once, and as your Ministers have done their best to secure modifications desired by Parliament, I would urge them to take early steps for summoning new Parliament, and laying position fully before it, with a view to the action necessary for ascertaining wishes of people as to entering Federation. If they agree to this course a clause will be inserted in Bill providing that if people have intimated desire to be included before issue of Her Majesty's Proclamation, Western Australia may join as Original State." (House of Com. Pap., May, 1900, p. 71-2.)

A reply to this cable was sent by Sir. A. O. Onslow on 2nd May, in which, after thanking Mr. Chamberlain for his great efforts on behalf of Western Australia, he said—

“Parliament has been summoned, on your suggestion, for the 17th May, when an enabling Bill will be introduced by Premier providing for the immediate submission of the Federation Bill to the people. Ministers gratefully accept your offer to make provision in the Imperial Act for Western Australia to enter as an Original State should the wishes of the people be expressed in favour of Federation before the Queen’s Proclamation is issued.” (House of Com. Pap., p. 75.)

On 4th May Mr. Chamberlain cabled to the Governors of New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania, informing them of the offer made by Her Majesty’s Government to provide in the Commonwealth Bill for admission of Western Australia as an Original State, if the wishes of the people of that Colony should be expressed before the Queen’s Proclamation; that the Government of Western Australia had accepted the offer, and would introduce a Bill to provide for an immediate Referendum. It was necessary that an agreement should be arrived at as to the change of figures in Clause 26, should Western Australia join. “I shall,” concluded the message, “be glad to learn as soon as possible what figures are agreed on.” (House of Com. Pap., p. 77.)

The materials available for a fresh computation of the number of members were those agreed to by the Conference of Statists held in Sydney in February, and the official estimate of the population of Western Australia, which was supplied by the Registrar-General of that colony. The population of Western Australia, exclusive of aborigines, was computed at 171,000, making the total population of Australia 3,717,700. With six colonies joining the Union the quota was reduced from 59,112 to 51,635 (or, to an exact fraction, 51,634·72). This new quota divided among the population of the various colonies gave the following apportionment:—

State.	Population on 31st December, 1899.	Number of Members.
New South Wales	1,348,400	26 (26·11)
Victoria	1,162,900	23 (22·52)
Queensland	482,400	9 (9·34)
South Australia	370,700	7 (7·18)
Tasmania	182,300	5 (3·53)
Western Australia	171,000	5 (3·31)
Total	3,717,700	75

The number of members apportionable among six colonies, as shown in the above table, was cabled to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and was by him embodied in the proviso to sec. 26 of the Constitution as introduced into the House of Commons. The wisdom of this provision has been fully vindicated by subsequent events. The Constitution was, by authority of the Parliament of the colony, referred to the people of Western Australia on 31st July. The result of the poll was:—

YES	44,800
Majority for the Constitution	25,109

The referendum in Western Australia was a remarkable incident in the history of the colony as well as in the history of Australian Federation. It was the first time in which adult women participated in the political franchise in that colony, a right which was freely exercised, and, as it proves, not adversely to the consummation of Continental union. By the vote of 31st July, Western Australia joins the Commonwealth as an Original State.

The figures which appear in the above table, in parenthesis, show that Victoria is entitled to its 23rd member and Tasmania to its 4th member by virtue of there being, after division, a remainder greater than one-half of the quota. Tasmania is entitled to its 5th member and Western Australia to its 4th and 5th members by virtue of the provision that no Original State shall have less than five members.

Alteration of number of members.

27. Subject to this Constitution, the Parliament may make laws for increasing or diminishing¹¹⁶ the number of the members of the House of Representatives.

CANADA.—The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the Provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 52.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 30, chap. I. of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows :—

“The number of members of the House of Representatives may be from time to time increased or diminished by the Parliament of the Commonwealth, but so that the proportionate representation of the several States, according to the numbers of their people, and the minimum number of members prescribed by this Constitution for any State, shall be preserved.”

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced and passed as follows :—

“Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, the number of the members of the House of Representatives may be from time to time increased or diminished by the Parliament.”

At the Melbourne session, verbal amendments were made after the fourth report.

§ 116. “Increasing or Diminishing.”

The Federal Parliament, like the Canadian Parliament, is authorized to increase the number of members of the House of Representatives, but in both cases there is a constitutional limit to the exercise of that power. The Federal Parliament cannot increase the representatives to any number beyond that as “nearly as practicable twice the number of the senators” for the time being. When the senators for each State are increased by Federal legislation, then the number of members of the House of Representatives must be correspondingly raised to a number “as nearly as practicable twice the number of the senators.”

The provision for equal representation of all the Original States in the Senate makes it impossible to increase the senators for one Original State without a similar increase for all the others. It follows that any alteration made by increasing the number of senators for each Original State must increase the whole number of senators by a number which is some multiple of the number of Original States ; and the corresponding increase in the House of Representatives will be twice that number. Except therefore by admitting or establishing new States, the House of Representatives can only be enlarged by a number which is some multiple of twice the number of States. For instance, the number of Original States being six, the number of members of the House of Representatives can—except as stated—only be increased by twelve, or twenty-four, or thirty six, or some other multiple of twelve.

Duration of House of Representatives.

28. Every House of Representatives shall continue for three years¹¹⁷ from the first meeting of the House, and no longer, but may be sooner dissolved¹¹⁸ by the Governor-General.

CANADA.—Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the Writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor-General) and no longer.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 50.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Constitutions of the Australian colonies, the duration of the Legislative Assembly has sometimes been computed from the day of the return of the writs, and sometimes from the day of the first meeting. By the Constitution Acts of New South Wales, Queensland, Tasmania, and New Zealand, the duration of the Legislative Assemblies of those colonies was formerly five years from the day of the return of the writs; but by amending Acts in each of those colonies the duration is now reduced to three years from the day of the return of the writs. (See Triennial Parliaments Act, 1874 [N.S.W.], 37 Vic. No. 7; Constitution Amendment Act, 1890 [Q.], 54 Vic. No. 3; Constitution Amendment Act, 1890 [Tas.], 54 Vic. No. 58; Triennial Parliament Act, 1879 [N.Z.]) In Western Australia, under sec. 14 of the Constitution Act of that colony, the duration of the Legislative Assembly is four years from the day of the return of the writs. In Victoria, under sec. 19 of the Constitution Act of that colony, the duration of the Legislative Assembly was formerly five years from the return of the writs; but in 1859, by the Victorian Act 22 Vic. c. 89, sec. 2 (now re-enacted in the Constitution Amendment Act, 1890, sec. 127), the duration was limited to three years from the day of the first meeting. In South Australia, under the Constitution Act of that colony, the duration of the House of Assembly is three years from the day on which the House "shall first meet for the despatch of business."

In the Sydney Convention of 1891, the clause as first drawn followed the practice in vogue in a majority of the colonies by providing for a duration of three years "from the day appointed for the return of the writs for choosing the House." In Committee, Sir John Bray pointed out that in some of the colonies the writs were made returnable on different days, and as long as the elections were governed by the Electoral laws of the States there would be confusion. Sir Samuel Griffith urged that the practice in some of the colonies was erroneous, and that in England the writs were invariably returnable on the same day. After debate, the clause was amended, on Sir John Bray's motion, to make the duration date from "the day appointed for the first meeting of the House." (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], p. 643-52.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause as introduced provided for a duration of "four" years from the date appointed for the first meeting of the House. In Committee, on Sir Geo. Turner's motion, this was altered to "three" years. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 1031.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia, to make the term four years, was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, p. 463.) At the Melbourne session, the clause was verbally amended after the fourth report.

§ 117. "Shall Continue for Three Years."

DEMISE OF THE CROWN.—Under the law as it existed prior to the Revolution of 1688, the English Parliament, elected and duly constituted under the writs issued by one reigning sovereign, continued in existence from session to session until a change took place in the succession to the Crown, unless it was previously terminated by the prerogative act of Dissolution. There was no legal provision for its termination by effluxion of time. Its continuity depended only on the life or pleasure of its Royal originator—the King or Queen by whom the writs for its election were issued. It was a principle of the common law, that the created power terminated with the demise of the creating power.

By the Act 6 and 7 Wm. and Mary c. 2, commonly known as the Triennial Act (1694), it was for the first time in English history declared that no Parliament should have any continuance longer than for three years only, at the farthest. The Act 1 Geo. I. c. 38 (1715), known as the Septennial Act, after reciting the Triennial Act, declared that the then existing Parliament and all future Parliaments "shall and may respectively have continuance for seven years and no longer" from the day appointed by the writ of summons for the meeting of Parliament, unless the Parliament should be sooner dissolved by the Crown. That Act is still in force in Great Britain.

The Triennial Act was a limiting Act; the Septennial Act succeeded it as a limiting Act. Without one or the other of those Acts the duration of Parliament would have remained determinable only by the death or pleasure of the Sovereign. The Septennial Act provided that, no matter how long the sovereign reigned, a Parliament should not continue for longer than seven years. It did not declare that the Parliament should not expire with the death of the Sovereign. Hence the common law doctrine, as to the effect of the demise of the Crown on any Parliament in being, remained in full force.

The practice of summoning a new Parliament immediately after the occurrence of a change in the succession to the Crown was found to be inconvenient, and it was apprehended that danger might arise through there being no Parliament in existence in case of a disputed succession. It was therefore enacted by 7 and 8 Wm. III. c. 15, that the Parliament in being should, if sitting, continue for six months after the demise of the Crown, unless sooner dissolved, and if not sitting should meet on the day fixed by the prorogation; and that, in case there was no Parliament in being, the last preceding Parliament should be convened. By the Act 6 Anne c. 41, s. 4, it was enacted that Parliament should not be determined or dissolved by a demise of the Crown, but should continue and be able to act for six months thereafter and no longer, unless sooner dissolved by the Successor to the Crown. And now by the Act 30 and 31 Vic. c. 102, s. 51 (Representation of the People Act, 1867), the British Parliament is no longer affected in any way by the demise of the Crown.

The effect of a demise of the Crown on the duration of an Australian Legislature was considered by the Privy Council in the case of Devine v. Holloway, 9 Weekly Reporter, 642. In November, 1856, John Devine instituted a suit in the Supreme Court of New South Wales to eject Thomas Holloway and others from certain lands in that colony, which he claimed as heir-at-law of Nicholas Devine, who in 1830 died intestate and seised of the property. On 13th July, 1837, three weeks after the death of His Majesty William IV., and before news of that event had reached the colony, the Governor and Legislative Council of New South Wales, by virtue of authority conferred on him by the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 83, made an Ordinance enacting that the provisions of the English Statute of Limitations, 3 and 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, should become law in the colony. In the ejectment suit the defendants pleaded the Statute of Limitations in bar of the plaintiff's claim, and being nonsuited he appealed to the Privy Council. On his behalf it was contended, inter alia, that the Colonial Act adopting the English statute was null and void on the ground that the Legislative Council ceased to exist with the death of William IV., and that in order to acquire a new legal life it ought to have been reconstituted in the name of Her Majesty. This contention was overruled by the Privy Council. It was held that the authority of the Governor and Legislative Council was not determined by the demise of the Crown. During the argument, Counsel for the appellant contended that neither the Act 1 Wm. IV. c. 4, which validated acts done by Governors of Plantations after the expiration of their Commissions by demise of the Crown, nor the Act 1 Anne c. 2, which continues all civil and military offices, applied to a colonial Legislature. Lord Cranworth, however, seems from the brief report to have based the decision of the Privy Council upon the Succession Act, 6 Anne c. 41, sec. 8, which provides that no civil or military office within the kingdoms of Great Britain or Ireland "or any of Her Majesty's Plantations" should become void by reason of the demise of the Crown, but that the holder of any such office should continue in office for six months unless sooner removed; and it was held that the authority of the Governor and Legislative Council was not determined by the demise of the Crown.

The Constitutions of the Australian Colonies, as originally assented to by the Crown, provided that the Commissions of the judges of the Supreme Court should continue in force notwithstanding the demise of Her Majesty or of Her heirs and successors. They contained no special provisions relating to the effect of a demise of the Crown with reference to the duration of the Legislatures thereby created. The New South Wales Constitution Act, however, contained one section (33) which shows that in the view of the framers of the instrument the Parliament thereby created was not to be dissolved by demise of the Crown. That section, after prescribing the oath of allegiance to the Queen to be taken by Members of the Legislative Council and Legislative assembly before they could sit or vote, went on to declare:—

“And whensoever the demise of Her present Majesty or of any of Her Successors to the Crown of the said United Kingdom shall be notified by the Governor of the colony to the said Council and Assembly respectively, the members of the said Council and Assembly shall before they shall be permitted to sit and vote therein take and subscribe the like oath of allegiance to the successor for the time being to the said Crown.”

Section 4 of the Constitution Act of Queensland is the same in form and substance.

The Constitution Acts of Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania, contain the usual sections formulating the oath of allegiance to the Queen to be taken by members of Parliament, but making no provision that upon the demise of Her Majesty they should take a like oath of Allegiance to Her Successor. It is open to argument whether the framers of these Constitutions acquiesced in the principle that the Legislatures should be terminated by demise of the Crown, or whether they were of opinion that the form of the instruments and the mode of constituting the proposed Legislatures rendered them free from the operation of the common law rule.

In 1876, however, the Parliament of Victoria passed an Act to amend the Electoral Act, 1865, and section 11 of the amending Act provided that the Parliament in being at any future demise of the Crown should not be determined or dissolved by such demise, but should continue so long as it would have continued but for such demise, unless it should be sooner prorogued or dissolved by the Governor. That section is now to be found in the Victorian Constitution Act Amendment Act, 1890, sec. 4. It was based on the Imperial Act 30 and 31 Vic. c. 102, s. 51. Upon the consideration of the clause in the Committee of the Legislative Assembly the Attorney-General, Mr. G. B. (afterwards Mr. Justice) Kerferd, was questioned by several legal members of the House as to its constitutional necessity. Mr. J. J. (now Judge) Casey thought the clause was unnecessary. He was of opinion that the rule of Common Law, that where a power was brought into existence by another power the created power terminated with the expiration of the creating power, did not apply to a colonial Legislature, the writs for the election of whose members were issued in the name of the Governor and not in the name of the Queen. Mr. Kerferd said that it was the opinion of some learned members of the legal profession that the clause was necessary. There certainly was a doubt about the matter, and in his opinion the doubt ought to be removed. However, he promised to consider the view submitted by Mr. Casey, and if it were clear beyond all doubt that the clause was unnecessary he would ask the House to strike it out at a subsequent stage. No further reference was subsequently made to the clause, which became law. (Vic. Parl. Deb., 12th Sept. [1876], vol. 24, p. 715.) On the authority of Devine v. Holloway, supra, it is submitted that the argument presented by Mr. Casey was a sound one, and that consequently there was no constitutional necessity for the passage of section 11 of the Electoral Act of Victoria, 1865. The fact that writs for the election of senators for each State are issued by the Governor thereof, and that writs for the election of members of the House of Representatives are issued by the Governor-General in Council, coupled with the further provision that senators are chosen for a fixed term of six years' duration and that the House of Representatives “shall continue for three years" subject to being sooner dissolved by the Governor-General, and further the forms of oath or affirmation in the schedule, by which members of the Federal Parliament swear or declare allegiance "to Her Majesty Queen Victoria Her Heirs and Successors according to law," should be sufficient to bar the operation of the common law rule; and it therefore may be safely assumed that a demise of the Crown will not cause a dissolution of the Federal Parliament.

§ 118. "Sooner Dissolved."

The House of Representatives may continue in existence for three years from the day of its first meeting, but it may be "sooner dissolved" by the Governor-General. Its normal term is therefore a triennial one, and is the same as that of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, the Legislative Assembly of Queensland, the House of Assembly of South Australia, the House of Assembly of Tasmania, and the House of Representatives of New Zealand, which are elected for three years, but are liable to be sooner dissolved by the Crown. The Legislative Assembly of Western Australia is elected for four years, and the House of Commons of Canada for five years; both, however, being liable to be sooner dissolved by the Crown. The American House of Representatives is elected for two years, but is not liable to dissolution before the expiration of its term.

The right to dissolve the House of Representatives is reserved to the Crown. This is one of the few prerogatives which may be exercised by the Queen's Representative, according to his discretion as a constitutional ruler, and if necessary, a dissolution may be refused to responsible ministers for the time being. A refusal to grant a dissolution would no doubt be a ground for the resignation of the Ministry whose advice was disregarded. Nevertheless, such refusal could not be challenged as unconstitutional. During the year 1899, three precedents occurred in Australia, which show that in the exercise of this power of dissolution the Representative of the Crown is not a mere passive instrument in the hands of his Ministers. It is well known that when an adverse vote was, on 7th September, 1899, carried against Mr. G. H. Reid in the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, he advised Lord Beauchamp to dissolve the House. That advice the Governor did not feel justified in accepting, and accordingly Mr. Reid resigned, and Mr. (now Sir William) Lyne formed a new administration. On 28th November following, the Kingston Ministry suffered a defeat in the House of Assembly of South Australia. Mr. Kingston applied to Lord Tennyson for a dissolution, which being refused, he resigned, and a new Ministry was formed by Mr. Solomon. And on 1st December of the same year, when a vote of want of confidence was carried against Sir George Turner in the Victorian Assembly, he applied to Lord Brassey for a dissolution, which was refused; and he then resigned, Mr. Allan McLean being sent for. These recent precedents show that the Representative of the Crown, in the exercise of its undoubted prerogative to grant or refuse a dissolution, can wield an important influence in the life of a Ministry, and in the duration and possible action of a Parliament.

The difference between a grant and a refusal of a dissolution is: (1) A grant of a dissolution is an Executive act, to which the Crown assents, and for which the Ministry tendering the advice and doing the act are responsible to Parliament and the country; (2) a refusal to grant a dissolution is not an Executive act; it is a negation of one, for which the Representative of the Crown is alone responsible, although it is sometimes stated that the incoming Ministry assumes the responsibility of the refusal by undertaking to carry on the Queen's Government for the time being.

The leading characteristics of this prerogative, and the general principles according to which the discretionary power of the Crown to dissolve or to decline to dissolve is exercised, may be gathered from the authorities. (See Note, "Dissolve," § 63, supra.)

Electoral divisions.

29. Until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the Parliament of any State may make laws for determining the divisions in each State¹¹⁹ for which members of the House of Representatives may be chosen, and the number of members to be chosen for each division¹²⁰. A division shall not be formed out of parts of different States¹²¹.

In the absence of other provision, each State shall be one electorate.

UNITED STATES.—The times, places, and manner of holding elections for . . . representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing senators.—Const., Art. I., sec. 4, sub-sec. 1.

SWITZERLAND.—The elections for the National Council . . . are held in federal electoral districts, which in no case shall be formed out of parts of different Cantons.—Const., Art. 73.

CANADA.—Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick shall, for the purposes of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts as follows.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 40.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 31, Chap. I. of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“The electoral divisions of the several States for the purpose of returning members of the House of Representatives shall be determined from time to time by the Parliaments of the several States.”

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced and passed as follows:—

“Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the electoral divisions of the several States for the purpose of returning members of the House of Representatives, and the number of members to be chosen for each electoral division, shall be determined from time to time by the Parliaments of the several States. Until division each State shall be one electorate.”

At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the House of Assembly of Tasmania, to omit “Until the Parliament otherwise provides,” and a suggestion by both Houses of the Victorian Parliament, to omit “until division each State shall be one electorate,” were negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 454-5.) At the Melbourne session, after the first report, the clause was verbally amended on Mr. Barton’s motion, and the words “No electoral district shall be formed out of parts of different States” were added. These words were taken from the Swiss Constitution (supra), the necessity for them being due to the amendment already made in sec. 24, that members of the House of Representatives should be chosen not by “the people of the several States,” but by “the people of the Commonwealth.” (Conv. Deb., Melb., p. 1840.) After the fourth report, the clause was verbally altered.

§ 119. “The Divisions in each State.”

The electoral divisions for the House of Representatives, in each State, may, until the Federal Parliament interposes and deals with the subject, be determined by the State legislatures, subject to the one restriction that a division is not to be formed out of parts of different States. In America a similar power has been exercised by the State legislatures without check for many years, and electoral divisions have been, for party purposes, carved out in a manner which led to grave scandal and dissatisfaction. This reprehensible manipulation of constituencies developed the art known as “Gerrymandering,” so named because Essex, a district of Massachusetts was, for political reasons, so curiously shaped as to suggest a resemblance to a salamander, and Elbridge

Gerry was the governor of the State who signed the Bill. (See Bryce, Am. Comm. 2nd ed. I. p. 121.) The grossly unjust apportionment of population of districts, made by partisan majorities in State Legislatures, eventually led to the intervention of the Courts, and certain State laws which were clearly in violation of the equality enjoined in their respective Constitutions were held invalid. (Foster, Comm. I. p. 399.) A law of a State, relating to electoral divisions, could not be held unconstitutional unless it was contrary either to Federal law or to the Constitution of the State in which it was challenged. (Id.)

“By the Apportionment Act of 25th February, 1882, Congress required, as the general rule, that the members from each State shall be ‘elected by districts composed of contiguous territory, containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants, and equal in number to the number of representatives to which such State’ may be entitled in Congress, no one district electing more than one representative.’ To the States is left, then, only the construction of such districts. Congress must find the constitutional warrant for this measure either in the clause which provides that ‘representatives shall be apportioned among the several States,’ &c., or in the clause which provides that Congress may prescribe regulations as to the times, places and manner of holding elections for representatives.” (Burgess, Political Sc. II. p. 48.)

“I think it cannot be reasonably doubted that the power to determine the manner of holding the Congressional elections includes the power to prescribe the scrutin d'arrondissement or district ticket as against the scrutin de liste or general ticket, or vice versa; but does it include the power to require the States to construct the districts of contiguous territory and of as nearly equal population as is practicable? It is perhaps too late to raise any doubts upon this point. Congress has certainly gone no further than a sound political science would justify, indeed, not so far as a sound political science would justify.” (Id. p. 49.)

§ 120. “Members to be Chosen for Each Division.”

The electorates in each State contemplated by this section are territorial divisions of the Commonwealth. Members of the House of Representatives are to be chosen in territorial divisions, within each State, but the members so chosen are members for their respective divisions, as parts of the Commonwealth; they are not members “for the State.” The senators are “for the States;” the representatives are “for each division.” The divisions, altogether, constitute the Commonwealth. Consequently the House of Representatives is the Chamber in which the people of the Commonwealth, voting in Federal constituencies, are represented. In settling the number and boundaries of such divisions the State Parliaments are, for the time being, exercising a delegated authority; they are acting merely as legislative agents of the Federal Parliament, which may, at any time, interpose and undertake the work. This ultimate control over electoral divisions is another illustration of the national principles on which the House of Representatives is founded.

§ 121. “Out of Parts of Different States.”

The Swiss Constitution similarly provides that federal electoral districts “shall in no case be formed out of parts of different Cantons.” (Art. 73.) In the American Constitution, under which representatives are chosen “by the people of the several States,” no electoral division could cross a State boundary; but in this Constitution, under which (following the Swiss example) representatives are to be chosen by “the people of the Commonwealth,” it was desirable that this should be explicitly stated. At elections of the House of Representatives, therefore, State boundaries are merely recognized as boundaries of groups of electoral divisions—not as separating one people from another. This is a further index of the national character of the Constitution, and of the existence of a national citizenship. (See Notes, § 27, “Federal,” supra.)

Qualification of electors.

30. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the qualification of electors¹²² of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each State that which is prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification of electors of the more numerous House of Parliament of the State; but in the choosing of members each elector shall vote only once¹²³.

UNITED STATES.— . . . the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.—Const. Art. I. sec. ii. subs. 1.

CANADA.—Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union relative to . . . the voters at elections of such members, . . . shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several Provinces.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 41.

SWITZERLAND.—Every Swiss who has completed twenty years of age, and who in addition is not excluded from the rights of a voter by the legislation of the Canton in which he is domiciled, has the right to vote in elections and popular votes. Nevertheless the Confederation may by law establish uniform regulations for the exercise of such right.—Const., Art. 74.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 the clause was as follows:—

“The qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each State that which is prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification for electors of the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State.”

In Committee, Mr. Deakin suggested that the Federal Parliament should have some power to fix a uniform qualification; but Sir Samuel Griffith urged the inconvenience of duplicating the electoral machinery, and thought that the States could be trusted here, as they were in America, to fix a democratic franchise. Dr. Cockburn moved to add:—

“But no property qualification shall be necessary for electors of the said House, and each elector shall have a vote for only one electoral district.”

This was criticized, partly as an interference with the States, which might endanger Federation in some colonies, and partly as involving difficulties of administration. After discussion, Dr. Cockburn withdrew his amendment to make room for a proposal by Mr. Barton that the Federal Parliament should have power to prescribe a uniform federal franchise. Mr. Baker feared that this would be an impediment to Federation; whilst Mr. Wrixon opposed it as being national rather than federal. It was urged in reply that the federal franchise was a national matter; but the amendment was negatived without division. Dr. Cockburn's amendment was then negatived by 28 votes to 9. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 613-37.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced as it now stands, except that the concluding words were: “But in the choosing of such members each elector shall have only one vote.” The only debate was upon Mr. Holder's proposals for women's suffrage (see Historical Note, sec. 41). (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 715-32, 1193-7.) Similar amendments were made to those made in sec. 8 (Qualifications of electors of senators). (Id. pp. 1191, 1210.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, to add “Provided that the Parliament may not enact that any elector shall have more than one vote,” was negatived as being unnecessary. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, pp. 455-7.)

§ 122. “The Qualification of Electors.”

On the question of settling the franchise for the Lower House, two theories were advanced in the Convention, and each received support from federalists of different types and sympathies. One theory was that the franchise for both Houses should be treated as a State right, and that its determination should be constitutionally secured to the States as an unassailable prerogative. On the other hand, the fixing of the franchise for the national Chamber was, by many members, considered a matter in which the Commonwealth was pre-eminently interested, and they contended that it should be placed within the control of the Federal Parliament. In support of this view it was argued that, in voting for members of the House of Representatives, electors exercise a public function relating to the Commonwealth, and not one relating to the State in which they reside; that the ultimate safety and destiny of the Commonwealth depend upon the forces which find representation in the national Chamber; that the Parliament, composed of members representing both the State element and the National element in the composition of the Commonwealth, should have the right, in the last resort, to decide who were sufficiently qualified to be entitled to the privilege of participating in the exercise of political power—the right to prevent the enfranchisement of those not mentally and ethnically qualified, and to enforce the enfranchisement of those nationalized by law and experience and able and willing to discharge the duties pertaining to the suffrage.

In the Constitution of the United States of America, as originally framed, the settlement of the franchise for the House of Representatives was made a State right. Each State was left free to fix for itself, within its own limits, its conditions of suffrage. (Bancroft, vol. ii. p. 128.) Each State had the exclusive power to regulate the right of suffrage and to determine who should vote at federal elections in the State. (Huber v. Reily, 53 Penn. St. 115; Morrison v. Springer, 15 Iowa, 345.) The States, it was said, were the best judges of the circumstances and temper of their own people. Accordingly, the rule was adopted, in language partly reproduced in the above section of this Constitution, that "The qualifications of the electors shall be the same, from time to time, as those of the electors in the several States of the most numerous branch of their own legislatures." Owing, however, to the unjust and impolitic manner in which some of the States discriminated in franchise legislation, the Constitution has been, on several occasions, amended in order to remove glaring abuses and to redress monstrous wrongs. First came the Fourteenth Amendment, which declared that—

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. . . . When the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of the State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

This amendment having been found ineffectual to secure the political enfranchisement of the negroes, the Fifteenth Amendment was passed, providing that the right of citizens of the United States to vote should not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of race, colour, or previous condition of servitude, and that the Congress should have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation. "The Fifteenth Amendment," says Dr. Burgess, "is negative language and does not directly confer upon any one the privilege of suffrage. It simply guards the individual against any discriminations in reference to the suffrage which may be attempted by the States, or by the government of the United States, on account of race, colour, or previous condition of servitude. This restriction, however, may indirectly confer suffrage: if, for example, a State law confers suffrage upon white persons having such and such qualifications, this provision of the fifteenth amendment would then operate to confer it upon other persons, not white, having the same qualifications." (United States v. Reese, 92 U.S. 214; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U.S. 370; Political Sc. II. p. 42.)

These amendments of the American Constitution, recognizing a national citizenship and forbidding discriminations in franchise legislation by the States, show the tendency of the American Constitution to regard the franchise for the House of Representatives as a national question, in which the nation itself is concerned, and which the nation may at any time, by a further amendment, withdraw absolutely from the control of the States.

The Constitution of the Commonwealth, following the American precedent, starts with the electoral franchise in each State, prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification of electors of the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State. But the Federal Parliament may at any time by appropriate legislation, and without an amendment of the Constitution, deal either partly or wholly with the question, and impose a franchise for Federal elections. In the exercise of this power, however, there is one restriction provided by clause 41; that no adult person who has or acquires a right to vote at elections for the Legislative Assembly of a State, shall, while the right continues, be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from voting at elections for either House of the Federal Parliament. In other words, the Federal Parliament can pass an enlarged and liberalized franchise for the whole Commonwealth; but it cannot disqualify any adult person already entitled to a vote by the law of the State in which he or she resides. (See Note, § 139. infra.)

The qualifications of electors of the more numerous House of the Parliaments of the several States, and of the colony of New Zealand, may be here summarized.

New South Wales.—Every man of the age of 21 years, being a natural-born or naturalized British subject, unless disqualified, is entitled to be enrolled for the division of the Electoral District in which he resides, and to vote therein, provided that he holds an elector's right; to obtain which he must have been resident in the colony for one year (or, if naturalized, for one year after naturalization) and resident in the District for three months. (Parliamentary Electorates and Elections Act of 1893 [56 Vic. No. 38].) Number of electors enrolled, July, 1898, 324,338.

Victoria.—Every man of the age of 21 years, being a natural-born British subject (which is deemed to include naturalized subjects resident for 12 months in the colony), and not disqualified, is entitled to vote in any division of an Electoral District for which he holds an elector's right, or in which he is enrolled upon a "roll of rate-paying electors." The qualification for an elector's right is either (a) residential—requiring residence for twelve months in the colony and for one month in the division of the District; or (b) non-residential—requiring possession of freehold estate within the district to the value of £50 or the annual value of £5. (Constitution Act Amendment Act of 1890, secs. 128-135.) By the Constitution Act Amendment Act, 1899 (known as the Plural Voting Abolition Act), it is provided that, after the expiration of the present Parliament, no person shall vote in more than one Electoral District at any election, or more than once at the same election. Number of electors enrolled for 1898, 252,560.

Queensland.—Every man of the age of 21 years, being a natural-born or naturalized British subject or a denizen of Queensland, unless disqualified, is entitled to be entered on the roll for any Electoral District if qualified within the District in any of the following ways:—(1) Residence; (2) Freehold estate of the value of £100; (3) Household occupation; (4) Leasehold estate of £10 annual value, held for at least 18 months, or having 18 months to run; (5) Pastoral license of £10 annual value. The qualifying period in the case of the residential, freehold, household, or pastoral qualification is six months; or, if the claimant has previously been an elector, three months. There is no limit to the number of Districts in which an elector may be enrolled; but no elector can claim a plural voting in any District. Aboriginal natives of Australia, India, China, or the South Sea Islands are not entitled to be enrolled, except in respect of a freehold qualification. (Elections Act of 1885 [49 Vic. No. 13]; Elections Act of 1897 [61 Vic. No. 26].) Number of electors in 1897, 81,892.

South Australia.—All British subjects of the age of 21 years (men and women), inhabitants of South Australia, who have been registered upon any Assembly roll for six months, may vote for members of the Assembly. In the Northern Territory, immigrants under the Indian Immigration Act, 1882, and all persons except natural-born British subjects and Europeans or Americans naturalized as British subjects, are disqualified. (Electoral Code, 1896.) Number of votes on the roll for the year 1897, 134,886.

Western Australia.—Every person of the age of 21 years, being a natural-born or naturalized British subject, is entitled to be registered as a voter, if he or she has resided in the colony for six months, and is entitled to vote after being registered for six months; and is also entitled to a property vote in every District in which he or she has a freehold qualification of £50 capital value, a leasehold or household qualification of £10 a year, or a Crown lease or license of £5 a year. (Constitution Acts Amendment Act, 1899.) Number of electors on the roll for the year 1897 (before the extension of the franchise to women), 15,029.

Tasmania.—Every man of the age of 21 years, being a natural-born or naturalized British subject, or having letters of denization, or a certificate of naturalization, who has resided in Tasmania for 12 months, is entitled to vote in any District if (1) his name appears in the assessment roll as owner or occupier of any property within the District; or (2) if he resides in the District, and is in receipt of income, salary, or wages of £40 a year. Board and residence, clothing, and services, are deemed income; house allowance and rations are included in the computation of wages. There is no limit to the number of districts in which an elector may have a property qualification. (Constitution Act Amendment Act, 1896, No. 2 [60 Vic. No. 54].) Number of electors on the roll for the year 1898, 31,613.

New Zealand.—Every inhabitant of New Zealand (male or female) of the age of 21 years, resident for one year in the colony, and for 3 months in an Electoral District, is entitled to vote in the District. There is no plural voting. Electoral Act, 1893 [No. 18]; Electoral Act Amendment Act, 1896 [No. 49].) Number of electors on the roll for 1896, male, 196,925; female, 142,305; total, 339,230.

General Summary.—These different franchises may be shortly described as follows:—New South Wales and Victoria, one man one vote. Queensland, manhood suffrage, with plural votes for property. South Australia and New Zealand, one adult one vote. Western Australia, adult suffrage, with plural votes for property. Tasmania, a small property or income qualification, with plural votes for property.

Under this clause electors of a State who are qualified under the laws thereof to vote for representatives in the State legislature, have the right to vote for members of the Federal legislature, which has power, by law, to protect such persons in that right. (Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371; ex parte Clarke, 100 U.S. 399; United States v. Gale, 109 U.S. 65. Cited in Baker, Annot. Const. p. 4.)

The qualifications of electors of the more numerous branch of the State legislature are not necessarily uniform in the various American States. In some cases aliens, who have declared their intention to become citizens, may vote for representatives to the State legislature, and so are qualified to vote for representatives in the Federal legislature. "Electors" are not necessarily citizens. The State may confer upon aliens the right to vote within the State, but it cannot make them citizens of the United States. (Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 404-414, id. p. 4.)

§ 123. "Each Elector Shall Vote Only Once."

This is a constitutional assertion of the principle of "one elector one vote" at federal elections; it does not interfere with State elections. It will be observed that no penalty is specified for a breach of this inhibition. As noted under section 8 the framers of the section were of opinion that, as every breach of a public statute is a criminal offence, punishable as a misdemeanour at common law, where the statute makes no explicit provision as to the mode of punishment, it was not necessary to encumber the Constitution with a penalty. (R. v. Walker [1875] L.R. 10 Q.B. 355; R. v. Hall [1891] 1 Q.B. p. 767. See Note, § 76, supra.)

Application of State laws.

31. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, but subject to this Constitution, the laws in force in each State for the time being relating to elections¹²⁴ for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the State of members of the House of Representatives.

UNITED STATES.—The times, places, and manner of holding elections for . . . representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators.—Const. Art. I, sec. iv., subsec. 1.

CANADA.—Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union relative to . . . the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections . . . and the execution of new writs, in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution,—shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several Provinces.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 41.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 43, Chap. I. of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, was as follows:—

“Until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the laws in force in the several States, for the time being, relating to the following matters, namely: The manner of conducting elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament, the proceedings at such elections, the oaths to be taken by voters, the Returning Officers, their powers and duties, the periods during which elections may be continued, the execution of new writs in case of places vacated otherwise than by dissolution, and offences against the laws regulating such elections, shall respectively apply to elections in the several States of members to serve in the House of Representatives.”

In Committee, Mr. Barton suggested omitting this list of matters, and substituting “elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament,” but Sir Samuel Griffith thought that would be too wide, and no amendment was moved. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 652-3.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced and passed in substantially the same form. At the Melbourne session, after the first report, the clause was omitted, and a new clause (44A) was inserted, practically in the words of this section, but dealing with elections for both Houses. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1840, 1855. See Historical Note, sec. 10). After the fourth report, the clause was restored in its present form.

§ 124. “Laws Relating to Elections.”

The application of State laws in Federal elections has been already discussed under section 10 (see Note, § 80, supra.)

The implied power of the federal legislature is as much a part of the constitution as any of the expressed powers. Under this implied power it may provide by law for the protection of voters at elections of representatives, and may atix punishment for hindering or intimidating or maltreating voters intending to vote at such election. (Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651. Cited in Baker, Annot. Const. p. 9.)

At an election of burgesses for Parliament, the plaintiff, being entitled to vote, tendered his vote for two candidates: but such vote was refused, and notwithstanding those candidates for whom the plaintiff tendered his vote were elected, yet he brought an action against the constables of the Borough for refusing to admit his vote. It was decided that the action was maintainable, for it was an injury, though without any special damage. (Ashby v. White; Smith's Leading Common Law Cases, 9th ed. vol. i. p. 268.)

The provision of the laws relating to election of federal representatives which authorizes the deputy marshals to keep the peace at such election is constitutional. (Habeas Corpus Cases, 100 U.S. 371, 399. Cited in Baker, Annot. Const. p. 10.)

The federal legislature has power to fix penalties for violation of election laws, and for interference with electoral officers. In making electoral regulations, the federal legislature need not assume exclusive control. It has a supervisory power over the subject, and may either make entirely new regulations, or may supplement or modify the regulations made by the States. (Habeas Corpus Cases, 100 U.S. 371, 399, 404, 422. Id. p. 10.)

Rights and immunities created by or dependent upon the constitution can be protected by the federal legislature; with which the determination of the form and manner of such protection lies. (United States v. Reese, 92 U.S. 214. Id. p. 10.)

Writs for general election.

32. The Governor-General in Council may cause writs to be issued¹²⁵ for general elections of members¹²⁶ of the House of Representatives.

After the first general election, the writs shall be issued within ten days from the expiry of a House of Representatives or from the proclamation of a dissolution thereof.

CANADA.—For the first election of members to serve in the House of Commons, the Governor-General shall cause writs to be issued by such person, in such form, and addressed to such Returning Officers as he thinks fit.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 42.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 42, Chap. I, of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“For the purpose of holding general elections of members to serve in the House of Representatives the Governor-General may cause writs to be issued by such persons, in such form, and addressed to such Returning Officers, as he thinks fit.”

At the Adelaide session, the clause was passed in the same form, with the addition of the words: “The writs shall be issued within ten days from the expiry of a Parliament, or from the proclamation of a dissolution.” At the Sydney session, a verbal amendment suggested by the Legislature of Tasmania was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], p. 463.) At the Melbourne session, on Dr. Coekburn’s motion, the words “in Council” were added after “Governor-General.” (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1929-31.) Verbal amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 125. “The Governor-General in Council may Cause Writs to be Issued.”

The question whether this section ought to have been framed so as to read that the writs should be issued by “the Governor-General” or by “the Governor-General in Council” was the subject of debate in the Convention. In the Adelaide Draft of the Constitution, the clause (then 41) provided that “the Governor-General” might cause writs to be issued. At the Melbourne Session Dr. Coekburn took objection to this form, and proposed to insert the words “in Council.” He submitted that without the addition of these words it would appear that the issue of the writs was a prerogative act, which the Governor-General could direct to be done without the advice of the Executive Council. In reply to this it was suggested that at the time of the holding of the first Federal elections there might not be an Executive Council in existence, and the issue of the writs would, in that event, necessarily be a personal act of the Governor-General. This view, however, was not generally concurred in, as one of the first executive acts of the Queen’s Representative after the establishment of the Commonwealth would be to send for some leading statesman to form a Federal Ministry, which would of course constitute the first Executive Council. It was pointed out that, even if the proposed words were not inserted, the Governor-General would not act in such a matter without the advice of his ministers. Eventually the words were added. (See Note, § 60, supra.)

§ 126. "General Elections of Members."

The writs for general elections of members will be issued by the Governor-General in Council, through one of the Ministers of State. They will be directed to Returning Officers appointed by the Governor-General in Council, and will contain all the instructions and authority usually embodied in documents of this description, prescribing among other things the date for the receipt of nominations of candidates, the date for the holding of the elections, and the date for the return of the writs.

"At the beginning of a Parliament, the Return Book, received from the clerk of the Crown, is sufficient evidence of the return of a member, and the oaths are at once administered. If a member be elected after a general election, the clerk of the Crown sends to the Clerk of the house a certificate of the return received in the Crown Office; and the member must obtain a certificate from the Public Bill Office of the receipt of that certificate for production at the table, before the Clerk of the house will administer the oath." (May, 10th ed. p. 165.)

Writs for vacancies.

33. Whenever a vacancy happens¹²⁷ in the House of Representatives, the Speaker shall issue his writ for the election of a new member, or if there is no Speaker or if he is absent from the Commonwealth the Governor-General in Council may issue the writ.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—The clause in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was substantially to the same effect, except that the Speaker, unless the House was not sitting, was only empowered to issue the writ "upon a resolution of the House." In Committee, Dr. Cockburn moved the omission of these words, but this was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 641-3.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced in the same form. In Committee, Sir George Turner moved the omission of the words "upon a resolution of the House," and this time the amendment was agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 734-5.) At a later stage the clause was consequentially amended. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 1197-8.) At the Melbourne session, amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 127. "Whenever a Vacancy Happens."

Casual vacancies may happen, during the currency of each House of Representatives, by the death or resignation of a member, by the expulsion of a member for some offence not provided for by the Constitution, or by a member becoming subject to any of the disabilities mentioned in sections 44 and 45. When such vacancies arise the Speaker is authorized to issue writs for the election of new members. Such writs may be issued during a recess without the immediate authority of the House, in order that a representative may be chosen without loss of time by the division which is deprived of its member. (May, 10th ed. p. 599.)

Qualifications of members.

34. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the qualifications of a member¹²⁸ of the House of Representatives shall be as follows :—

(i.) He¹²⁹ must be of the full age of twenty-one years¹³⁰, and must be an elector entitled to vote at the election of members of the House of Representatives, or a person qualified to become such elector, and must have been for three years at the least a resident¹³¹ within the limits of the Commonwealth as existing at the time when he is chosen :

(ii.) He must be a subject of the Queen¹³², either natural-born or for at least five years naturalized under a law of the United Kingdom, or of a Colony which has become or becomes a State, or of the Commonwealth, or of a State.

UNITED STATES.—No person shall be a representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.—Const., Art. I., sec. 2, sub-sec. 2.

CANADA.—Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union relative to . . . the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly in the several Provinces . . . shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several Provinces.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 41.

SWITZERLAND.—Every lay Swiss citizen who has the right to vote is eligible for membership in the National Council.—Const., Art. 75.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the clause as introduced at the Sydney Convention of 1891, the qualification was permanently fixed, the words “until the Parliament otherwise provides” being absent. The qualification was substantially the same, except that no period of residence or naturalization was required. In Committee, on Mr. Deakin’s motion, a requirement of three years’ residence within the Commonwealth was added; and on Mr. Cuthbert’s motion, the same period of naturalization was prescribed. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 639-40.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced and passed in substantially its present form. In Committee, Mr. Walker proposed to substitute “twenty-five years” for “twenty-one years,” but this was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 733.) At the Sydney session, Mr. Lewis raised the question whether under this clause women would be eligible as members of the Parliament. A suggestion of the Legislature of Tasmania, requiring a member to be for three years a resident of the State for which he is chosen, was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 457-8.) At the Melbourne session, drafting amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

An analysis of this section is given in the notes to sec. 16, which provides that the qualifications of a senator shall be the same as those of a member of the House of Representatives. (See Note, § 95.)

"The qualifications or positive requirements for holding a seat in the House of Commons are but three. viz. : the male sex, the full age of twenty-one years, and the quality of citizen or subject, either by birth or naturalization. The first of these requirements rests upon custom, which, therefore, either house might change through the exercise of its residuary power to judge of the qualifications of its members. The second and third, however, rest upon statutes of Parliament and cannot be modified by either house alone." (Burgess Political Sc. II. p. 69.)

The constitution having fixed the qualification of members, no additional qualification can be added by the States. (Barney v. McCreery, Cl. and H. 176; Turney v. Marshall, 1 Cong. El. Cas. 167; Trumbull's Case, id. 618.) The Constitution of Illinois (1848) provided that: "The judges of the Supreme and Circuit Courts shall not be eligible to any other office of public trust or profit in this State or the United States during the term for which they shall be elected, nor for one year thereafter." The House of Representatives of the United States held that this provision was void, in so far as it applied to persons elected members of the said house. (Turney v. Marshall, supra; Trumbull's Case, supra. Cited in Baker, Annot. Const. p. 5.)

The returns from the state authorities, showing or declaring that a certain person has been elected representative or senator in congress, are prima facie evidence of qualification only. (Spaulding v. Mead, Cl. and Hall, 157; Reed v. Cosden, id. 353.) And the refusal of the executive of the State to grant a certificate does not prejudice the right of one entitled to a seat." (Richards' Case, Cl. and Hall, 95. Id. p. 10.)

In determining qualification each house has the right to examine witnesses and require the production of papers, and may punish witnesses for contumacy. (Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168. Id. p. 10.)

§ 129. "He."

The personal pronoun "he" here used in introducing the qualification of members, being in the masculine gender, naturally suggests the query whether women are disqualified by the Constitution. This cannot be answered without considering some of the other qualifications required. Thus, a member must be an elector entitled to vote at the election of members of the House of Representatives, or a person qualified to become an elector. Are persons having the right to vote and otherwise constitutionally qualified, entitled to be nominated for election irrespective of sex? If the pronoun "he" had not been made the subject of an express interpretation by an Imperial Act, there would be little doubt that males only would be qualified. By the Interpretation Act (1889), 52 and 53 Vic. c. 63, re-enacting 13 and 14 Vic. c. 21, commonly known as Lord Brougham's Act, it is declared (sec. 1) that "In this Act and in every Act passed after the year 1850, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, unless the contrary intention appears, words importing the masculine gender shall include females." The Constitution of the Commonwealth being embodied in an Imperial Act may be fairly considered as capable of interpretation by the anterior Imperial Act. (See Note, § 330, infra.) If this be the true construction then "he" includes "she" unless the contrary intention appears.

The use of the Interpretation Act in the construction of an electoral law was considered in England in the case of Beresford Hope v. Lady Sandhurst (1889), 23 Q.B.D. 79. In this case the question was whether a woman was capable of being elected a member of the London County Council. It depended on the meaning of several Acts of Parliament connected by references to them in the Local Government Act of 1888. By sec. 2 of that Act it was provided, that a County Council should be constituted in like manner to the Council of a Borough divided into wards. Reference had, consequently, to be made to the Municipal Corporations Acts in order to ascertain who were qualified to vote for and to become members of the County Council. By the Municipal Corporations Act (1835), 5 and 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, s. 9, the municipal franchise was confined to "male persons of full age." In 1869 that section was repealed by the Act 32 and 33 Vic. c. 55, sec. 1, which re-enacted it with the word "male" omitted. Sec. 9 of that Act declared that wherever therein "words occur which import the masculine gender the same shall be held to include females for all purposes connected with and having reference to the right to vote on the election of councillors, auditors, and assessors." The qualifications of burgesses and councillors were further dealt with in the Consolidating Municipal Corporation Act, 1892; (45 and 46 Vic. c. 50), sec. 11, sub-sec. 2, which enacted that "a person shall not be qualified to be elected or to be a councillor unless he is enrolled and entitled to be a burgess;" whilst sec. 63 enacted that "for all purposes connected with and having reference to the right to vote at Municipal elections words in this Act importing the masculine gender include women." In this state of the law Lady Sandhurst was elected a member of the County Council. An application was made to the High Court to remove her from the office. On her behalf it was argued that the true effect of the Act of 1892 was to give a right to women to sit in the Municipal Councils, and therefore in the County Council: that as there was nothing to restrain the generality of the words, the provisions of Lord Brougham's Act should be applied, and as a woman was qualified to vote she was qualified to be elected.

The majority of the Court of Appeal (Coleridge, C.J., Cotton, Lindley, Fry, and Lopes, L.J.J.) were of opinion that, if the argument stood there, it could not be denied that there was a very strong case in support of Lady Sandhurst's claim; that there was much to be said in favour of applying the language of Lord Brougham's Act, and holding that as a woman was qualified to elect, although the masculine gender was used, she would be qualified also to be elected. Unfortunately for that argument, which by itself would be very strong, there was the 63rd section which appeared to exclude the operation of Lord Brougham's Act, by limiting the right of women to the right to vote and thus excluding the right to be elected. Lady Sandhurst was accordingly held to be unqualified. Lord Esher, M.R., entertained a stronger view than his learned colleagues, and said, that, but for sec. 9 of the Act of 1869, succeeded by sec. 63 in the Act of 1882, he would have come to the conclusion that women were not intended to be either electors or councillors, and that those sections clearly limited this qualification of women to that of electors.

In the Constitution of the Commonwealth there is no such section as that held to be fatal to Lady Sandhurst's claim. Consequently, it is quite possible that the Imperial Interpretation Act may be held to apply to the interpretation of the pronoun "he." If that be so, a woman qualified as an elector in South Australia, or in Western Australia, would be qualified to be elected a member of the Federal Parliament, not only in her own State, but in any other State. The question of qualification, whenever legally raised, will have to be determined by the Senate or by the House of Representatives respectively, as the case may arise in connection with the elections of members of those Houses (sec 47).

§ 130. "Of the Full Age of Twenty-one Years."

The Constitution of the United States of America, supra, provides that no person shall be a representative who is under the age of twenty-five years. The Canadian Constitution, supra, accepts, as the qualifying age of members elected in the several Provinces, the age fixed by the laws of the Provinces respectively; power being reserved to the Dominion Parliament to enact a uniform qualification.

"By standing order No. 12, the Lords prescribe that no lord under the age of twenty-one years shall sit in their house. By the 7 and 8 Will. III. c. 25, s. 8, a minor was disqualified to be elected to the House of Commons. Before the passing of that Act, several members were notoriously under age, yet their sitting was not objected to. Sir Edward Coke said that they sat 'by connivance; but if questioned would be put out'; yet on the 16th December, 1690, on the hearing of a controverted election, Mr. Trenchard, though admitted by his counsel to be a minor, was declared, upon a division, to be duly elected. And even after the passing of the Act of Will. III., some minors sat 'by connivance.' Charles James Fox was returned for Midhurst when he was nineteen years and four months old, and sat and spoke before he was of age; and Lord John Russell was returned for Tavistock a month before he came of age." (May, 10th ed. p. 28.

A resident is defined as one who dwells at a place which is his home or fixed abode for some time. An inhabitant is one who dwells permanently in a place, as distinguished from a transient resident or visitor. The term of residence within the limits of the Commonwealth, necessary to qualify a person to be a member of the Federal Parliament, is fixed by the Constitution at three years. It has been held that residence is not broken by a temporary absence if there is an animus revertendi. (Holborn Union v. Chertsey Union [1884] 54 L.J. M.C. 53.)

The Constitution of the United States of America, supra, provides that no person shall be a representative who is not, when elected, "an inhabitant of the State" in which he is chosen. The Constitution of the Commonwealth gives a wider qualification, by making a person who has resided for three years within the limits of the Commonwealth qualified to be a member. The requirement of a three years' residence within the limits of the Commonwealth is insisted on in order to secure the services of members substantially identified with the Commonwealth, but not necessarily identified for three years with any particular State, as "an inhabitant of that State."

The word "resident" in this Constitution is not synonymous with "inhabitant." An inhabitant of a State within the meaning of the American Constitution is one who in good faith is a member of the State and subject to its jurisdiction and to its laws, and entitled to all the privileges and advantages conferred thereby. (Electors v. Bailey, Cl. and H. 411) Mr. McCrary, referring to this distinction, says, "it would seem that the framers of the constitution were impressed with a deep sense of the importance of an actual bona fide residence of the representative among the constituency—a residence in the sense of actual living among them and co-mingling with them." (McCrary on Elections, § 289; Baker, Annot. Const. 5.)

The Constitution of the Commonwealth does not insist upon such a permanent residence in and identification with one State as a qualification of membership of the national Chamber. It recognizes citizenship, and residence within the Commonwealth for a period of three years, as a sufficient qualification, and one calculated to promote the view that a member of the national House is not a member for a State, or for the people of a State, but for a division which includes a quota of the people of the Commonwealth.

"The choice of members of Congress is locally limited by law and by custom. Under the Constitution every representative and every senator must when elected be an inhabitant of the State whence he is elected. Moreover, State law has in many, and custom practically in all, States, established that a representative must be resident in the congressional district which elects him. The only exceptions to this practice occur in large cities where occasionally a man is chosen who lives in a different district of the city from that which returns him; but such exceptions are extremely rare. This restriction surprises a European, who thinks it must be found highly inconvenient both to candidates, as restricting their field of choice in looking for a constituency, and to constituencies, as excluding persons, however eminent, who do not reside in their midst. To Americans, however, it seems so obviously reasonable that I found very few persons, even in the best educated classes, who would admit its policy to be disputable." (Bryce, Amer. Comm. 1. p. 186.)

"It is remarkable that the original English practice required the member to be a resident of the county or borough which returned him to Parliament. This is said to be a requirement at common law (witness the words 'de comitatu tuo' in the writ for the election addressed to the sheriff): and was expressly enacted by the statute 1 Henry V. cap. 1. But already in the time of Elizabeth the requirement was not enforced; and in 1681 Lord Chief Justice Pemberton ruled that 'little regard was to be had to that ancient statute 1 Henry V. forasmuch as common practice hath been ever since to the contrary.' The statute was repealed by 14 Geo. III. cap. 50. (See Anson, Law and Custom of the Constitution, vol. i. p. 83; Stubbs, Constitution Hist. vol. iii. p. 424.) Dr. Stubbs observes that the object of requiring residence in early times was to secure 'that the House of Commons should be a really representative body.' Dr. Hearn (Government of England) suggests that the requirement had to be dropped because it was hard to find the country gentlemen (or indeed burgesses) possessing the legal knowledge and statesmanship which the constitutional struggles of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries demanded." (Id. p. 188.)

“The English habit of allowing a man to stand for a place with which he is personally unconnected would doubtless be favoured by the fact that many ministers are necessarily members of the House of Commons. The inconvenience of excluding a man from the service of the nation because he could not secure his return in the place of his residence would be unendurable. No such reason exists in America, because ministers cannot be members of Congress. In France, Germany, and Italy the practice seems to resemble that of England, i.e., many members sit for places where they do not reside, though of course a candidate residing in the place he stands for has a certain advantage.” (Id. p. 188.)

§ 132. “Subject of the Queen.”

NATURAL-BORN SUBJECTS.—At common law everybody, whose birth happens within the allegiance of the Crown, is a natural-born subject. “The character of a natural-born subject, anterior to any of the statutes, was incidental to birth only; whatever were the situations of his parents, the being born within the allegiance of the king constitutes a natural-born subject.” (Per Kenyon, C.J., in Doe d. Durrore v. Jones [1791], 4 T.R. p. 308; 2 R.R. 390.) This is still a ruling principle of our law. Children born in an English ship are born within the allegiance, and an ambassador’s house is also reputed to be part of his sovereign’s realm, so as to confer upon the children of the ambassador born therein the character of natural-born subjects. The status of the parents is of no account, provided only the offspring be born within the realm. “A child born of foreign parents, even during an accidental stay of a few days, is fully, and until the age of twenty-one years irretrievably, a British subject.” (Hall, Foreign Jurisdiction, p. 20.) The character of a natural-born subject is not given to persons born in a place which, though rightfully part of the dominions of the British Crown, happens to be at the time of the birth in the military possession of an enemy. The learning, old and new, of the subject will be found very fully in Calvin’s Case (1608), 7 Coke Reps. 1, 18A; Collingwood v. Pace (1656), 1 Vent. 413; De Geer v. Stone (1882), 22 Ch. D. 243; Re Stepney Election Petition, Isaacson v. Durant (1886), 17 Q.B.D. 54; Encyclopedia of the Laws of England, vol. ix. p. 57; Westlake, Private International Law, Chap. XV.

By statute, children born out of the British Dominions, whose fathers or whose paternal grandfathers were natural-born subjects, are, except in certain cases, entitled to the rights of natural-born subjects. (See Imperial Acts, 4 Geo. II. c. 21, ss. 1, 2; 13 Geo. III. c. 21; Notes, § 193, “Aliens,” infra.)

NATURALIZED SUBJECTS.—Naturalization is the procedure by which an alien or foreigner is made a subject or citizen of any State. It is a legal adoption by one State of a person who is the subject or citizen of another State, admitting him to take part in its national polity, and conferring on him the rights and privileges of a natural-born subject or citizen. (See Note, § 194, “Naturalization,” infra.)

“An alien is disqualified to be a member of either House of Parliament. The Act 12 and 13 Will. III. c. 2, declared that ‘no persons born out of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging (although he be naturalized or made a denizen, except such as are born of English parents), shall be capable to be of the privy council, or a member of either House of Parliament.’ The 1 Geo. I. stat. 2, c. 4, in order to enforce the provisions of the Act of William, required a special clause of disqualification to be inserted in every Naturalization Act; but as no clause of this nature could bind future Parliaments, occasional exceptions were permitted, as in the cases of Prince Leopold in 1816, and Prince Albert in 1840; and this provision of the 1st George I. was repealed by the 7 and 8 Vic. c. 66, s. 2. Later Naturalization Acts have since been passed, without such a disqualifying clause. And by the 33 and 34 Vic. c. 14, an alien to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted by the Secretary of State, becomes entitled to all political and other rights, powers, and privileges, and is subject to all the obligations of a British subject.” (May’s Parl. Prac. 10th ed. p. 27-8.)

Election of Speaker.

35. The House of Representatives shall, before proceeding to the despatch of any other business, choose a member to be the Speaker¹³³ of the House, and as often as the office of Speaker becomes vacant the House shall again choose a member to be the Speaker.

The Speaker shall cease to hold his office if he ceases to be a member. He may be removed from office by a vote of the House, or he may resign his office or his seat by writing addressed to the Governor-General.

CANADA.—The House of Commons, on its first assembling after a general election, shall proceed with all practicable speed to elect one of its members to be Speaker.—B.N.A Act, 1867, sec. 44.

In case of a vacancy happening in the office of Speaker by death, resignation, or otherwise, the House of Commons shall, with all practicable speed, proceed to elect another of its members to be Speaker.—Id. sec. 45.

The Speaker shall preside at all meetings of the House of Commons—Id. sec. 46.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Similar provisions are in the Constitutions of all the Australian colonies. In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, the clause was substantially to the same effect, with the addition of a provision that “the Speaker shall preside at all meetings of the House of Representatives; and the choice of a Speaker shall be made known to the Governor-General by a deputation of the House.” At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was adopted in the same form; and at the Melbourne session drafting amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 133. “The Speaker.”

“The note of the Speaker of the British House of Commons is his impartiality. He has indeed been chosen by a party, because a majority means in England a party. But on his way from his place on the benches to the Chair he is expected to shake off and leave behind all party ties and sympathies. Once invested with wig and gown of office he has no longer any political opinions, and must administer exactly the same treatment to his political friends and to those who have hitherto been his opponents, to the oldest or most powerful minister and to the youngest or least popular member. His duties are limited to the enforcement of the rules and generally to the maintenance of order and decorum in debate, including the selection, when several members rise at the same moment, of the one who is to carry on the discussion. These are duties of great importance, and his position one of great dignity, but neither the duties nor the position imply political power. It makes little difference to any English party in Parliament whether the occupant of the chair has come from their own or from the hostile ranks. The Speaker can lower or raise the tone and efficiency of the House as a whole by the way he presides over it; but a custom as strong as law forbids him to render help to his own side, even by private advice. Whatever information as to parliamentary law he may feel free to give must be equally at the disposal of every member.” (Bryce, Amer. Comm. I. p. 134-5.)

“The duties of the Speaker of the House of Commons are as various as they are important. He presides over the deliberations of the house, and enforces the observance of all rules for preserving order in its proceedings; he puts every question, and declares the determination of the house. As ‘mouth of the house,’ he communicates its resolutions to others, conveys its thanks, and expresses its censure, its reprimands, or its admonitions. He issues warrants to execute the orders of the house for the commitment of offenders, for the issue of writs, for the attendance of witnesses in custody, for the bringing up prisoners in custody, and giving effect to other orders requiring the sanction of a legal form. He is, in fact, the representative of the house itself, in its powers, its proceedings, and its dignity. When he enters or leaves the house, the mace is borne before him by the Serjeant-at-arms; when he is in the chair, it is laid upon the table; and at all other times, when the mace is not in the house, it remains with the speaker, and accompanies him upon all state occasions. The Speaker is responsible for the due enforcement of the rules, rights, and privileges of the house, and when he rises he is to be heard in silence. In accordance with his duty, he declines to submit motions to the house, which obviously infringe the rules which govern its proceedings; such as a motion which would create a charge upon the people and is not recommended by the Crown; a motion touching the rights of the Crown, which has not received the royal consent; a motion which anticipates a matter which stands for the future consideration of the house, which raises afresh a matter already decided during the current session, or is otherwise out of order. If a proposed instruction to a committee be out of order, the Speaker explains the nature of the irregularity. Amendments by the Lords to a bill which trench upon the privileges of the House of Commons, are submitted to the Speaker; and, if occasion requires, he calls the attention of the house to the nature of the amendments, and gives his opinion thereon. The Speaker also has decided that motions, which were brought forward as a matter of privilege, did not come within that category." (May's Parl. Prae. 10th ed. p. 187-8.)

"In rank, the Speaker takes precedence of all commoners, both by ancient custom and by legislative declaration. The Act I. Will. and Mary, c. 21, enacts that the lords commissioners for the great seal 'not being peers, shall have and take place next after the peers of this realm, and the Speaker of the House of Commons.' By 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 105, an Act for the better support of the dignity of the Speaker of the House of Commons, and by 9 and 10 Vic. c. 77, an Act relating to the officers of the house, it is provided that, in case of a dissolution, the then speaker shall be deemed to be the Speaker, for the purposes of those Acts, until a Speaker shall be chosen by the New Parliament." (Id. p. 190.)

Absence of Speaker.

36. Before or during any absence of the Speaker¹³⁴, the House of Representatives may choose a member to perform his duties in his absence.

CANADA.—Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, in case of the absence for any reason of the Speaker from the Chair of the House of Commons for a period of forty-eight consecutive hours, the House may elect another of its members to act as Speaker, and the member so elected shall, during the continuance of such absence of the Speaker, have and execute all the powers, privileges, and duties of Speaker.—B.N.A. Act, sec. 47.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, the introductory words of the clause were "In case of the absence of the Speaker." In the clause so introduced and adopted at the Adelaide session, 1897, these introductory words were omitted. At the Sydney session, the clause was altered by the Drafting Committee to its present form. (See Historical Note, sec. 18.)

§ 134. "Absence of the Speaker."

"Formerly no provision was made for supplying the place of the Speaker by a deputy Speaker pro tempore, as in the Upper House, and, when he was unavoidably absent, no business could be done, but the Clerk acquainted the House with the cause of his absence, and put the question for adjournment. When the Speaker by illness was unable to attend for a considerable time, it was necessary to elect another Speaker, with the usual formalities of the permission of the Crown, and the royal approval. On the recovery of the Speaker, the latter would resign, or 'fall sick,' and the former was re-elected, with a repetition of the same ceremonies. In 1855, on the report of a select committee, standing order No. 83 was agreed to, which enabled the chairman of ways and means, as deputy Speaker, to take the chair during the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, and perform his duties. The provisions of this standing order received statutory authority by Act 18 and 19 Vic. c. 84." (May's Parl. Prae. 10th ed. p. 191.)

Resignation of member.

37. A member may by writing addressed to the Speaker, or to the Governor-General if there is no Speaker or if the Speaker is absent from the Commonwealth, resign his place¹³⁵, which thereupon shall become vacant.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill, 1891, the clause was in substantially the same form. At the Adelaide session, 1897, it was introduced and passed exactly as it stands.

§ 135. "Resign His Place."

"In England it is a settled principle of parliamentary law, that a member, after he is duly chosen, cannot relinquish his seat; and, in order to evade this restriction, a member who wishes to retire, accepts office under the Crown, which legally vacates his seat, and obliges the house to order a new writ. The offices usually selected for this purpose are the offices of steward or bailiff of her Majesty's three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough, and Bonenham; or the steward of the manors of East Hendred, Northstead, or Hempholme, which, though the offices have sometimes been refused, are ordinarily given by the Treasury to any member who applies for them, unless there appears to be sufficient ground for withholding them. The office is retained until the appointment is revoked to make way for the appointment of another holder thereof." (May's Parl. Prac. 10th ed. p. 605.)

"The obligation to serve and to continue to serve during the continuance of the Parliament has been relaxed, although by a different method. The Chiltern Hundreds continue, though in a different sense, to afford in the days of Victoria to unwilling legislators the protection which they afforded in the days of Edward the Second." (Hearn's Gov. of Engl. p. 533.)

Vacancy by absence¹³⁶.

38. The place of a member shall become vacant if for two consecutive months of any session of the Parliament he, without the permission of the House, fails to attend the House.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 the clause was as follows:—

"The place of a member of the House of Representatives shall become vacant if for one whole session of the Parliament he, without the permission of the House of Representatives entered on its journals, fails to give his attendance in the House."

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced in substantially the same words; but in Committee, on Mr. Barton's motion, the words "two consecutive months of any session" were substituted for "one whole session." (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 734.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislature of Tasmania, to substitute "thirty consecutive sitting days in any session" was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 460-1.) At the Melbourne session, after the fourth report, the words "entered on its journals" were omitted.

§ 136. "Absence."

It is an ancient constitutional rule that every person elected to serve in Parliament is bound so to serve. "Service in Parliament" was a duty which might be cast upon every person not expressly disqualified; this duty he could not decline or invade, and even the Crown could not exempt him from the obligation. It is a consequence of the same principle that members are bound to attend during the whole time that Parliament is sitting. Several Acts have been passed in England to enforce this duty; and though the Crown does not now interfere, the House of Commons claims, and occasionally exercises, the right to compel the attendance of all its members by a "call of the House." (Hearn, Gov. of Eng. pp. 532-3.)

Where a statute provided that "if any legislative councillor shall for two successive seasons fail to give his attendance, without permission, his seat shall thereby become vacated," and a councillor absented himself during the whole of three sessions, having previously obtained a permission for a year, which period of time, in the event, covered the whole of the first and part of the second session: Held, that his seat was vacated, as the permission did not cover two successive sessions. (Att.-Gen. [Queensland] v. Gibbon, 12 App. Cas. 442; Dig. of Engl. Case Law, vol. 3, p. 493.)

Quorum¹³⁷.

39. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the presence of at least one-third of the whole number of the members of the House of Representatives shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the House for the exercise of its powers.

UNITED STATES.— . . . a majority of each (House) shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties, as the House may provide.—Const. Art. I. sec. v. sub-s. 1.

SWITZERLAND.—In either Council a quorum is a majority of the total number of its members.—Const. Art. 87.

CANADA.—The presence of at least twenty members of the House of Commons shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the House for the exercise of its powers; and for that purpose the Speaker shall be reckoned as a member.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 48.

GERMANY.—To render action valid, the presence of a majority of the statutory number of members shall be required.—Const. Art. 28.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 39, Chap. I. of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, was in the same words, and was adopted verbatim at the Adelaide session, 1897. In Committee at Adelaide, Mr. Carruthers contended that the quorum was too high, and suggested "twenty." This was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 735.)

§ 137. "Quorum."

The Constitutions of different countries vary widely as to the principle of the quorum and the mode of its determination. In the United States, in Switzerland, in Canada, and (as regards the Diet) in Germany, the quorum is fixed as a constitutional principle. In Great Britain, and France, on the other hand, the quorum is regarded as a matter of internal procedure, which each House determines for itself. This is regarded by Dr. Burgess as a defect, as it leaves to the caprice of an undefined number of members of each House the control over an important structural principle. (Pol. Science II., 124.) In the British colonies the British example has not been followed, the quorum being invariably prescribed in their Constitution Acts.

As to the proportion of members which should form a quorum, British and Continental ideas differ widely. On the Continent of Europe, and in the United States of America, the most general quorum is an absolute majority of members.

"In those cases where the quorum is fixed by the Constitutions there is substantial agreement upon the principle that the presence of a majority of the legal number of members in the House is necessary and sufficient to the transaction of legislative business. This principle is also adopted as a rule of procedure by both Houses of the French Legislature. The French Senate requires not only the presence of the majority of its members, but also their votes, for or against a motion. The quorum of the absolute majority, i.e., the majority of the legal number of members, may be said to be the modern principle in general legislation. Its reason is that the majority represents in this respect the whole, and is vested with the powers of the whole. If this were not the principle, legislative action would be exposed to the tricks and stratagems of the minority to an unbearable degree." (Burgess, Pol. Science, ii. 124-5.)

In the British Parliament, on the other hand, the quorum of the House of Commons has, from very early times, been fixed at 40, and that of the House of Lords at 3; though the Houses now number respectively 670 and 586 members. Dr. Burgess points out that the fact that, under the British system, legislation is controlled by the Ministry, would make it unnecessary, and often inconvenient, to require a majority quorum. (Pol. Science, ii. 125.) In the Parliaments of British colonies the quorum fixed is invariably less than an absolute majority; being sometimes fixed at one-third, or one-fourth, and sometimes at an arbitrary number representing even a lower proportion.

Voting in House of Representatives.

40. Questions arising in the House of Representatives shall be determined by a majority of votes other than that of the Speaker. The Speaker shall not vote unless the numbers are equal, and then he shall have a casting vote.

CANADA.—Questions arising in the House of Commons shall be decided by a majority of voices other than that of the Speaker, and when the voices are equal, but not otherwise, the Speaker shall have a vote.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 49.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, and in the Adelaide draft of 1897, the clause was in substantially the same form. At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Parliament of Victoria was submitted, to add a proviso that “in case of a proposed amendment of the Constitution the Speaker may vote notwithstanding the votes are not equal, and in such cases he shall not have a casting vote.” It was contended that in the important case of a constitutional amendment, where an absolute majority was required, the Speaker ought not to be deprived of the right to give a vote which might be required to make up the absolute majority. However, the amendment was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 461-3.) At the Melbourne session, a drafting amendment was made after the fourth report.

PART IV.—BOTH HOUSES OF THE PARLIAMENT.

Right of electors of States.

41. No adult person¹³⁸ who has or acquires¹³⁹ a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of a State shall, while the right continues, be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from voting at elections for either house of the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—At the Adelaide session of the Convention, on the discussion of the qualification of electors of the House of Representatives (see Historical Note, sec. 30) Mr. Holder proposed that “every man and woman of the full age of 21 years, whose name has been registered as an elector for at least six months, shall be an elector.” This was opposed as being likely to prejudice the prospects of the Constitution in the colonies where women’s suffrage had not been adopted, and was negatived by 23 votes to 12.

Mr. Holder then, as a compromise, moved an amendment which contained the germ of the above section; namely, to add the words: “No elector now possessing the right to vote shall be deprived of that right.” The object was to prevent the Federal Parliament, when declaring a uniform franchise, from depriving the women of South Australia of the right to vote. Without such a provision, the apprehension was expressed that the women of South Australia might be deprived of the franchise by the Federal Parliament, and such a possibility might induce them to vote against the Constitution when submitted to the people. The proposal was at first objected to on the ground that it would embarrass and fetter the Federal Parliament in framing a uniform franchise; that it showed an unreasonable want of confidence in the Parliament; that the Parliament might be trusted not to do anything unreasonable or unjust. After some discussion the proposal was moulded into the following shape:—"But no elector who has at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of a State, shall be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from exercising such right at the elections for the House of Representatives." This was carried by 18 votes to 15. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 715-32.)

Subsequently Mr. Barton endeavoured to secure the limitation of the clause to rights existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth, but Mr. Holder opposed this, contending that rights existing up to the time of the adoption of a federal franchise ought to be protected. The amendment was negatived; but Mr. Holder met one of Mr. Barton's objections by inserting the words "while the qualification continues," so as not to protect any right which had been withdrawn by the State. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 1191-7.) At the Melbourne session, Mr. Barton moved to limit the protection to rights which any elector "at the establishment of the Commonwealth or afterwards has under the law in force in any State at the establishment of the Commonwealth." He pointed out that the clause as passed at Adelaide embodied certain anomalies which were not intended. He did not object to the provision that a person who at the establishment of the Commonwealth had a right to vote at State elections should retain a right to vote at Federal elections, and should not have that right taken away whilst he remained qualified as a State elector, even though the Commonwealth passed a law for a uniform suffrage. But under the clause as passed in Adelaide, a State might extend its franchise after the establishment of the Commonwealth—not only to women, but perhaps to all persons over sixteen years of age—and those persons would then acquire an inalienable right to vote at federal elections. He thought that went too far. Mr. Holder, however, and those who thought with him, were unable to accept this amendment. They wished to secure the franchise to women in every State which should adopt adult suffrage after the establishment of the Commonwealth, but before the fixing of a federal franchise. They were willing to meet Mr. Barton on the question of the infant vote, and finally he withdrew his amendment with a view to insert, after "afterwards," the words "being an adult." (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1840-55.) Verbal amendments were made after the fourth report. (See Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 2447-8.)

§ 138. "No Adult Person."

The intention of the section is that when the Federal Parliament adopts a federal franchise it may not deprive any adult person of the right to vote at Federal elections, who, at that time, has a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of his or her State. The interpretation of the section, however, is a matter of considerable difficulty. The chief question is whether it merely preserves to individual persons a right to vote at Federal elections, notwithstanding that the general qualification prescribed by the Parliament does not include them; or whether it prevents the Parliament from prescribing any franchise for the Commonwealth which does not extend throughout the Commonwealth every franchise existing, with respect to adult persons in any State. The latter view—that Parliament cannot pass any but a uniform franchise, and that such uniform franchise must level up the franchise in every State to the level of the widest suffrage then existing—seems to have been held by several members of the Convention. (See Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 715-25; 1191-7; Melb., pp. 1840-55.)

It would seem that the words of the Constitution do not justify this view. The power of the Parliament to deal with the qualification is derived from the provision in sec. 30 that "until the Parliament otherwise provides" the qualification of Federal electors in each State shall be that prescribed by the State for the electors of the Legislative Assembly of the State. By virtue of that provision, the Parliament has power (sec. 51—xxxvi.) to make laws for the peace, welfare, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to the qualification of federal electors. The Constitution does not speak of a "uniform qualification" (except incidentally in sec. 128), and does not restrict the Parliament to prescribing a complete franchise or none.

It was even suggested by Mr. Higgins and Mr. O'Connor (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1846-7) that, as a matter of strict law, the Parliament may prescribe different franchises in different States. This proposition seems much too broad; it would seem (see Note § 161, "Peace, Order and Good Government," infra) that a federal law cannot discriminate between one State and another. But here a diversity of franchise in the different States is recognized by the Constitution itself, and it may be fairly argued that any federal law of uniform application, purporting to define in part or in whole the federal qualification, would—subject to the rights reserved by this section—be good and valid, notwithstanding that it did not wholly remove this diversity. This contention may be best explained by two illustrations. It seems clear that the Federal Parliament might lawfully pass a prohibitive law (somewhat in the manner of the Fifteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States) in such terms as these:—

"Notwithstanding the qualification which may be prescribed by the law of a State as the qualification of electors for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, no person otherwise qualified by the law of the State shall be prevented from voting at elections for either House of the Parliament of the Commonwealth by reason only that such person does not possess a property qualification or a qualification based on income or earnings."

There would be no want of uniformity in such a law: on the contrary, it would remove a discrimination which at present exists. True, the whole franchise would not be uniform, but it would be more nearly uniform than at present, and the diversity would be due, not to the Federal Parliament, but to the Constitution itself. (Burgess, Political Sc. II. p. 42.) Again, it is conceived that it would also be competent for the Parliament to prescribe a franchise affirmatively by such a law as the following:—

"Every male adult subject of the Queen, who has been resident for one year within the Commonwealth and for three months in any federal electorate or electoral division shall, unless disqualified by this Act, be entitled to vote in such division at the election of members of either House of the Parliament. Persons of unsound mind, or in receipt of eleemosynary aid, or under sentence for any offence, are disqualified. Provided that this Act shall not be deemed to disqualify any adult person who under section 41 of the Constitution of the Commonwealth has a right to vote at such election."

In such a law, again, there would be no want of uniformity; it would be distinctly in the direction of uniformity: and the diversity which still remained would be due, not to the Federal Parliament, but to the particular individual rights reserved by the Constitution itself.

To hold that such laws as these were unconstitutional, because they fell short of establishing a uniform franchise throughout the Commonwealth, would be to hold that the Federal Parliament is powerless to move a single step in the direction of uniformity unless it is prepared to adopt full manhood and womanhood suffrage. This section, it is contended, imposes no such prohibition. It does not forbid the Parliament to pass franchise laws which do not fulfil certain conditions, but preserves the right of certain persons, described in the section, to vote notwithstanding such laws.

§ 139. "Has or Acquires."

The word "has" apparently refers to rights in existence at the establishment of the Commonwealth; the word "acquires" to rights acquired after that time. At Adelaide (Conv. Deb., pp. 1191-7) Mr. Barton endeavoured to secure the limitation of the clause to rights existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth, but was defeated. At Melbourne (Conv. Deb., pp. 1840-53) he endeavoured to limit it to rights acquired, before or after the establishment of the Commonwealth, under a State law in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth. This he ultimately withdrew on the insertion of the word "adult."

It is clear that a right under this section to vote at federal elections can be acquired after the establishment of the Commonwealth, but it is not so clear that such a right can be acquired after the passing of a federal franchise law, or under State laws passed after the passing of such federal law. Three possible interpretations may be suggested:—

- (1.) That the right may be acquired at any time, under a State law passed at any time.
- (2.) That the right may be acquired at any time, but only under a State law passed before a federal franchise is fixed.
- (3.) That the right must be acquired by the "adult person" concerned before the federal franchise is fixed.

It seems clear from the following extracts that the first of these interpretations was not intended by Mr. Holder, the author of the clause:—

"There is a stage up to which the franchise is purely a State question, and the regulation of the franchise is within the power and authority of the State. The moment that ends is when the Federal Parliament passes a law fixing the franchise. What I want is that so long as the State is free to fix the franchise, any franchise they give shall be protected afterwards. . . . The right of the State to alter the franchise continues, not up to the time of the formation of the Constitution, but up to the time that the Federal Parliament frames a franchise, and I want all the rights granted up to that time preserved in the future. [Mr. Peacock: If the Federal Legislature has legislated?] No. I want the States to have their rights with regard to the franchise unimpaired up to the day when the federal franchise is indicated, and that whatever the franchise shall be at that date it shall be preserved, and so that no person having a right up to that date shall have it taken from him, and that this shall apply not only to South Australia, but also to other colonies who may widen their franchise before the federal franchise is provided." (Mr. Holder, Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 1195.)

"I want the right of the State Parliament to be protected up to the moment when the Federal Parliament moves." (Mr. Holder, Conv. Deb., Melb., p. 1843.)

These quotations make it clear that Mr. Holder did not contemplate the first interpretation, but his expressions seem to waver between the second and the third. In one passage he speaks of persons having a right when the federal franchise is framed—words which seem to contemplate the third interpretation; whilst elsewhere he speaks of protecting the State franchise as it existed at that date—words which involve the second interpretation. The latter seems to accord better with his general object of securing the federal franchise to women in those States where adult suffrage might exist when the federal franchise was framed.

Let us illustrate these distinctions. Suppose that the Federal Parliament fixes a federal franchise, such as suggested above, for male adults; and that afterwards Victoria passes a law extending the Victorian franchise to women. In South Australia the franchise was extended to women before the federal franchise was fixed. Then the three questions are:—

- (1.) Are Victorian women entitled to vote at federal elections?
- (2.) Is a South Australian woman, who has come of age since the federal franchise was fixed, entitled to vote at federal elections; or
- (3.) Are only those South Australian women who were qualified voters at the date of the federal law entitled to vote at federal elections?

Mr. Holder's intention was that Victorian women, under those circumstances, should not be so entitled; though if the Victorian law had been passed before the federal franchise, it would have been otherwise. But he probably intended that South Australia lian women should be entitled to vote, whether actually qualified before or after the federal law, because the franchise under which they claim was in existence before the federal law.

That being the apparent intention, as collected from the debates, it remains to consider the real intention as expressed by the section itself. "No adult person who has or acquires a right" to vote at State elections "shall, while the right continues, be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth" from voting at federal elections. The Federal Parliament being empowered to deal with the qualification, it is not to be presumed that it was intended that the State Parliament should be able, after the Federal Parliament had legislated, to confer by fresh legislation any further right of voting at federal elections. Apparently the only logical way to gather this interpretation from the section, is either (1) to construe "acquires" as meaning "acquires before the framing the federal franchise;" or (2) to construe the word "prevented" as descriptive of a deprivation taking effect at the time of passing of the federal law—not a continuous deprivation enuring under the federal law. The effect of both these readings is the same; and it is submitted that this is the true construction—though it may certainly be argued that "acquires" is not expressly limited in point of time, and that a law which restricts the franchise to certain persons "prevents" all other persons from voting so long as it remains in force.

If this be granted, it becomes necessary to consider when a person "acquires" a right to vote; at the time when he—or she—individually becomes qualified, or at the time when the franchise under which he claims is enacted. Apart from the context, there could be hardly any doubt that no person can be said to have a right to vote until his qualification is complete. The other construction can only be argued on the assumption that a law giving the franchise to a certain class of persons confers a potential or inchoate right on all persons of that class—born or unborn—from the date of the passing of the law; or else that the section refers to the right of the person, not as an individual, but as one of a class. Either construction is very forced. A right would seem to mean a complete right; and the words "no adult person" make no allusion to a class, but single out the case of each individual person to be dealt with on its merits. No mention is made of the law under which such person claims the right, and it would seem that, if the date when the right was acquired is material, we must look to the date when it was actually acquired by the person in question, not the date when it was conferred by law upon all persons of a certain class.

Oath or affirmation of allegiance.

42. Every senator and every member of the House of Representatives shall before taking his seat make and subscribe before the Governor-General, or some person authorised by him, an oath or affirmation¹⁴⁰ of allegiance in the form set forth in the schedule to this Constitution.

CANADA.—Every member of the Senate or House of Commons of Canada shall, before taking his seat therein, subscribe before the Governor-General or some person authorized by him . . . the oath of allegiance contained in the fifth Schedule to this Act.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 123.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 5, Chap. I., of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was in almost identical words, and was adopted at the Adelaide session, 1897. At the Melbourne session, verbal amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report. In the Bill as introduced into the Imperial Parliament (when the Constitution was placed as a schedule to the Act), the words "to this Constitution" were added after "schedule" in this section.

§ 140. "Oath or Affirmation."

There are two forms of oath known in modern legal and official proceedings; first the adjuration by invocation of the Deity, with uplifted hand, commonly called the Scotch oath; secondly, the ordinary oath on the Bible, ending with the words "So help me God." An affirmation is a solemn assertion or denial, omitting the invocation of the Deity.

Since the year 1534 it has been customary for members of both Houses of Parliament to take the oath of allegiance. (Anson, Law and Custom of the Constitution, 3rd ed. p. 6.)

An unsworn member is only debarred from sitting or voting; he is entitled to all the other rights, privileges, and immunities of a member. His seat, however, is liable to forfeiture if he fails to attend the House for a specified time. (See sections 20 and 38.)

By the English Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vic. c. 19), one uniform oath, containing no reference to Christianity, was prescribed for members of the House of Commons. By the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vic. c. 72), the form of oath which appears in the schedule to this Constitution was adopted. In 1888, an Act was passed (51 and 52 Vic. c. 46) enabling members of the House of Commons, who objected to be sworn on the ground that the taking of an oath was contrary to their religious belief, to make a solemn affirmation in lieu of an oath. The affirmation prescribed begins with the words "I, A.B., do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm," followed by the other words required by law, and omitting any imprecation. This Act was passed as a result of Mr. Bradlaugh's celebrated contest with the House of Commons. (Attorney-General v. Bradlaugh, 14 Q.B.D. 667.)

Member of one House ineligible for other.

43. A member of either House of the Parliament shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of the other House¹⁴¹.

CANADA.—A Senator shall not be capable of being elected or of sitting or voting as a member of the House of Commons.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 39.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 33, Chap. I., of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 provides that "A Senator shall not be capable of being elected or of sitting as a member of the House of Representatives," and the same clause was adopted at the Adelaide session, 1897. At the Sydney session, a suggestion of the Legislature of Tasmania, to omit the clause and substitute a provision applying to both Houses, was adopted. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 459-60, 992-3, 1011.) At the Melbourne session, verbal amendments were made before the first report, and after the fourth report.

In Chap. V. of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 there were two clauses (10 and 11) prohibiting a member of either House of the Federal Parliament from being chosen or sitting as a member of either House of a State Parliament, and providing that if a member of a State Parliament were elected to the Federal Parliament, his seat in the State Parliament should become vacant. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 877-83.) In the Adelaide draft of 1897 these clauses were omitted, and in Committee, Sir Edward Braddon moved their insertion. It was thought, however, that it might be left to each State, if it thought fit, to disqualify members of the Federal Parliament from sitting in the State Parliament, and the clauses were negatived. (Conv. Deb., Adel., 1181-2.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislature of Tasmania, that a member of a State Parliament should be incapable of sitting in either House of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 996-1011.)

§ 141. "A Member of the Other House."

"English peers are ineligible to the House of Commons, as having a seat in the Upper House; and Scotch peers, as being represented there by virtue of the Act of Union; but Irish peers, unless elected as one of the representative peers of Ireland, may sit for any place in Great Britain." (May's Parl. Prac. 10th ed. p. 229.)

A provision to this effect, founded on the constitutional practice of the Imperial Parliament, is common to the Constitutions of all the Australian colonies.

Disqualification¹⁴².

44. Any person who—

- (i.) Is under any acknowledgment of allegiance, obedience, or adherence¹⁴³ to a foreign power, or is a subject or a citizen¹⁴⁴ or entitled to the rights or privileges of a subject or a citizen of a foreign power: or
- (ii.) Is attainted of treason¹⁴⁵, or has been convicted and is under sentence, or subject to be sentenced, for any offence¹⁴⁶ punishable under the law of the Commonwealth or of a State by imprisonment for one year or longer: or
- (iv.) Holds any office of profit under the Crown¹⁴⁷, or any pension¹⁴⁸ payable during the pleasure of the Crown out of any of the revenues of the Commonwealth: or
- (v.) Has any direct or indirect pecuniary interest in any agreement¹⁴⁹ with the Public Service of the Commonwealth otherwise than as a member and in common with the other members of an incorporated company consisting of more than twenty-five persons:

shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a senator or a member of the House of Representatives.

But sub-section iv. does not apply to the office of any of the Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth¹⁵⁰, or of any of the Queen's Ministers for a State¹⁵¹, or to the receipt of pay, half pay, or a pension by any person as an officer or member of the Queen's navy or army¹⁵², or to the receipt of pay as an officer or member of the naval or military forces of the Commonwealth by any person whose services are not wholly employed by the Commonwealth.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, the provisions as to disqualifications and vacancies were contained in clauses 46, 47, 48, and 49 of Chap. I. Clause 46 provided for the disqualification of persons under certain disabilities; clause 47 declared vacant the seats of members becoming subject to such disabilities; clause 48 provided for both disqualification and vacancy in case of contractors; and clause 49 did the same in the case of persons holding or taking an office of profit under the Crown. The same arrangement was followed in the Adelaide draft of 1897; but at the Melbourne session, before the first report, the four clauses were re-arranged into two: one disabling certain persons from being chosen or sitting as members, the other vacating the seats of members in certain cases. The debates will be most conveniently referred to under the heads of the several disabilities:

Foreign Allegiance.—At the Adelaide session, Mr. Gordon suggested the insertion of words removing the disability of a person who has taken an oath of foreign allegiance, if he since become a naturalized British subject. No amendment was moved. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 736.)

Attainder or Conviction.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, the provision was that a person “attainted of treason, or convicted of felony or any infamous crime” should be incapable “until the disability is removed by . . . the expiration or remission of the sentence, or a pardon, or release, or otherwise.” In Committee, Mr. Wrixon objected to the express provision that an ex-convict might be a member of Parliament, and proposed to make the disqualification permanent; but this was negated by 27 votes to 9. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 655-9.) At the Sydney session, 1897, Mr. Barton mentioned a suggestion by Sir Samuel Griffith to substitute more precise terms for “felony or other infamous crime.” (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 1020-2.) Accordingly at the Melbourne session, before the first report and after the fourth report, the provision was altered to its present form. (See Conv. Deb., Melb., p. 2445.)

Bankruptcy or Insolvency.—At the Sydney session, 1897, a suggestion by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, to omit the disqualification of “an undischarged bankrupt or insolvent or a public defaulter” was supported by Mr. Carruthers, but was negated. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 1015-9.) The same omission was again moved by Mr. Carruthers at the Melbourne session. It was argued on the one hand that bankruptcy did not necessarily involve moral delinquency; and on the other that, for the public security, a bankrupt ought to be disqualified until the court has pronounced upon his conduct and given him a discharge. The amendment was again negated. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1931-41.)

Office of Profit.—Conv. Deb., Syd. (1891), pp. 660-2, 898; Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 754-6; Conv. Deb., Syd. (1897), pp. 1028-9. At the Melbourne session, Sir John Forrest moved to insert an exemption in favour of “any of the Queen’s Ministers in a State,” which was agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1941-2. See ib. p. 2448.)

At the Adelaide session, Sir Geo. Turner suggested the insertion of a provision similar to section 6 of the Constitution of Victoria, making it penal for any person, while he is a member of Parliament, or within six months after ceasing to be a member, to accept any office of profit under the Crown. After debate a proposal was made by Sir William Zeal, to the effect that until the Parliament otherwise provides, no person while a member or within six months of ceasing to be a member should hold or take any office which would disqualify a person from being chosen or sitting as a member. This was carried by 19 votes to 18. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 739-53, 1198.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Council of New South Wales, that this provision be omitted, was agreed to by 19 votes to 10. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 1029-34.)

Agreement with the Public Service.—Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 736-7; Conv. Deb., Syd. (1897), pp. 1022-8.

General.—At the Sydney session, 1897, Mr. Glynn, in accordance with one of three alternative suggestions made by Sir Samuel Griffith, proposed to insert at the beginning of the clause the words “until the Parliament otherwise provides.” This was negatived by 26 votes to 8. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 1012-5.)

§ 142. “Disqualification.”

Section 44 enumerates different kinds of status which, while they continue, render “any person” incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a senator or a member. That is to say, the continuance of the disqualifying status makes a “person” incapable of becoming or being a senator or a member.

If a disqualified person is declared duly elected, he is nevertheless not chosen within the meaning of the Constitution, and accordingly is not a senator or a member. He is forbidden to sit as a senator or a member, and is liable to a penalty if he does so sit. This section does not, like the next section, declare that “his place shall become vacant,” because he is incapable of having a place. The proper course for the House, upon proof of the disqualification, is either (1) to declare the candidate next on the poll duly elected, or (2) to declare that the seat is vacant—not that “his place is become vacant”—and require another election.

§ 143. “Allegiance, Obedience, or Adherence.”

Allegiance is the lawful obedience which a subject is bound to render to his sovereign. Allegiance is of three kinds: natural, acquired, or local. (1) Natural allegiance is that which every subject born from his birth owes to his sovereign. He is said to be a natural liegeman, as the sovereign is said to be his natural liege lord. (2) Allegiance is acquired where one is naturalized, or made a denizen. (3) The allegiance owed by every resident in the British dominions for the protection he enjoys is called local. It is customary, however, at the present day to restrict the use of the word to the first and second of these—the bond which attaches a subject to his sovereign—though some authors still speak of “local allegiance” as due by both British subjects and aliens alike, while within the dominions of the Crown, to distinguish it from the allegiance due by British subjects on foreign soil, and entitling them also to protection there. Under British law, until the Naturalization Act of 1870, no natural-born British subject could divest himself of his allegiance; but since that Act he may make a declaration of alienage, and thereafter he ceases to be a British subject. Aliens, on naturalization, are required to take an oath of allegiance (see Naturalization Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vic. c. 14, s. 9; Naturalization Oaths Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vic. c. 102; and Regulations issued by the Home Office in exercise of the powers contained in the Naturalization Acts, 1870. Encyclopedia of the Laws of England, vol. i. p. 225.)

§ 144. “A Subject or a Citizen.”

A subject is one who, from his birth or oath, owes lawful obedience or allegiance to his liege lord or sovereign. “Citizen” is the term usually employed, under a republican form of government, as the equivalent of “subject” in monarchies of feudal origin. (Ency. of the Laws of Eng., iii. p. 35.) See Note § 463 infra, “Subject of the Queen.”

“While the active duties of the citizen of a Commonwealth can hardly be discharged beyond the territories of that Commonwealth, the duties of the subject of a king, the subject, that is, of a personal master, are as binding on one part of the earth’s surface as on another. I have just used words which go to the root of the matter. I have used words ‘citizen’ and ‘subject.’ The difference between the two conceptions is nowhere put on a more living shape than in the use of those two names. The Greek would have deemed himself degraded by the name of ‘subject.’ To him the word that best translates it expressed the position of men who, either in their own persons or in the person of the cities to which they belonged, were shorn of the common rights of every city, of every citizen. We use the word 'subject' daily without any feeling of being lowered by it. It has become so familiar that it is assumed as the natural phrase to express membership of a political body, and it is often used when it is quite out of place. I once read, and that in a formal document, of a 'Swiss subject,' and I had the pleasure of explaining that there had been no subjects, no Unterthanen, in Switzerland since 1798. And the question comes, What are we to say instead? 'Swiss citizen,' 'French citizen,' 'citizen of the United States,' have this awkwardness about them, that the community whose membership they express is not a city. The very awkwardness points to the main difference between the world of old Hellas and the world of modern Europe, the difference in scale. Be it kingdom or be it commonwealth, the State with which modern politics have to deal is not a city but something vastly greater." (Freeman, pp. 23-24.)

§ 145. "Attainted of Treason."

In 1870 O'Donovan Rossa, a convict in prison under sentence of penal servitude for life for felony under the Treason-Felony Act, 11 and 12 Vic. c. 12, was returned as member of the House of Commons for the County of Tipperary. It was contended that as he was not "attainted of treason" there was no disqualification, but the House determined that "John O'Donovan Rossa having been adjudged guilty of felony and sentenced to penal servitude for life, and being now imprisoned under such sentence, he has become and still continues incapable of being elected or returned as a member of the House," and a new writ was issued.

§ 146. "Or has been Convicted, and is Under Sentence for any Offence."

An offence is some act or omission which is triable and punishable, either on indictment or information, in a superior court before a jury, such as a felony or misdemeanor, or summarily before Justices, according to the direction of the law creating the offence. A person convicted of an offence of any description against the law of the Commonwealth or against the law of a State, whether it be felony or misdemeanor, or an offence punishable on summary conviction, and undergoing sentence of imprisonment for the term of one year or more, is disqualified for membership until he has served his sentence.

In England persons convicted of treason or felony, and sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour, or for a term exceeding twelve months, are incapable of being elected members of the House of Commons or of sitting and voting therein until they have served their sentence. (33 and 34 Vic. c. 23, sec. 2.) Conviction for misdemeanor or offences punishable summarily does not disqualify for membership of the House of Commons. The House, however, has jurisdiction to expel any member guilty of an infamous or disgraceful offence, even though it does not amount to a felony followed by a conviction and sentence as above defined.

In 1875 John Mitchel was returned to the House of Commons for the County of Tipperary, without a contest. It was well known that he was an escaped prisoner and had not completed the term of transportation for which he had been sentenced. A new writ was accordingly issued, and Mitchel was again returned to the House, after a contest. The defeated candidate filed a petition against Mitchel's return and praying for the seat. It was referred to the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, and the petitioner, who had given due notice of the disqualification, was adjudged entitled to the seat. (May, 10th ed. pp. 33 and 619.)

§ 147. "Office of Profit under the Crown."

A person holding an office of profit under the Crown is incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a senator or as a member of the House of Representatives. This general disqualification would apply to persons holding office under the Crown in any part of the British dominions, with the exceptions mentioned at the end of this section, viz., (1) the Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth ; (2) the Queen's Ministers for a State ; (3) officers or members of the Queen's army or navy in receipt of pay, half-pay, or a pension ; and (4) to officers or members of the naval or military forces of the Commonwealth whose services are not wholly employed by the Commonwealth.

The office of President of the Senate, or Speaker of the House of Representatives, with a salary annexed thereto, would not be an office of profit under the Crown. Those dignitaries are appointed by the respective Houses, not by the Crown ; they are not servants of the Crown. (See Conv. Deb., Melb., p. 2448.)

"In England the holders of new offices under the Crown created since 25th October, 1705, are incapable of being elected or of sitting and voting (6 Anne, c. 41, s. 24) unless a statutory exception has been made in favour of such new offices. By sec. 25, members of the House of Commons accepting from the Crown old offices, that is to say, offices created before 1705, vacate their seats, but may be re-elected." (Encycl. Laws of England, ix. p. 399.)

"No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time ; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." (Const. of U.S. Art. I. sec vi. subs. 2.)

§ 148. "Pension."

In England, persons in receipt of pensions from the Crown, during pleasure, are disqualified by 6 Anne c. 41, sec. 24 ; but under 32 and 33 Vic. c. 15 and c. 43, this does not apply to pensioners in the diplomatic and civil services. Persons disqualified under this Constitution are those in receipt of pensions payable out of the revenues of the Commonwealth during the pleasure of the Crown. Pensioners paid out of the Imperial revenue, or out of the revenues of States, are subject to no disability under this section.

§ 149. "Interest in any Agreement."

This is a disability arising from any contract or agreement for valuable consideration, which any person may have entered into to supply any goods or perform any service to the Government of the Commonwealth. In England, Government contractors are disqualified under 22 Geo. III. c. 45, sec. 1. The reason for the disqualification of Government contractors is that they are supposed to be liable to the influence of their employers.

150. "The Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth."

The Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth, appointed by the Governor-general under sec. 64, are exempt from the general prohibition directed by sub-sec. iv. against office-holders and place-holders occupying seats in the Federal Parliament. It is one of the fundamental principles of the existing system of responsible government, that Ministers of the Crown should be capable of being members of Parliament, and that they should not hold office for any lengthened period, unless they are members ; the reason being that they are responsible to Parliament for their political conduct, and should therefore be present in one of the Chambers in order to answer questions respecting the administration of their departments, to hear Parliamentary criticism, and, if necessary, to defend themselves when attacked.

§ 151. "The Queen's Ministers for a State."

The members of a State legislature are not debarred from becoming members of the Federal Parliament (see Historical Note to sec. 43), and it was thought equally desirable that the members of a State Government should not be so debarred.

§ 152. “Officer or Member of the Queen’s Navy or Army.”

Under this exception to the rule for the exclusion of place-holders, a person in the receipt of pay, half-pay, or a pension, as an officer or member of the Imperial Navy, or of the Imperial Army, is qualified to be a member of the Federal Parliament. In England, the statute 6 Anne c. 41, s. 27, contains an exception in favour of officers in the army and navy accepting a new commission.

Vacancy on happening of disqualification.

45. If a senator or member¹⁵³ of the House of Representatives—

- (i.) Becomes subject to any of the disabilities mentioned in the last preceding section: or
- (ii.) Takes the benefit, whether by assignment, composition, or otherwise, of any law relating to bankrupt or insolvent debtors: or his place shall thereupon become vacant.
- (iii.) Directly or indirectly takes or agrees to take any fee or honorarium for services rendered to the Commonwealth, or for services rendered in the Parliament to any person or State:

HISTORICAL NOTE.—For reference to the corresponding provisions of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, and the Adelaide draft of 1897, see Historical Note, sec. 44.

The provision as to fees or honorariums was first suggested by Mr. Carruthers at the Adelaide session, 1897, and ultimately agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 737-8, 1034-44.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, to omit the paragraph, was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], p. 1028.) At the Melbourne session, after the second report, Mr. Reid moved to insert “or for work done or services rendered in Parliament for or on behalf of any person or corporation.” This was agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1944-7.) After the fourth report, verbal amendments were made. (See Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 2448-9.)

§ 153. “If a Senator or Member.”

The preceding section enumerates different kinds of status, which, while they continue, disqualify “any person” from becoming or being a senator or a member; this section enumerates different acts or events which, if they are done by or happen to a senator or a member, disqualify him from continuing to be a senator or a member. The preceding section refers to the continuing existence of a disqualifying status; this section to the happening of a disqualifying event. This section therefore deals only with senators or members who were qualified at the time of their election, but who become disqualified afterwards.

The disqualifying event mentioned in sub-sec. i. is the acquirement of any of the kinds of status enumerated in the preceding section. If such status existed at the time of the election, the person affected is not a senator or a member; he is dealt with under the preceding section. But if, after becoming a senator or a member, he “becomes subject to” the disability, eo instanti his seat is vacated under this section.

The disqualifying acts mentioned in sub-secs. ii. and iii. are acts which do not involve a continuing status, but which, if done by a senator or a member, vacate his seat.

Penalty for sitting when disqualified.

46. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, any person declared by this Constitution to be incapable of sitting as a senator or as a member of the House of Representatives shall, for every day on which he so sits, be liable to pay the sum of one hundred pounds to any person who sues for it¹⁵⁴ in any court of competent jurisdiction.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 the clause was substantially the same, except that the words “Until the Parliament otherwise provides” were absent. At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced in nearly the same words. In Committee, on Mr. Barton’s motion, the words “or disqualified or prohibited from holding any office” were inserted after “House of Representatives;” and the words “or accepts or holds such office” were inserted before “be liable.” (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 1198-9.) At the Sydney session, Dr. Quick called attention to the provision for a penalty, which had been decided to be unnecessary in respect of the prohibition against plural voting; and Mr. Barton agreed to bring before the Drafting Committee the question of its omission. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, p. 1034.) Subsequently as a drafting amendment, the words previously inserted as to accepting or holding office were omitted, and the words “until the Parliament otherwise provides” were inserted. At the Melbourne session, verbal amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 154. “To any Person who Sues for it.”

A common informer is authorized to sue in a court of competent jurisdiction to recover the penalty for sitting and voting as a member of Parliament when disqualified. The Federal Parliament has power under sec. 77 to enable this penalty to be sued for in a State court.

Disputed elections.

47. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, any question respecting the qualification of a senator or of a member of the House of Representatives, or respecting a vacancy in either House of the Parliament, and any question of a disputed election¹⁵⁵ to either House, shall be determined by the House in which the question arises.

UNITED STATES.—Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.—Const. Art. I. sec. 5, sub-sec. 1.

CANADA.—Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union relative to . . . the trial of controverted elections and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of seats of members . . . shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several Provinces.—B.N.A. Act, sec. 41.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—The Commonwealth Bill of 1891, clause 21, Chap. I., provided that “If any question arises respecting the qualification of a senator or a vacancy in the Senate, the same shall be determined by the Senate.” Clause 44 made a similar provision in the case of the House of Representatives.

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the provision was that “Until the Parliament otherwise provides, any question respecting the qualification of a member, or a vacancy in the Senate, or a disputed return, shall be determined by the Senate;” and similarly for the House of Representatives. In Committee, Sir Edward Braddon proposed to substitute "High Court" for "Senate." Mr. Wise, however, argued that questions of qualifications and vacancies ought to be decided by the House, though disputed returns ought to be decided by the High Court. Sir Edward Braddon withdrew his amendment, and on Mr. Wise's motion the words "or a disputed return" were omitted, with a view to dealing with the matter in another clause. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 680-2.) Subsequently Mr. Barton proposed a new clause (48 A) :—

"Until the Parliament otherwise provides, all questions of disputed elections arising in the Senate or the House of Representatives shall be determined by a federal court or a court exercising federal jurisdiction." This was agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Adel., p. 1150.)

At the Sydney session, 1897, a suggestion by the Legislature of Tasmania, to omit the new clause and restore "disputed elections" to the "qualifications and vacancies" clauses, was considered. It was pointed out that there might be a difficulty as to the first election, before the Parliament could make suitable provision. The whole question was ultimately left to the Drafting Committee. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, pp. 464-6, 993, 1034-5.) The Drafting Committee struck out all three clauses and substituted a clause substantially in the form of this section. At the Melbourne session, drafting amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 155. "Qualification . . . Vacancy . . . a Disputed Election."

This section provides that, until legislation on the subject by the Federal Parliament establishing a different procedure, each chamber shall have exclusive jurisdiction to determine all questions which may arise respecting (1) the qualification of its members, (2) a vacancy which has arisen or which may be alleged to have arisen in its membership, and (3) a disputed election in which it is concerned. Such legislation may assume the form of transferring the jurisdiction to the Federal Courts or to the State Courts, to hear and determine all controversies of the kind.

"In England before the year 1770, controverted elections were tried and determined by the whole House of Commons, as mere party questions, upon which the strength of contending factions might be tested. In order to prevent so notorious a perversion of justice, the House consented to submit the exercise of its privilege to a tribunal constituted by law, which, though composed of its own members, should be appointed so as to secure impartiality, and the administration of justice according to the laws of the land, and under the sanction of oaths. The principle of the Grenville Act, and of others which were passed at different times since 1770, was the selection by lot of committees for the trial of election petitions. Partiality and incompetence were, however, generally complained of in the constitution of committees appointed in this manner; and, in 1839, an Act was passed establishing a new system, upon different principles, increasing the responsibility of individual members, and leaving but little to the operation of chance. This principle was maintained, with partial alterations of the means by which it was carried out, until 1868, when the jurisdiction of the house, in the trial of controverted elections, was transferred by statute to the courts of law." (May's Parl. Prac. 10th ed. p. 613.)

"By the Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices Act, 1868, the Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879, and the statute 44 and 45 Vic. c. 68, the trial of controverted elections is confided to two judges, selected, as regards England, from the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice; as regards Ireland, from the Court of Common Pleas at Dublin; and as regards Scotland, from the Court of Session. Petitions complaining of undue elections and returns are presented to these courts instead of to the House of Commons, as formerly, within twenty-one days after the returns to which they relate, and are tried by two judges of those courts, within the county or borough concerned. The house has no cognizance of these proceedings until their termination: when the judges certify their determination, in writing, to the Speaker, which is final to all intents and purposes. The judges are also to report whether any corrupt practices have been committed with the knowledge and consent of any candidate; the names of any persons proved guilty of corrupt practices; and whether corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election. They may also make a special report as to other matters which, in their judgment, ought to be submitted to the house. Provision is also made for the trial of a special case, when required, by the Court itself, which is to certify its determination to the Speaker. By sec. 5 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vic., c. 51), the election court is directed also to report to the Speaker whether candidates at elections have been guilty by their agents of corrupt practices. The judges are also to report the withdrawal of an election petition to the Speaker, with their opinion whether the withdrawal was the result of any corrupt arrangement. All such certificates and reports are communicated to the House by the Speaker, and are treated like the reports of election committees under the former system. They are entered in the journals: and orders are made for carrying the determinations of the judges into execution." (Id. p. 616.)

In 1872 the Legislature of the Province of Quebec passed an Act transferring to the Supreme Court of the Province the decision of controverted election cases which was previously vested in its own hands. Further and later provision was made by an amending act passed in 1875, by the 90th section of which it was declared that the judgment of the Supreme Court sitting in review "should not be susceptible of appeal."

In 1874 the Canadian Parliament transferred the jurisdiction in the trial and decision of federal election petitions to the ordinary courts of the Provinces, subject to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Amending and consolidating acts, dealing with same subject, were passed in 1886 and 1887. The procedure in the prosecution of such petitions is as follows: a petition is to be presented to the Provincial Court, which is to have the same powers as if such petition were an ordinary cause within its jurisdiction. Short periods of time are prescribed for giving notice of the petition, for taking preliminary objections to it, and for answering it, if those objections are overruled. Every petition is to be tried by one of the judges of the court, without a jury. The trial of every petition is to be commenced within six months of its presentation, and to be proceeded with from day to day until it is over. The court may enlarge the time for commencement of trial, or the period limited for taking any steps or proceedings. The judge may order a special case to be stated for the decision of any question, but it is "as far as possible" to be heard before that judge. An appeal from the judge's decision may be made to the Supreme Court of Canada within eight days. If there is no such appeal, the judge is, within four additional days, to certify his decision to the Speaker of the House of Commons, who is to take action thereupon "at the earliest practicable moment," or "without delay." If there is an appeal, the Supreme Court is to decide, its registrar is to certify the decision, and the Speaker to take action upon it. (Wheeler, J.C. p. 315.)

The validity of the Provincial and Federal Acts was affirmed by the Privy Council in Theberge v. Laundry (1876), 2 App. Ca. 102; Valin v. Langlois (1879), 5 App. Ca. 115, and Kennedy v. Purcell (1888), 14 Sup. Ct. (Canada) Rep. 453; 59 L.T. 279 P.C. On the question whether an appeal should be allowed to the Queen in Council, in controverted election cases, the following extracts from judgments of the Privy Council may be cited:—

"Now the subject-matter, as has been said, of the legislation is extremely peculiar. It concerns the rights and the privileges of the electors, and of the legislative assembly to which they elect members. Those rights and privileges have always, in every colony, following the example of the mother country, been jealously maintained and guarded by the legislative assembly. Above all, they have been looked upon as rights and privileges which pertain to the legislative assembly, in complete independence of the Crown, so far as they properly exist. And it would be a result somewhat surprising, and hardly consonance with the general scheme of the legislation, if, with regard to rights and privileges of this kind, it were to be found that in the last resort the determination of them no longer belonged to the legislative assembly, no longer belonged to the superior court which the legislative assembly had put in its place, but belonged to the Crown in Council, with the advice of the advisers of the Crown at home, to be determined without reference either to the judgment of the legislative assembly, or of that court which the legislative assembly had substituted in its place. These are considerations which would their lordships not in any way to infringe, which they would be far from doing, upon the general principle that the prerogative of the Crown, once established, cannot be taken away, except by express words; but to consider with anxiety whether in the scheme of this legislation it ever was intended to create a tribunal which should have, as one of its incidents, the liability to be reviewed by the Crown under its prerogative. In other words, their lordships have to consider, not whether there are express words here taking away prerogative, but whether there ever was the intention of creating this tribunal with the ordinary incident of an appeal to the Crown. In the opinion of their lordships, adverting to these considerations, the 90th section, which says that the judgment shall not be susceptible of appeal, is an enactment which indicates clearly the intention of the legislature under this Act,—an Act which is assented to on the part of the Crown, and to which the Crown, therefore, is a party,—to create this tribunal for the purpose of trying election petitions in a manner which should make its decision final to all purposes, and should not annex it to the incident of its judgment being reviewed by the Crown under its prerogative. In the opinion, therefore, of their lordships, there is not in this case, adverting to the peculiar character of the enactment, the prerogative right to admit an appeal, and therefore the petition must be refused.” (Per Lord Cairns in Theberge v. Laundry, 2 App. Ca. 107-8.)

“Suppose we recommend Her Majesty to reverse the judgment, how would that decree be carried into execution? It would go to the House of Commons and be reported to the Speaker. The Speaker could not act on his own authority, and could only act by order of the House: suppose the House to say, ‘Her Majesty has no prerogative to do this, and we refuse to carry it out.’ Then there would be an immediate conflict between the House of Commons of the Dominion and Her Majesty. It would not be a very prudent thing for us to advise Her Majesty to reverse a judgment unless we can see our way to having it carried into execution when Her Majesty ordered it. Suppose the House of Commons, on the report of the Supreme Court that both parties had been guilty of bribery, ordered a new writ, but Her Majesty orders that writ to be recalled, or upset the election which had taken place under it. It appears to me there is no mode of carrying out the decree; and we would not advise Her Majesty to reverse a decree unless we saw a mode of carrying the decree into execution.” (Per Sir Barnes Peacock, in Kennedy v. Purcell, 59 L.T. 279 P.C., on a motion for leave to appeal; Wheeler, C.C. 314.)

Allowance to members.

48. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, each senator and each member of the House of Representatives shall receive an allowance¹⁴⁸ of four hundred pounds a year, to be reckoned from the day on which he takes his seat.

UNITED STATES.—The senators and representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.—Const., Art. I., sec. 6, sub-s. I.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 45, Chap. I. of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was as follows:—

“Each member of the Senate and House of Representatives shall receive an annual allowance for his services, the amount of which shall be fixed by the Parliament from time to time. Until other provision is made in that behalf by the Parliament, the amount of such annual allowance shall be Five Hundred Pounds.”

In Committee, Mr. Wrixon suggested that “allowance for his services” was a misdescription; it was merely an allowance for reimbursement of expenses. Mr. Marmion moved the omission of the words “for his services,” but this was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 653-4.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause as introduced was to the same effect, except that the sum was £400. In Committee, Mr. Gordon moved to substitute £500, but this was negatived by 26 votes to 9. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 1031-4.) At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the Legislative Council of South Australia and the Legislature of Tasmania, to reduce the allowance to £300, was negatived. A suggestion by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, to omit “on which he takes his seat,” and insert “of his election,” was negatived. A new clause suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia, to prevent a Minister from drawing both a salary and his allowance as a member, was negatived, as being a matter for federal legislation. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1897], pp. 993-6.) At the Melbourne session, drafting amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 156. "Allowance."

The system known as payment of members has found a place in the Constitution. Each senator and each member of the House of Representatives is entitled to receive an allowance of £400 a year, to be reckoned from the day on which he takes his seat. But neither the principle nor the amount of payment are permanent constitutional provisions. Without an amendment of the Constitution, the Federal Parliament may at any time either abolish payment of members or reduce or increase the allowance which each member is to receive, or alter the method of apportioning the allowance, providing that each member shall be paid according to the distance which he travels or the attendance which he gives at the sittings of his House.

Payment of members of Parliament is not a modern political innovation. It was known and practised in the early history of parliamentary representation in England. (See Hearn's Gov. of Eng. p. 526, cited infra.) It was adopted in the Federal Constitution of the United States. (Art I. sec. 6.) It has been the subject of prolonged controversy in British colonies during the last forty years, and it is now generally regarded as an essential condition of democratic government, especially in young communities. It is in force in most of the responsible government colonies, although in several instances it was not carried without bitter opposition and memorable contests.

In the Dominion of Canada each member of the Senate and of the House of Commons is entitled to an allowance of ten dollars per day for his attendance at Parliament during a session not exceeding thirty days in duration. For a session lasting longer than thirty days each member is paid $1000. In addition to this remuneration, a member is allowed ten cents per mile expenses in travelling from his division or electorate to the seat of government, and return once during the session. If a member fail to attend the sittings of his House, and his absence is not caused by illness, eight dollars for each day on which he does not attend are deducted from his allowance. Members of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales (elected) are paid £300 per year, in addition to which they are allowed to travel free on the government railways and tramways. Members of the Legislative Council (nominated by the Crown) are not paid, but they have similar privileges on the railways. Members of the two Houses of the Victorian Parliament (elected) have respectively remuneration and railway privileges similar to those of New South Wales. Members of both Houses (elected) of the South Australian Parliament are paid at the rate of £200 per year, and in addition enjoy railway facilities. In New Zealand the members of the Legislative Council (nominated by the Crown) are paid at the rate of £150 per year, whilst members of the House of Representatives (elected) receive £240 per year. Members of the Legislative Assembly of Queensland (elected) are entitled to £300 per year, and in addition an allowance of 1s. 6d. per mile on expenses for travelling by land, and the actual cost of travelling by sea for one journey per session from their electorates to the place where the Parliament meets and return. Queensland Legislative Councillors (nominated by the Crown) receive no remuneration. The members of both Houses of the Parliament of Tasmania receive £100 per year, with free passes over the government railway lines. In the United States of America the salary of a senator, representative or territorial delegate in Congress is fixed at $5000 per year with travelling expenses at the rate of 20 cents per mile for one journey per session, from the member's State or electorate to the seat of government and return.

"Another change that time has wrought in the Commons of the Plantagenets relates to the payment of members for their services. This practice, like that of residency, was coeval with representation. The writs de expensis levandis date from the reign of Henry the Third. In subsequent reigns they were issued with as much regularity as the writs of summons. The payment was levied on the several constituencies; and was calculated for the actual period of attendance, and for the time spent in going or returning, according to the distance in each case of the representative from the place at which Parliament met. At first the rate of wages varied according to the rank of the representative or the dearness of the season or other considerations. A Knight by order was paid more than an Esquire, and the latter more than a citizen or burgess. Finally the rate settled down at four shillings a day for Knights of the shire, and half that sum for representatives of towns. Few questions of those times excited greater interest than this payment of members." (Hearn's Gov. of Engl. p. 526.)

"The reign of Elizabeth may probably be taken as the period at which honorary service in Parliament became general. The importance of the House of Commons had greatly increased. The wealth of the country had also increased. Four shillings and two shillings were much less important sums to the subjects of the Tudors than they had been to the victors of Cressy or of Agincourt. The remuneration in honour thus became a sufficient inducement to serve, without the inducement in wages. It is of course impossible to fix a precise date for a change which was probably gradual." (Id. p. 529.)

"But although the right has long been in abeyance, the legal obligation of constituencies has never been removed. In the Long Parliament of Charles the Second the arrears due to members must have amounted to a considerable sum. Accordingly when one of its members, Sir Thomas Shaw, sued out his writ de expensis against the town of Colchester, a general alarm was excited; and a bill was introduced to exonerate the electors from the payment of wages to any member of that Parliament. This measure, however, did not become law; and the old common law right still remains. The last instance in which it was exercised appears to have been in 1681, when, in the fourth Parliament of King Charles, John King sued out his writ against the burgesses of Harwich. It thus appears that by our ancient constitutional usage no persons were bound to serve in Parliament gratuitously; that the payment of members was a charge upon the communities which those members were chosen to represent; that this payment was originally intended merely as an indemnity and not as a source of gain; and that the disuse of this practice is due to the influence of social changes, and not to any formal alteration of the law." (Id. p. 530.)

By s. 2 of the New South Wales Parliamentary Representatives' Allowance Act, 1889, "every member of the Legislative Assembly now serving or hereafter to serve therein" was to receive an allowance, which was to be payable "to every such member of this present Legislative Assembly now serving . . . and to every such member hereafter elected, from the time of his taking his seat, and in every case until he shall resign, or his seat be vacated, or until Parliament shall be dissolved, or shall expire by effluxion of time":—Held, that for the purposes of the Act the Legislative Assembly must be regarded as a permanent body, and that the allowance was intended to be made to members of future Assemblies as well as of that which existed when the Act was passed. (Att.-Gen. New South Wales v. Rennie, 1896, App. Ca. 376.)

Privileges, &c., of Houses.

49. The powers, privileges, and immunities¹⁵⁷ of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and of the members and the committees of each House, shall be such as are declared by the Parliament¹⁵⁸, and until declared shall be those of the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom, and of its members and committees, at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

CANADA.—The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that the same shall never exceed those at the passing of this Act held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof.—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 18.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Clause 8, Chap. I. of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was to the same effect. In Committee, several members thought that the word "powers" was too large; and Mr. Wrixon suggested that it should be declared that the powers should not exceed those of the House of Commons. A proposal by Mr. Adye Douglas, to omit "powers," was negatived. (Conv. Deb., Syd. [1891], pp. 555-7.)

At the Adelaide session, 1897, the clause was introduced in substantially the same form, and in Committee some verbal amendments were made. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp. 635, 1189.) At the Melbourne session, verbal amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 157. "Powers, Privileges, and Immunities."

The rights, duties, powers, privileges, and immunities of each House of the British Parliament, and of the committees and members of each House, form a part of the common law technically called the lex et consuetudo parliamenti. This law of Parliament is only to be collected "out of the ancient rolls of Parliament and other records, and by precedents and continual experience." (Coke, 4 Inst. 15.) The sole evidence of the ancient law of Parliament is to be found in the declarations, customs, and usages of Parliament. Each House may expound the law of Parliament and vindicate its own privileges, but no new privileges can be created. In 1704 at a joint conference of the Lords and Commons, it was resolved: that neither House of Parliament has any power by vote or declaration to create for itself new privileges not warranted by the known laws and customs of Parliament. (May, 10th ed. p. 61.)

POWERS AND PRIVILEGES.—The following are among the principal powers and privileges of each House, and of the members of each House, of the Imperial Parliament, as now known to the law:—

- (i.) The power to order the attendance at the bar of the House of persons whose conduct has been brought before the House on a matter of privilege.
- (ii.) The power to order the arrest and imprisonment of persons guilty of contempt and breach of privilege.
- (iii.) The power to arrest for breach of privilege by the warrant of the Speaker.
- (iv.) The power to issue such a warrant for arrest, and imprisonment for contempt and breach of privilege, without showing any particular grounds or causes thereof.
- (v.) The power to regulate its proceedings by standing rules and orders having the force of law.
- (vi.) The power to suspend disorderly members.
- (vii.) The power to expel members guilty of disgraceful and infamous conduct.
- (viii.) The right of free speech in Parliament, without liability to action or impeachment for anything spoken therein; established by the 9th article of the Bill of Rights.
- (ix.) The right of each House as a body to freedom of access to the sovereign for the purpose of presenting and defending its views.

BREACHES OF PRIVILEGES.—The following are instances of breaches of privileges:—

- (i.) Wilful disobedience to the standing rules and orders of the House passed in the exercise of its constitutional functions.
- (ii.) Wilful disobedience to particular orders of the House, made in the exercise of its constitutional functions.
- (iii.) Wilfully obstructing the business of the House.
- (iv.) Insults, reflections, indignities and libels on the character, conduct and proceedings of the House and of its members.
- (v.) Assaults on members of the House.
- (vi.) Interference with the officers of the House in the discharge of their duties.

ENFORCEMENT OF PRIVILEGES.—The privileges of Parliament are enforced, and breaches thereof punished, by the power vested in each House to order the arrest and imprisonment of offenders. The power of commitment, with all the authority which can be given by law, is said to be the Keystone of Parliamentary privilege.

“Either House may adjudge that any act is a breach of privilege and contempt; and if the warrant recites that the person to be arrested has been guilty of a breach of privilege, the courts of law cannot inquire into the grounds of the judgment, but must leave him to suffer the punishment awarded by the High Court of Parliament, by which he stands committed.” (May’s Parl. Prac. 10th ed. p. 66.)

“The Habeas Corpus Act is binding upon all persons whatever, who have prisoners in their custody; and it is therefore competent for the judges to have before them persons committed by the Houses of Parliament for contempt; and it is the practice for the Serjeant-at-arms and others, by order of the house, to make returns to writs of habeas corpus.” (Id. p. 67.)

“But although the return is made according to law, the parties who stand committed for contempt cannot be admitted to bail, nor the causes of commitment inquired into, by the court of law.” (Id. p. 67.)

“It may be considered, accordingly, as established, beyond all question, that the causes of commitment by either house of Parliament, for breaches of privilege and contempt, cannot be inquired into by courts of law; but that their adjudication is a conviction, and their commitment, in consequence, an execution. No other rule could be adopted consistently with the independence of either house of Parliament; nor is the power thus claimed by Parliament greater than the power conceded by the courts to one another.” (Id. p. 67.)

“One qualification of this doctrine, however, must not be omitted. When it appears, upon the return of the writ, simply that the party has been committed for a contempt and breach of privilege, it has been universally admitted that it is incompetent for the courts to inquire further into the nature of the contempt; but if the causes of commitment were stated on the warrant, and appeared to be beyond the jurisdiction of the house, it is probable, judging by the opinion expressed by Lord Ellenborough, in Burdett v. Abbot (5 Dow 165; 14 East 1), and by Lord Denman in the case of the sheriff of Middlesex (11 A. and E. 273), that their sufficiency would be examined. The same principle may be collected from the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Gosset v. Howard (10 Q. B. 359), where it is said ‘It is presumed, with respect to such writs as are actually issued by superior courts, that they are duly issued, and in a case in which they have jurisdiction, unless the contrary appears on the face of them.’” (Id. p. 68.)

IMMUNITIES.—The following are instances of Parliamentary immunities:—

- (i.) Immunity of members for anything said by them in the course of Parliamentary debates.
- (ii.) Immunity of members from arrest and imprisonment for civil causes whilst attending Parliament, and for forty days after every prorogation, and for forty days from the next appointed meeting.
- (iii.) Immunity of members from the obligation to serve on juries.
- (iv.) Immunity of witnesses, summoned to attend either House of Parliament, from arrest for civil causes.
- (v.) Immunity of Parliamentary witnesses from being questioned or impeached for evidence given before either House.
- (vi.) Immunity of officers of either House, in immediate attendance and service of the House, from arrest for civil causes.

WHAT ARE NOT PRIVILEGES.—Neither House has a right to promulgate standing rules and orders, or to make or enforce any particular votes or resolutions, which are contrary to the common law, or to the statute law of the country. Several historical cases have established the principle that there are defined limits to parliamentary privilege, and that any attempted exercise of privilege, in excess of that recognized by law, if not checked by the force of public opinion, may be pronounced illegal on appeal to the courts of law. It is an acknowledged right of the House of Commons to expel a member, who disgraces or defies it, but the House could not legally go further and declare him disqualified for re-election.

“In 1764, John Wilkes was expelled, for being the author of a seditious libel. In the next Parliament (3rd February, 1769) he was again expelled for another libel: a new writ was ordered for the county of Middlesex, which he represented, and he was re-elected without a contest; upon which it was resolved, on the 17th February, ‘that, having been in this session of Parliament expelled this house, he was and is incapable of being elected a member to serve in this present Parliament.’ The election was declared void: but Mr. Wilkes was again elected, and his election was once more declared void, and another writ was issued. A new expedient was now tried: Mr. Luttrell, then a member, accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, and stood against Mr. Wilkes at the election, and, being defeated, petitioned the house against the return of his opponent. The house resolved that, although a majority of the electors had voted for Mr. Wilkes, Mr. Luttrell ought to have been returned, and they amended the return accordingly. Against this proceeding the electors of Middlesex presented a petition, without effect, as the house declared that Mr. Luttrell was duly elected. These proceedings were proved by unanswerable arguments to be illegal; and on the 3rd May, 1782, the resolution of the 17th February, 1769, was ordered to be expunged from the journals, as ‘subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this kingdom.’ In 1832, Mr. Bradlaugh, having been expelled, was immediately returned by the electors of Northampton; and no question was raised as to the validity of his return.” (May’s Parl. Prac. 10th, p. 53.)

The House of Commons could not, by passing a particular or general order authorize the publication of parliamentary papers containing libels. In the case of Stockdale v. Hansard (1836), 9 A. and E. p. 1, it was held to be no defence in law, to an action for publishing a libel, that the defamatory matter was part of a document which was, by order of the House of Commons, laid before the House, and which was afterwards, by order of the House, printed and published by the defendant. In consequence of that decision the Act 3 and 4 Vic. c. 9 was passed which provided that where an action or criminal prosecution, similar to the above, is commenced, it can be stayed by bringing before the court or judge a certificate under the hand of the Lord Chancellor, or of the Speaker of the House of Commons, to the effect that the publication in question was by order of either House, together with an affidavit verifying the certificate. What could not be legally done by one House under cover of privilege could, without any difficulty, be legalized by an act of Parliament; the power of Parliament being unlimited.

PRIVILEGES OF COLONIAL LEGISLATURES.—The law and custom of Parliament (lex et consuetudo parliamenti) is not a part of the common law which Englishmen are presumed to have carried with them, as their political birthright and heritage when they founded new settlements and colonies beyond the seas. The inherent powers and privileges of colonial legislative bodies which have no express grant of powers and privileges similar to those of the British Parliament, have been considered and expounded by the highest legal tribunals of the Empire in a number of leading cases. The principles affirmed were (1) that a colonial legislative body, whether it has been established by Royal Charter, or by statute of the Imperial Parliament, is not entitled to enjoy and exercise the powers, privileges, and immunities of the Houses of the British Parliament, unless those powers, privileges, and immunities have been expressly conferred upon such a body by Imperial statute; (2) that such legislative assemblies can, without express grant, exercise all regulating and self-preserving powers that are necessary for their existence, and for the proper exercise of the functions they are intended to execute. Whatever, in a reasonable sense, is necessary for these purposes is impliedly granted, whenever any such legislative body is established by competent authority. These principles are founded on the maxim, “quanto lex aliquid alicui concedit, conceditur et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potest.” For those purposes protective and self-defensive authority only, and not punitive, are necessary. If a member of a colonial Legislative Assembly is guilty of disorderly conduct in the House, while it is sitting, he may be removed or excluded for a time or even expelled. The power to suspend a member guilty of obstruction or disorderly conduct, during the continuance of any sitting, was held to be reasonably necessary for the proper exercise of the functions of a Legislative Assembly. It was also held that the same doctrine of reasonable necessity would authorize a suspension until submission or apology by the offending member, but that such legislative bodies had no power to order the imprisonment of disorderly members or of other persons guilty of breach of privilege and contempt. (Kielley v. Carson, 4 Moore, P.C. 63; Doyle v. Falconer, L.R. 1 P.C. 328; Fenton v. Hampton, 11 Moo. P.C. 360; Barton v. Taylor, 11 App. Ca. 197.)

Sec. 35 of the Constitution Act of New South Wales, scheduled to 18 and 19 Vic. c. 54. enacted that the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of that colony should, from time to time, prepare and adopt standing rules and orders, provided that such rules and orders should be approved by the Governor. In pursuance of this power the Assembly adopted a standing order as follows: "In all cases not specially provided for hereinafter, or by sessional or other orders, resort shall be had to the rules, forms, and usages of the Imperial Parliament, which shall be followed so far as the same can be applied to the proceedings of this House." At the time when the standing order was so approved, it was one of the rules or usages of the Imperial Parliament for either House of Parliament to suspend from the service of the House for such period as it should name, or, without naming any period of suspension, until it should give directions in the matter, any member persistently and wilfully obstructing the business of the House. Subsequently to the passing of the standing order a rule was adopted by the House of Commons, authorizing the suspension of an obstructing member for a week on the first occasion, for a fortnight on the second occasion, and for a month on the third or any other occasion. The effect of this standing order was considered in 1884 by the Supreme Court of New South Wales, and afterwards by the Privy Council, on appeal, in the case of Taylor v. Barton (6 N.S.W. L.R. 1, 11 App. Ca. 197), in which the plaintiff, a member, sued the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly to recover damages for assault in directing the Serjeant-at-Arms to remove him from the Chamber. The plaintiff had been "suspended from the service of the House" for obstruction. No term of suspension was specified in the resolution directing suspension. Within a week from the passing of the resolution of suspension Mr. Taylor re-entered the chamber and was thereupon removed, which constituted the assault complained of.

It was held by the Supreme Court, and by the Privy Council on appeal, that the resolution must not be construed as operating beyond the sitting during which the resolution was passed; that the standing order of the Legislative Assembly adopting so far as is applicable to its proceedings the rules, forms, and usages in force in the British House of Commons, and assented to by the Governor, was valid, but must be construed to relate only to such rules, forms, and usages as were in existence at the date of the order. (Barton [appellant] v. Taylor [respondent], 11 App. Ca. p. 197.)

The Privy Council was of opinion that the authority conferred upon the Legislative Assembly, by the Constitution Act, was not limited by the principles of common law applicable to those inherent powers which, without express grant, must be implied from mere necessity; but that its authority was sufficient to enable the Assembly to adopt from the Imperial Parliament, or pass by its own authority, any standing order giving itself power to punish an obstructing member, or remove him from the Chamber for any period longer than the current sitting. This of course could not be done by the Assembly without the Governor's assent. The affirmance of the judgment appealed from was founded on the view, not that it could not have been done, but that nothing appeared on the record which gave the resolution, suspending the respondent, a longer operation than the current sitting. (Barton v. Taylor, 11 App. Ca. 197.)

Section 34 of the Constitution Act of Victoria, scheduled to 18 and 19 Vic. c. 55 (1st July, 1855), authorized the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly to prepare and adopt standing rules and orders, which, when approved by the Governor, should be binding and of full force in law. Sec. 35 of the same Act provided:—

"It shall be lawful for the Legislature of Victoria by any Act or Acts to define the privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Council and Assembly and by the members thereof respectively. Provided that no such privileges, immunities, or powers shall exceed those now held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons, House of Parliament, or the members thereof."

Section 35 of the Constitution of South Australia (24th Oct., 1856), contained a similar clause enabling the Parliament of that colony to declare its privileges in like manner. In pursuance of the power conferred by sec. 35 the Parliament of Victoria passed the Act 20 Vic. No. 1, of which sec. 3 (re-enacted in sec. 10 of the Constitution Act Amendment Act, 1890) was as follows:—

"The Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of Victoria respectively, and the committees and members thereof respectively, shall hold, enjoy, and exercise such and the like privileges, immunities, and powers as, and the privileges, immunities, and powers of the said Council and Assembly respectively, and of the committees and members thereof respectively, are hereby defined to be the same as, at the time of the passing of 'The Constitution Statute' were held and enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland and by the committees and members thereof, so far as the same are not inconsistent with the said Act, whether such privileges, immunities, or powers were so held, possessed, or enjoyed by custom, statute, or otherwise."

On 29th April, 1862, Mr. George Dill, the publisher of the Argus, was arrested on a warrant signed by the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, by direction thereof, on a charge of having printed and published a libel concerning the Assembly and one of its committees. On his being brought to the bar of the House, Mr. Dill was adjudged guilty of contempt, and was ordered to be detained in custody for the space of one month. Mr. Dill applied for, and was afterwards brought before a judge of the Supreme Court on, a writ of habeas corpus. Mr. Palmer, the Serjeant-at-Arms, made a return to the writ, justifying detention under the mandate of the warrant of the Speaker, according to the order of the House. The warrant in this case set forth the nature of the contempt complained of as the ground for commitment. It was held by the Court that the power given by sec. 35 of the Constitution Act was well exercised by the legislature of Victoria in the enactment of 20 Vic. No. 1, sec. 3, that the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of Victoria have all the privileges, immunities and powers which were legally held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament at the time of the passing of the "Constitution Statute," and that the publication outside the House, in a newspaper, of an article which the Assembly adjudged to be a libel on the Assembly, on a select committee thereof, and on a member of each, viz such member, is a contempt for which the House has authority to commit. (Dill v. Dill, 1 W. and W. [L.] 171.)

The offending publisher was then remanded in custody. Subsequently he brought an action against Sir Francis Murphy, the Speaker, for false imprisonment. In that action it was held by the Supreme Court that the impossibility of the Legislative Council and Assembly exercising the power of impeachment did not restrict the general words of sec. 35 of the Constitution Act creating the power, or render invalid an enactment which gave other powers that might be exercised by the Council and Assembly. (Dill v. Murphy, 1 W. and W., L. 342, 356.) On appeal to the Privy Council, the decision of the Supreme Court was affirmed. The word "defined" was held equivalent to "declared," and the power given by the Act had been properly exercised. (1864, 1 Moo. C. N.S. 487.)

On 11th March, 1869, the Legislative Assembly of Victoria appointed a select committee to enquire and report upon certain charges which had been made relating to the character and conduct of some of its members. Hugh Glass was examined as a witness before the committee, which afterwards reported to the House that Hugh Glass and John Quarterman had been guilty of bribing and unduly influencing certain members of the Assembly. Glass and Quarterman were then adjudged guilty of contempt and of breach of privilege. They were arrested on the Speaker's warrant, brought before the House, found guilty and committed to the custody of the keeper of the Melbourne gaol. The warrant in this case was couched in general terms, and did not recite particulars of the contempt and breach of privilege. Whilst they were in gaol the Speaker issued another warrant against Glass, similar to the first except that it contained no reference to Quarterman. On 30th April Glass obtained a writ of habeas corpus, directed to the keeper of the gaol, who made a return to the writ, relying on the two warrants as the cause of his detaining the prisoner. The Chief Justice, Sir William F. Stawell, assisted by two other judges, heard the arguments of counsel for and against the discharge of Glass. On the 1st May prisoner was discharged on the ground that the warrant was bad, as it did not describe the contempt so as to show that it was of a kind for which the House of Commons might have committed in 1855. By direction of the House a rule nisi was obtained to set aside the order of the Chief Justice. This rule was argued before the Full Court, which decided that it had no jurisdiction to rescind the order of a judge made on the return to a writ of habeas corpus. The Speaker petitioned Her Majesty in Council for special leave to appeal against the decision of the Chief Justice, and also against that of the Full Court. On the case coming before the Privy Council for hearing, the appeal was allowed, and the orders of the court in the colony were reversed. The Privy Council held that the Assembly had, under sec. 35 of the Constitution Act and the Act 20 Vic. No. 1, the same powers and privileges as those of the House of Commons, and, among them, the power of judging for itself what is a contempt, and of committing for contempt by a warrant stating generally that a contempt has been committed. (Speaker of the Legislative Assembly v. Glass, 1871, L.R. 3 P.C. 560.)

The Legislative Assembly of Victoria, it has been held, does not possess the privilege, by passing resolutions imposing customs duties, to authorize the collection of those duties by a customs officer till the end of the session of Parliament in which such resolutions have been passed. The Supreme Court has power to determine the legality of the privilege. And the statement in the pleadings of such a privilege is a question of law and not of fact, and sec 2 of Act 20, Vic. No. 1, making the journals of the House of Commons, and consequently of the Assembly, prima facie evidence of the privilege, does not turn the privilege into a question of fact; and therefore the privilege could not be admitted by a demurrer to a plea averring such privilege. (Stevenson v. The Queen, 2 W.W. & A'B [L.] 143.)

§ 158. "Such as are Declared by the Parliament."

This section authorizes the Federal Parliament, by an ordinary act of legislation, to declare what shall be the powers, privileges, and immunities of the Senate and its members and committees, and of the House of Representatives and its members and committees. The limitation which is contained in sec. 18 of the Canadian Constitution (amended by 38 and 39 Vic. c. 38), in sec. 35 of the Victorian Constitution, and in sec. 35 of the South Australian Constitution, viz., that the powers, privileges, and immunities so declared shall not exceed those then held and enjoyed by the Commons House of Parliament, does not appear in this section. The Federal Parliament has therefore unrestricted authority to define and declare its powers, privileges and immunities. In the exercise of that authority it could not legally arrogate to itself a new jurisdiction, not within the scope of this section. In the absence of such legislation the powers, privileges, and immunities of each House, and of the committees and members of each House, will be those of the House of Commons, as known to law at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Rules and orders.

50. Each House of the Parliament may make rules and orders¹⁵⁹ with respect to—

- (i.) The mode in which its powers, privileges, and immunities may be exercised and upheld :
- (ii.) The order and conduct of its business and proceedings either separately or jointly with the other House.

UNITED STATES.—Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behaviour, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.—Const., Art. I., sec. 5, sub-s. 2.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the clause as adopted at the Sydney Convention of 1891, and the Adelaide session of the Convention of 1897, the matters as to which rules and orders might be made were somewhat elaborately defined in six sub-clauses, the last of which was: "Generally for the conduct of all business and proceedings of the Senate and House of Representatives severally and collectively." There was no sub-clause dealing with the exercise of powers, privileges, and immunities. At the Adelaide session, Sir Joseph Abbott called attention to the need of some power to protect the privileges of the Houses, and suggested that the power to make standing orders was too narrow. He moved to omit all the sub-sections, and insert words empowering each House to make such standing orders as it should think fit, and giving to such orders the force of law. This was objected to as being too wide, and Sir Joseph Abbott withdrew it. (Conv. Deb., Adel., pp 756-60.) At the Sydney session, on Mr. Isaacs' motion, the word "standing," before "rules and orders," was omitted. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, p. 1035.) At the Melbourne session, before the first report, a new sub-clause was inserted: "The mode in which the powers, privileges, and immunities of the Senate and of the House of Representatives respectively may be exercised and upheld." After the fourth report the five specific sub-clauses were omitted, and verbal amendments were made.

§ 159. "Rules and Orders."

It will be observed that this section recognizes the important distinction between powers, privileges, and immunities," and the "rules and orders" by which such powers, &c., are enforced.

Sub-sec. i. enables each House of the Federal Parliament to make rules and orders, defining the mode or manner in which its powers, privileges, and immunities may be exercised and upheld. It does not authorize the declaration of any power, privilege, or immunity, but merely the procedure requisite for the maintenance and enforcement of the same. Thus, rules could be made prescribing the formalities to be observed in summoning persons to appear at the bar of the House, or to give evidence before its committees; the preparation, form, and execution of warrants for the arrest of persons guilty of contempt, and breach of privilege, and the form of warrants of commitment.

Sub-sec. ii. enables each House to make rules and orders regulating the conduct of its business and proceedings, either when acting separately, or when acting jointly with the other House. Rules and orders may, according to the practice of the Imperial Parliament, be classified as follows: (1) standing rules and orders, (2) sessional rules and orders, (3) orders and resolutions undetermined in regard to duration.

STANDING ORDERS.—These are permanent rules for the guidance and government of the House, which endure from Parliament to Parliament until vacated or repealed. They relate to such matters as the days on which the sittings of the House are held, the hour for commencement of business, the sequence of business on each day, the distribution of business, the preservation of order, the closure of debate, the taking of divisions on question put, the progressive stages of bills, procedure in money bills, examination of public accounts, standing committees on particular subjects, form and reception of petitions, seats in the House, witnesses before the House and its committees, admission and withdrawal of strangers, and orders relating to the introduction and conduct of private bills. In the House of Lords a standing order cannot be suspended except in pursuance of notice of motion. In the Commons the rule is not so stringent, and in cases of emergency a standing order may be suspended without notice, but the unanimous concurrence of the House is generally necessary. (May, 10th ed. p. 145.)

SESSIONAL ORDERS.—These are orders or resolutions which are intended and expressed to last for a session only and which expire at the end of the session.

ORDERS OF UNDEFINED DURATION.—“By the custom of Parliament any order or resolution of either House the duration of which is undetermined, would expire with prorogation; but many of them are, as part of the settled practice of Parliament, observed in succeeding sessions, and by different Parliaments, without any formal renewal or repetition. For examples of resolutions being observed as permanent, without being made standing orders, may be cited the formal reading of a bill at the opening of a session; several resolutions regarding procedure on petitions; the resolution prohibiting members from engaging in the management of private bills; the time for presenting estimates; the rules of the committee of supply; and the means of securing a seat in the house by a member on a select committee.” (May’s Parl. Prac. 10th ed. p. 145.)

PART V.—POWERS OF THE PARLIAMENT.

Legislative powers¹⁰⁰ of the Parliament.

51. The Parliament shall, subject to this Constitution, have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government¹⁰¹ of the Commonwealth with respect to:—

UNITED STATES.—The Congress shall have power:—Art 1, sec. 8.

CANADA.—It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:—B.N.A. Act, 1867, sec. 91.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, the general words of this section were:—“The Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have full power and authority to make all such laws as it thinks necessary for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth, with respect to all or any of the matters following, that is to say.” At the Adelaide session, 1897, these words were reproduced, except that the word “laws” was substituted for the phrase “all such laws as it thinks necessary.” At the Sydney session, there was a short debate upon the words “peace, order, and good government.” (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, pp. 1035-7.) At the Melbourne session, drafting amendments were made before the first report and after the fourth report.

§ 160. “Legislative Powers.”

This important section, containing 39 sub-sections, enumerates the main legislative powers conferred on the Federal Parliament. They are not expressly described as either exclusive powers or concurrent powers, but an examination of their scope and intent, coupled with subsequent sections, will show clearly that, whilst some of them are powers which either never belonged to the States, or are taken from the States and are vested wholly in the Federal Parliament to the exclusion of action by the State legislatures, others are powers which may be exercised concurrently by the Federal Parliament and by the State legislatures.

CLASSIFICATION OF POWERS.—The powers conferred on the Federal Parliament may be classified as (1) the new and original powers not previously exercised by the States, such as “Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits,” “external affairs,” “the relations of the Commonwealth with the islands of the Pacific,” &c.; (2) old powers previously exercised by the colonies and re-distributed, some being (a) exclusively vested in the Federal Parliament, such as the power to impose duties of customs and excise, and the power to grant bounties on the production or export of goods, after the imposition of uniform duties of customs; and others being (b) concurrently exercised by the Federal Parliament and the State Parliaments such as taxation (except customs and excise), trade and commerce (except customs, excise, and bounties), quarantine, weights and measures, &c. The rule of construction is, that the legislative authority of the Federal Parliament with respect to any subject is not to be construed as exclusive, “unless from the nature of the power, or from the obvious results of its operations, a repugnancy must exist, so as to lead to a necessary conclusion that the power was intended to be exclusive;” otherwise, “the true rule of interpretation is that the power is merely concurrent.” (Story, Comm., § 438.)

PLENARY NATURE OF THE POWERS.—An important point to consider is whether the Legislative powers vested in the Federal Parliament are to be regarded as plenary, absolute, and quasi-sovereign, or whether they are merely entrusted to the Federal Parliament as an agent of the Imperial Parliament, so as to come within the effect of the maxim delegatus non potest delegare (Broom’s Leg. Max. 5th ed. p. 840), according to which a person or body to whom an office or duty is assigned by law cannot lawfully devolve that office or duty on another unless expressly authorized. The distinction between the two classes of powers, plenary and delegated, was discussed by the Privy Council in the case of The Queen v. Burah (1878), 3 App. Ca. p. 889. The question here raised was the legality of a section of an Act passed by the Governor-General of India, conferring on the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal the power to determine whether the Act or any part of it should be applied to certain districts. The Privy Council, per Lord Selborne, said:—

“Where plenary powers of legislation exist as to particular subjects, whether in an Imperial or a provincial Legislature, they may (in their Lordships’ judgment) be well exercised, either absolutely or conditionally. Legislation, conditional on the use of particular powers, or on the exercise of a limited discretion, entrusted by the Legislature to persons in whom it places confidence, is no uncommon thing; and, in many circumstances, it may be highly convenient. The British Statute Book abounds with examples of it; and it cannot be supposed that the Imperial Parliament did not, when constituting the Indian Legislature, contemplate this kind of conditional legislation as within the scope of the Legislative powers which it from time to time conferred.” Lord Selborne, The Queen v. Burah, 3 App. Ca. 906.)

At the same time their Lordships were of opinion that the Governor-General in Council could not create in India, and arm with general legislative authority, a new legislative body not created or authorized by the Imperial Act constituting a Council.

In the case of Hodge v. The Queen (1883), 9 App. Ca. 117, the question raised for the decision of the Privy Council was the constitutionality of the Liquor License Act (17), ss. 4, 5, by which the Provincial Legislature of Ontario gave authority to a Board of Commissioners to enact regulations for the government of taverns. The appellant had been convicted for a breach of one of the regulations passed by the Commissioners, and he appealed on the grounds (inter alia) that the British North America Act, 1867, conferred no authority on the Provincial Legislatures to delegate their powers to Commissioners or any other persons; that a Legislature committing the power to make regulations to agents or delegates thereby effaced itself; and that the power conferred by the Imperial Parliament on the local Legislatures could be exercised in full by these bodies only, according to the maxim delegatus non potest delegare. The Privy Council in considering the legislative power of the Provincial Legislatures pointed out the difference between their constitution and that of the Legislative Council of India.

“They are in no sense delegates of, or acting under any mandate from the Imperial Parliament. When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its Legislative Assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the Province, and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in sect. 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by sec. 92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area the local legislature is supreme, and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion, would have had under like circumstances to confide to a municipal institution or body of its own creation authority to make by-laws or resolutions as to subjects specified in the enactment, and with the object of carrying the enactment into operation and effect. It is obvious that such an authority is ancillary to legislation, and without it an attempt to provide for varying details and machinery to carry them out might become oppressive, or absolutely fail. The very full and very elaborate judgment of the Court of Appeal contains abundance of precedents for this legislation, entrusting a limited discretionary authority to others, and has many illustrations of its necessity and convenience. It was argued at the bar that a legislature committing important regulations to agents or delegates effaces itself. That is not so. It retains its power intact, and can, whenever it pleases, destroy the agency it has created, and set up another, or take the matter directly into its own hands. How far it shall seek the aid of subordinate agencies, and how long it shall continue them, are matters for each legislature, and not for Courts of Law, to decide. (Per Sir B. Peacock: Hodge v. The Queen, 9 App. Ca. 132.)

Applying the principles established in the foregoing cases to the Constitution of the Commonwealth, we may draw the conclusions: (1) As the words of the Imperial Act, creating the Federal Parliament and conferring on it legislative powers, are similar in substance and intent to those of the British North America Act, conferring exclusive legislative authority, it follows that the Federal Parliament is in no sense a delegate or agent of, or acts under any mandate from, the Imperial Parliament. (2) Its authority within the limits prescribed by the Constitution are as plenary and ample as the Imperial Parliament in its plenitude possessed and could bestow. (3) Within those limits the Federal Parliament can do what the Imperial Parliament could do, and among other things it can entrust to a body of its own creation power to make by-laws and regulations respecting subjects within its jurisdiction.

LIMITATIONS OF FEDERAL LEGISLATIVE POWER.—As we proceed with an analytical examination of section 51 it will be seen that whilst several of its sub-sections contain grants of legislative power in general and unlimited terms, the grants conveyed by other sub-sections are qualified or subject to restraints. These are known as constitutional limitations. Take sub-section 1. There, the Federal Parliament is assigned power to legislate respecting trade and commerce “with other countries and among the States;” the words quoted are words of limitation excluding from Federal control the internal commerce of each State. This is obviously a federal limitation, justifiable by considerations of federal policy. It is not founded on any distrust of the Federal Legislature; it is not designed for the protection of individual citizens of the Commonwealth against the Federal Legislature. It is, in fact, one of the stipulations of the federal compact. So the condition annexed to the grant of taxing power is, that there must be no discrimination between States in the exercise of that power. This, again, is not a limitation for the protection of private citizens of the Commonwealth against the unequal use of the taxing power; it is founded on federal considerations; it is a part of the federal bargain, in which the States and the people thereof have acquiesced, making it one of the articles of the political partnership, as effectually as other leading principles of the Constitution. Another federal limitation annexed to a grant of legislative power is that bounties granted by the Federal Parliament “shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth.” The authority of the Federal Parliament over bounties is fettered in the same manner and for the same reasons that its authority to tax is fettered.

Attention having been drawn to federal limitations to be found in grants of power contained in sec. 51, the subject may be here further elucidated by the statement that sec. 51 is not the only section of the Constitution in which limitations to the grants therein made are to be found. Logically, if not for perspicuity, the limitation of a power ought to be associated with or in proximity to the conveyance of power. But this rule is not uniformly observed in the drafting of Constitutions. Thus the grant of power over trade and commerce in sec. 51-i. is subject to further qualifications and restrictions contained in subsequent sections. By sec. 92, the Federal Parliament, in common with the State Parliaments, is restrained from interfering with the freedom of inter-state trade and commerce, after the imposition of uniform duties of customs. By sec. 98, the Federal Parliament is unable to pass commercial regulations which may give preference to one State over another State. In like manner the taxing power is subject to other qualifications and restrictions. The Federal Parliament cannot impose a tax which would operate in derogation of the freedom and equality of inter-state trade and commerce; secs. 92 and 98. It cannot impose a tax on property of any kind belonging to a State; sec. 114.

The first part of sec. 115 declares that the Commonwealth (Federal Parliament) shall not make a law establishing any religion. This is an absolute prohibition, an absolute denial of power, which stands in contrast to a limitation or cutting down of a power which is granted. There is, in the Constitution, no express or implied grant of power over religion which the first part of this section can possibly qualify or limit (see Note § 462). The last part of the section, providing that "no religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust under the Commonwealth," is a true and legitimate limitation of a power granted by sec. 69; yet that limitation cannot be described as a federal limitation, warrantable and explainable by federal considerations. It is a notable instance of a national, as compared with federal, limitation. It is an example of the limitation of power founded on what Mr. Lefroy calls "distrust of legislatures." (Law Quarterly Review, July, 1899, p. 256. See also Lefroy, Legisl. Power in Canada, Introd. p. xlv.)

NATURE AND DISTRIBUTION OF POWERS.—It was competent for the people to invest the Federal government with all the powers they might deem proper and necessary, to extend or restrain these powers, and to give them a paramount authority. (Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. 304; Baker, Annot. Const. p. 15.)

The Federal government can claim no powers not granted to it by the Constitution; powers actually granted must be such as are given expressly or by necessary implication. The instrument is to have a reasonable construction according to the import of its terms; where a power is expressly given in general terms it is not to be confined to particular cases, unless that construction grows out of the context or by necessary implication.

The Constitution deals in general language. It does not provide for minute specifications of powers or declare the means by which those powers shall be carried into execution. (Id.)

"I now pass to that which is, perhaps, the most delicate and most important part of this measure, the distribution of powers between the central government and the local authorities; in this, I think, is comprised the main theory and constitution of the Federal Government; on this depends the principal working of the new system: the chief object which we have in view is to give to the central government those high functions and almost sovereign powers by which general principles and uniformity of legislation may be secured on those questions that are of common import to all the Provinces, and at the same time to retain for each Province such an ample measure of municipal liberty and self-government as will allow, and indeed compel, them to exercise these local powers which they can exercise with great advantage to the community." (Lord Carnarvon, in presenting the Canadian Constitution to the House of Lords, 1871.)

§ 161. "Peace, Order, and Good Government."

These, or words nearly similar, have been used in most of the Constitutional Acts passed by the Imperial Parliament, conferring local legislatures on British colonies. The Act 14 Geo. III. c. 83, s. 12, authorized the legislative body appointed thereunder to make ordinances for "the peace, welfare, and good government" of the province of Quebec. The Act 31 Geo. III. c. 31 established legislatures for Upper Canada and Lower Canada respectively, with power to make laws for "the peace, welfare, and good government" thereof. The Act 3 and 4 Vic. c. 35, which united the Upper and Lower Provinces established a Parliament of two Houses with power to make laws for "the peace, welfare, and good government" of Canada. The British North America Act, 1867, (30 and 31 Vic. c. 3) gave the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada power to make laws for "the peace, order, and good government of Canada," in relation to matters not exclusively assigned to the Provinces. By the Act of 9 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 20, 1829, his Majesty was empowered to constitute, in the colonies of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land respectively, Councils to make laws for "the welfare and good government" of the said colonies. By the Act 10 Geo. IV. c. 22, 1829, his Majesty was enabled to authorize any three or more persons resident in the settlement then known as Western Australia, to make and ordain laws, institutions and ordinances for "the peace, order, and good government" of the settlement. The Act 3 and 4 Vic. c. 62, s. 3, 1840, authorized Her Majesty to appoint a Legislative Council in any colony or colonies which might be erected in any islands comprised within the dependencies of New South Wales, and such Council was to be authorized to make laws for "the peace, order, and good government" of such colony. By 5 and 6 Vic. c. 76, 1842, there was created a legislative Council in and for New South Wales, with power to make laws for "the peace, welfare, and good government" of the colony. In the Act 13 and 14 Vic. c. 59, s. 14, 1850, the Governors and Legislative Councils of Victoria, Van Diemen's Land, South Australia, and Western Australia, established, or to be established under that Act, were authorized to make laws "for the peace, welfare, and good government" of the said colonies. By the Constitution Act of New South Wales, scheduled to 18 and 19 Vic. c. 54, a new legislature was created to make laws for the "peace, welfare and good government" of the colony. The Victorian Constitution Act, scheduled to 18 and 19 Vic. c. 55, established a legislature to make laws in and for Victoria in "all cases whatsoever." The Constitution Act of Tasmania (then Van Diemen's Land) of 1st Nov., 1854, called into existence a new legislature which was declared "to have and to exercise all the powers and functions of the Legislative Council" which it superseded. The Constitution Act of South Australia, No. 2, 1855-6, was similarly worded. The Order in Council of 6th June, 1859, creating a legislature in and for the colony of Queensland, authorized it to make laws for the good government of the colony, and to alter or repeal the Order in Council. By the Act to consolidate the law relating to the Constitution of Queensland dated 28th Dec., 1867, it was declared that Her Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Council and Assembly could make laws for "the peace, welfare, and good government of the colony in all cases whatsoever."

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE WORDS.—The Federal Parliament has not general power to make laws for "the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth," but only with respect to matters that are specifically enumerated in the section. The question has been raised as to whether the words "peace, order, and good government" may be construed so as to qualify, limit, or restrict the grant of power. Another question has been raised as to whether they will tend to increase, enlarge, or magnify the grant of power. These two questions will be found referred to in the extracts and cases given below.

Reference may be here made to a third question which has been raised, as to whether the words "for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth" will prevent the Federal Parliament from passing a law which may be confined in its operation to a particular State. On this point some assistance may be derived from several leading Canadian cases. In Russell v. The Queen (1882), 7 App. Cas. 829, the Privy Council held that the Canada Temperance Act, 1878, which was passed by the Dominion Parliament, in order to abolish the retail traffic in intoxicating liquor within every provincial area, or local option district, in which a majority of the electors adopted the Act, was a general law relating to the order, safety, and good morals of the Dominion, and was therefore within the power conferred upon the Dominion Parliament to make laws for "the peace, order, and good government of Canada." In Huson v. South Norwich (1895), 24 S.C.R. (Can.) p. 146, Strong, C.J., said "It is established by Russell v. The Queen that the Dominion, being invested with authority by section 91 to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, may pass what are denominated local option laws. But, as I understand that decision, such Dominion laws must be general laws, not limited to any particular Province."

In the Liquor Prohibition Appeal Case, which came before the Privy Council (1896), App. Ca. 348, these observations of the Chief Justice were quoted by Mr. Haldane, when the following remarks were made:—Lord Watson: "I do not know that they must be general laws, not limited to any particular Province, that they must be for the benefit of the whole of the Provinces." Lord Herschell: "But to legislate in a matter which is a local matter, for one Province only, and merely say we thought it would be for the benefit of all Canada that Ontario should be made a sober place, would be to my mind legislation about which there would be a good deal of question. I think it is too narrow to say that the law must extend to every Province; but, on the other hand, it must not be local legislation in a particular Province." Lord Morris: "I think the Chief Justice is only dealing with the local option laws. . . It is the local option laws, and I think it is strictly right." (Printed Report of Case, pp. 149-50.)

Mr. Lefroy considers that Mr. Edward Blake's argument on the appeal contains a correct summary of the whole matter:—"You have," said Mr. Blake, "the powers limited, when you come to the Province, by the area and the objects; provincial area and provincial objects are the scope. I think each one of the provincial powers is indicated in itself to be for provincial purposes. Instead of setting that out generally at the commencement, in each one of the articles it is specifically stated. But you find, on the contrary, unlimited, save by the express exception, general powers both as to scope, area, and objects in the Dominion. There is, therefore, as I submit, nothing whatever to indicate in the least degree that the power of the Parliament of Canada was so limited as to those subjects on which it might enact that it could not, if the welfare of the whole community in its opinion demanded, enact with reference to particular parts of that community, the legislation which the conditions of that part might, in the interest of all, specially demand. It is quite true that it was hoped and expected, and there was a reasonable hope and expectation, that, as a rule, the legislation would be general, extending over the whole area, the subjects being common. But there is nothing in these powers which prescribes any such limitation, and it is perfectly clear that the peace, welfare, and good government of the whole community may demand, within the undisputed bounds of the legislative powers of the Dominion, an Act of Parliament affecting directly not the whole area, not the whole community, but some part of that community, as to these matters on which the Dominion has power to legislate for a" (Lefroy, Leg. Pow. in Canada, p. 580.)

"These words are copied from the several Acts of the Imperial Parliament providing for the establishment of legislatures in the various Australian colonies, and are perfectly appropriate when used in reference to the establishment of the legislature which is to possess plenary legislative powers, and have unlimited jurisdiction on all questions relating to the protection of life and property, and the enforcement of contractual rights of every kind; but it is very doubtful if they ought to find a place in connection with the definition and delegation of limited legislative powers which do not include matters relating to the daily protection of life and property, or to enforcement of private rights or obligations in general. It is true that they find a place in the 91st section of the British North America Act, which establishes a federal constitution for Canada: but the primary object of that Act is to limit the powers and jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, and to vest the residuum of legislative authority in the Dominion of Canada in the federal parliament. The words in question may, therefore, fitly find a place in the Act, and they were relied upon in the case of Attorney-General of Canada v. the Attorney-General of Ontario, which was decided by the Privy Council last year (App. Ca. 896) to uphold the Act of the Dominion Parliament, which had been challenged on the ground that it had encroached upon the domain of the provincial legislatures. That decision, in effect, appears to me to be an argument against the insertion of the words in question in connection with the definition and delegation of the legislative powers of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, because they might, in some unforeseen and unexpected controversy, afford ground for an argument in favour of the jurisdiction of the Parliament of the Commonwealth in matters which the several States might claim to be wholly within their own legislative powers. It cannot be contended that they are required for the purpose of giving the Parliament of the Commonwealth full power to legislate with regard to all subjects mentioned in the sub-sections of section 51; and, if they are not required for that purpose, they must inevitably encourage the contention that they are inserted for some additional purpose. But, if their insertion is not intended to add in any way to the powers of Parliament, in relation to the matters mentioned in the sub-sections of section 51, then they violate the canon of drafting, which requires that no unnecessary words should be used in giving expression to the intention of the legislature. They are very properly inserted in section 52, because that section confers upon the Parliament of the Commonwealth plenary and exclusive powers in regard to the several matters mentioned in the sub-sections of that section. But their presence in section 51 tends to create a resemblance in the scope of the powers conferred by the two sections, whereas it would be much more desirable to make the difference in the purport of each section as apparent and emphatic as possible." (Memorandum by the Hon. A. Inglis Clark, M.P., Attorney-General for Tasmania, presented to the Federal Convention, Sydney Session, 1897.)

"I should like to submit for the consideration of the leader of the Convention the question whether the words which the legislature of Tasmania have proposed to omit might not raise the question whether legislation of the Federal Parliament was in every instance for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth. Take, for instance, navigation laws. Might it not be contended that certain navigation laws were not for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth, and might there not be litigation upon the point? We are giving very full powers to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and might we not very well leave it to them to decide whether their legislation was for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth? Surely that is sufficient, without our saying definitely that their legislation should be for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth. I hope the leader of the Convention will give the matter full consideration with a view to seeing whether these words are not surplusage, and whether, therefore, they had better not be left out of the bill altogether." (Mr. N. E. Lewis, Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, p. 1037.)

The point submitted for consideration by Mr. Clark and Mr. Lewis did not lead to any debate in the Convention. Mr. Barton stated he had read the reasons through very carefully, and he had been unable to discover that any of the evils which his hon. and learned friend Mr. Clark feared might be expected from leaving those words as they were. The powers were powers of legislation for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth in respect of the matters specified. No construction in the world could confer any powers beyond the ambit of those specified.

In the case Riel v. The Queen, 10 App. Ca. 675, the question was raised as to the validity of a Canadian Act, 43 Vic. c. 25, providing for the administration of criminal justice in the North-west Territories. This Act was passed by the Dominion Parliament under the British North America Act, 1871, 34 and 35 Vic. c. 28, s. 4, which provided that that Parliament might, from time to time, make laws for the administration of peace, order, and good government, of any territory, not for the time being included in any Province. In delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, Lord Halsbury, L.C., said:—

"It appears to be suggested that any provision differing from the provisions which in this country have been made for administration, peace, order, and good government cannot, as matters of law, be provisions for peace, order, and good government in the territories to which the statute relates; and, further, that if a court of law should come to the conclusion that a particular enactment was not calculated as a matter of fact and policy to secure peace, order, and good government, that they would be entitled to regard any statute directed to these objects, but which a court should think likely to fail of that effect, as ultra vires and beyond the competency of the Dominion Parliament to enact. Their lordships are of opinion that there is not the least colour for such a contention. The words of the statute are apt to authorize the utmost discretion of enactment for the attainment of the objects pointed to. They are words under which the widest departure from criminal procedure, as it is known and practised in this country, have been authorized in Her Majesty's Indian Empire. Forms of procedure unknown to the English common law have there been established and acted upon, and to throw the least doubt upon the validity of powers conveyed by those words would be of widely mischievous consequence." (10 App. Ca. 678, 1885.)

51. (i.) Trade and commerce¹⁶² with other countries, and among the States¹⁶³ :

UNITED STATES.—To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.—Const. Art. I. sec. 8, subs. 2.

CANADA.—The Regulation of trade and commerce.—B.N.A. Act, s. 91-2.

HISTORICAL NOTE.—Earl Grey's Committee of the Privy Council in 1849 proposed to give the General Assembly power with respect to "The imposition of dues or other charges on shipping in every port or harbour" (p. 85, supra). Wentworth's Constitutional Committee in 1853 specified "The coasting trade;" and the Bill attached to Wentworth's memorial in 1857 specified "Navigation of connecting rivers." (Pp. 91, 4, supra.)

The sub-clause in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was worded "The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries, and among the several States." In Committee, the questions of railway gauges and railway tariffs were discussed. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1891, pp. 662-70.) The same words were adopted at the Adelaide session, 1897. At the Sydney session, the liquor question was discussed (see Notes, sec. 113). (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, pp. 1037-65.) At the Melbourne session, after the second report, the river question was discussed (see Notes, sec. 100). (Conv. Deb., Melb., p. 1947-90.) After the fourth report, the words "the regulation of," and the word "several," were omitted.

§ 162 "Trade and Commerce."

PRELIMINARY DEFINITION.—Trade means the act or business of exchanging commodities by barter, or by buying and selling for money; commerce; traffic; barter. It comprehends every species of exchange or dealing, either in the produce of land, in manufactures, in bills, or in money, but it is chiefly used to denote the barter or purchase and sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, either by wholesale or retail. (Webster's Internat. Dict.) Commerce means the exchange or buying and selling of commodities; especially the exchange of merchandise on a large scale between different places or communities; extended trade or traffic. (Webster's Internat. Dict.) The courts of the United States have, in a series of decisions, defined commerce to be both intercourse and traffic, and the regulation of commerce to be the prescribing of the rules by which intercourse and traffic shall be governed. (Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U.S. 196.) The object of investing the Federal Parliament with the power to deal with trade and commerce, was to secure uniform legislation, where such uniformity is practicable, against conflicting State legislation. (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U.S. 347.) The object is to secure uniformity against discriminating State legislation. (Welton v. Missouri, 91 U.S. 275.) Commerce includes all commercial traffic and intercourse. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1; The Daniel Ball, 10 Vall. 557.) Sale is an ingredient of Commerce. (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 41; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U.S. 100.) It means intercourse for the purpose of trade of all descriptions. (Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. 371.) It comprehends everything that is grown, produced, or manufactured. (Welton v. Missouri, supra.) It extends to persons who conduct it as well as the means and instrumentalities used. (Cooley v. Port Wadens, 12 How. 299.) It includes vessels, railways, and other conveyances used in the transport of merchantable goods, as well as the goods themselves. (The Wilson v. United States, 1 Brock. 423.) It embraces navigation and shipping.

(Cooley v. Port Wardens, supra); including free navigation of the navigable waters of the several States. (Corfield v. Coryell, supra.) It covers the right to improve navigable waters (South Carolina v. Georgia, 93 U.S. 4); and to remove nuisances and obstructions interfering with navigation. (Miller v. Mayor of New York, 109 U.S. 385.) It embraces railways, highways, and navigable waters along and over which commerce flows. (Willson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet. 245.) It includes the freights and fares charged for transport. (State Freight Tax Cases, 15 Wall 232.) It includes passengers. (Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283.) Bills of exchange are instruments of commerce. (Nathan v. Louisiana, 8 How. 73.) Sending a telegraph message is commerce. (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Alabama, 132 U.S. 472.) The power to regulate commerce is held in the United States to imply the power to construct railways, to promote and carry commerce. (California v. Central Pacific R. Co., 127 U.S. 1. See cases collected, Prentice and Egan's Commerce Clause of the Federal Constitution, U.S. [1898], p. 43.)

The power of the Congress of the United States is "to regulate trade and commerce." The power of the Parliament of Canada extends to "the regulation of trade and commerce." In this Constitution the words "the regulation of" have been omitted, and the Federal Parliament has been given power to make laws "in respect of trade and commerce." It has been held by the Privy Council that the power of the Parliament of Canada to regulate trade does not imply the power to prohibit trade. (Att.-Gen. for Ontario v. Att.-Gen. for Canada [1896], App. Ca. 363; and see note, § 163 infra, "Does Regulation Include Prohibition?") The omission of the words "the regulation of" can certainly not be held to narrow the scope of the power, and may perhaps in some degree extend it.

AIDS TO THE COMMERCE POWER.—There are several important sections in Chapter IV. of this Constitution, which strongly re-enforce the grant of power over commerce contained in this sub-section. By section 98 the power of the Parliament to make laws with respect to trade and commerce extends to navigation and shipping, and to railways the property of any State. By section 101 the Federal Parliament is authorized to appoint an Inter-State Commission, with such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament deems necessary for the execution and maintenance, within the Commonwealth, of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce, and of all laws made thereunder. By section 102 the Parliament may, by any law with respect to trade or commerce, forbid, as to railways, any preference or discrimination by any State, or by any authority constituted under a State, if such preference or discrimination is undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any State.

LIMITS OF THE COMMERCE POWER.—The Federal power over commerce is not absolute or universal or unrestricted; it is subject to certain limitations and prohibitions, which will be found enumerated in the next note.

§ 163. "With Other Countries and Among the States."

LIMITS OF THE COMMERCE POWER.—The power of the Federal Parliament to legislate concerning trade and commerce, whilst unbounded as regards the subject matter, is limited as regards its area and operation. Unlike the Parliament of Canada, whose commercial power is expressed by the words "trade and commerce," without qualification, the Parliament of the Commonwealth, like the Congress of the United States, can only deal with trade and commerce "with other countries and among the States." It therefore embraces inter-state trade and commerce, and foreign trade and commerce, but it cannot invade the domain occupied by the internal trade and commerce of a State. Commerce among the States is traffic, transportation and intercourse, between two points situated in different States. (Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U.S. 557.) Commerce among the States is commerce which begins in one State and ends in other, and it may pass through one or many States in its operation. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1.) Freight carried from points without a State to points within that State, or vice versa, is as much commerce among the several States as is freight taken up at points without the State and carried across it to points in other States. (Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U.S. 230.) The regulation of inter-state and foreign commerce is vested in the Federal Parliament, both as against the States and as against the other departments of the Federal Government. (Robbins v. Shelby Taxing District, 120 U.S. 489. See also Notes, § 427, infra.)

In addition to the constitutional limitations of the Federal power over commerce, expressed by the words "with other countries and among the States," the Federal power is subject to several other limitations and prohibitions. By section 92, trade, commerce, and intercourse among the States become absolutely free on the imposition of uniform duties of customs; so that the Federal Parliament, whilst it may assist and facilitate inter-state freetrade, is disabled from interfering with, or impairing the rule of, inter-state commercial freedom. By section 99 the Commonwealth is prohibited from giving preference to one State over another State, by any regulation of trade, commerce, or revenue.

CONTROL OF DOMESTIC COMMERCE OF STATES.—The control of the internal trade and commerce, which begins and ends in a State, and which does not cross its limits, is reserved exclusively to the State; it is beyond Federal control, and the right of regulating it, in each State, belongs to the State alone. (License Cases, 5 How. 504.) To this exclusive reservation of power over domestic trade and commerce of the States there is one notable exception; they cannot impose duties of excise on commodities produced or manufactured within their borders; the right of imposing duties of excise is exclusively vested in the Federal Parliament. (See sec. 90.)

COMMERCE FURTHER DISCUSSED.—Commerce is said to be the interchange of goods between nations or individuals, and transportation is the means by which it is carried on. There could be no commerce without transportation. (Philadelphia Steamship Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U.S. 326.) Actual transportation is the characteristic of inter-state and foreign commerce. The Federal authority over commerce extends to places, such as ports and harbours, in which vessels receive and discharge their freight; to means and instrumentalities by which commerce is transported, such as ships and railways, and to the subjects of commercial intercourse such as commodities. (Von Holst, Const. Law, pp. 144-146.)

TRANSPORTATION.—Federal control over the transportation of commerce embraces every agency employed in the movement of commerce, by land or by water, such as roads, stage coaches, railways, bridges, ships, navigable waters, ports and harbours. All these are means or instruments by or through which the subjects of commerce are transferred, in order to facilitate exchange and intercourse. A ship is not commerce, but it is one of the chief means by which commerce is conducted. A railroad is not commerce, but it is one of the most important agencies by which commerce is transported. Telegraphs and telephones are instruments of commerce. Foreign or inter-state bills of exchange are instruments of commerce. (Nathan v. Louisiana, 8 How. 73.) The Federal control over commerce necessarily implies control of the means and instrumentalities of commerce. Accordingly it has been decided in the United States that the Federal power over commerce give the Federal legislature authority—

To establish or authorize the establishment of a bridge which obstructs the navigation of a river, or to order the removal of such a bridge, if its removal is necessary for the preservation of freedom of commerce. (Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 18 How. 421; The Clinton Bridge, 10 Wall. 454; Miller v. Mayor of New York, 109 U.S. 385; Bridge Co. v. United States, 105 U.S. 470.)

To regulate boats carrying inter-state freight and passengers between two points within the same State. (The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557.)

- To regulate the liability, or immunity from liability, for accidents, of the owners of boats, plying the high seas between two points in the same State. (Lord v. Steamship Co., 102 U.S. 541.)
- To improve the navigation of ports, harbours, and rivers. (Wisconsin v. Duluth, 96 U.S. 379.)
- To establish railroads in order to promote inter-state commerce. (California v. Central Pacific R. Co., 127 U.S. 1.)
- To establish telegraph companies authorized to carry on inter-state telegraphic business. (Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 96 U.S. 1; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Alabama, 132 U.S. 472.)
- To regulate liens on vessels. (White's Bank v. Smith, 7 Wall. 646.)
- To grant corporations carrying on inter-state trade the right of eminent domain through a State. (Wisconsin v. Duluth, 96 U.S. 379.)

TRAVEL.—The movement and personal intercourse of individuals engaged in commerce, or entitled to be so engaged, is a branch of commerce. The arrival and departure of passengers from one State to another, and the embarkation and disembarkation of passengers by sea, is also a branch of commerce. (Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U.S. 275; Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U.S. 691.)

THE SUBJECTS OF COMMERCE.—Commodities, ordinarily intended and fit to be exchanged, are the usual subjects of commerce. The question whether an article is or is not a subject of commerce has to be determined by the usages of the commercial world; it does not depend upon the declaration of any State. (Bowman v. Chicago, &c., R. Co. 125 U.S. 465; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U.S. 100.) Passengers from one State to another, or from foreign States to federal jurisdiction, are subjects of the commerce power.

WHAT ARE NOT SUBJECTS OF COMMERCE.—All commodities are not always the subjects of commerce; they, at certain stages, may lose that quality. Of course land, not being transportable, could never become the subject of commerce. At the same time certain things, though capable of being transported and exchanged, do not come within the true definition of commerce. Thus meat, at one time, may be a fit article of commerce; if it becomes putrid it ceases to be merchantable; it loses its commercial quality and passes beyond the domain of the commercial power. Obscene books and noxious drugs, though capable of being exchanged, are not subjects of commerce. (Preston v. Finley, 72 Fed Rep. 850.) Indecent publications and articles may be excluded from Federal mails by Federal authority, and their transportation may be forbidden either by Federal or State authority. The maxim is that there can be no commerce in disease, pestilence, crime, pauperism and immorality. (Per Chief Justice Taney in License Cases [liquor], 5 How. 585; Railroad Co. v. Husen, 95 U.S. 465.) Passengers, goods, or animals infected with disease, and passengers who are known to be criminals, paupers, idiots, lunatics, or persons likely to become a public charge on a State, are not subjects of commerce; hence they may be excluded from a State by State legislation in the exercise of its reserved police power. (See authorities collected, Prentice and Egan, Commerce Clause, p. 56.) As a further illustration, it may be mentioned that a corpse is not property, and is not capable of being a legitimate subject of commerce. (Re Wong Yung Quy, 6 Sawy. 442.) Banks and insurance companies are not commercial institutions. (See Federal Commerce.)

PRODUCTION AND MANUFACTURE.—The growth, production and manufacture of commodities, and their preparation for transit, do not constitute commerce. Commerce only begins where manufacture and production end. (Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U.S. 1.) The mere fact that commodities have been manufactured, and are intended for other States or countries, does not bring them within federal protection and control. (Prentice and Egan, Commerce Clause, p. 55.) Hence a State may forbid the manufacture of commodities such as intoxicating liquors and oleomargarine, provided that such prohibition is not in conflict with the exercise of any other federal power, such as a law offering bounties for production or export. (See note, § 456.)

OCCUPATIONS NOT WITHIN FEDERAL CONTROL.—It has been decided in the United States that the following occupations do not come within federal commerce: the business of a building and loan association, loaning money, dealing in foreign lands, conducting a manufacturing establishment in another State, mining, practicing medicine in connection with the sale of imported drugs.

WHEN FEDERAL CONTROL OVER COMMERCE BEGINS.—Commerce does not come within Federal protection or control until its transportation from one State to another, or from a State to a foreign country, has begun. Even preparation for exportation is not sufficient. The deposit of logs in a river running within one State, in order to ship them into another State, does not mark the beginning of Federal jurisdiction. (Coe v. Errol, 116 U.S. 517; Pace v. Burgess, 92 U.S. 372.) Other cases seem to suggest that inter-state commerce begins with negotiations and contracts looking to transportation among the States (Walling v. Michigan, 116 U.S. 446; Robbins v. Shelby Taxing District, 120 U.S. 489.) When the products of the farm or the forest are collected and brought in from the surrounding country to a town or station serving as an entrepot for that particular region, whether on a river or a line of railroad, such products are not yet exports, nor are they in process of exportation, nor is exportation begun until they are committed to the common carrier for transportation out of the State to the State of their destination, or have started on their ultimate passage to that State. (Per Mr. Justice Bradley in Coe v. Errol, 116 U.S. 517; see, however, note, § 427 infra.)

DURATION OF FEDERAL CONTROL.—As long as the goods are in transitu they remain the subjects of Federal commerce. (The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557.) A transhipment of freight which has once started upon its passage to another State does not break up the carriage so as to bring it within the control of a single State.

INTERRUPTION OF TRANSIT.—Goods and passengers in course of transportation from one State to another do not lose their inter-state character by a temporary stoppage in an intermediate State. Having once started on their passage from a State to a State, they do not break their carriage by a transhipment in an intermediate State, so as to bring them within the taxing power of that State. (The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557.) Where coal was shipped in Pennsylvania by a company to its agents in New Jersey, in which State it was assorted and reshipped to New York as advice of sales was received, it was held that the temporary delay in New Jersey had not terminated its transit so as to subject it to State taxation in New Jersey. (State v. Engle, 34 New Jers. L. 435.) In Kelley v. Rhoads (51 Pac. Rep. [Wyo.] 593), the validity of a tax collected by the State of Wyoming, on a flock of sheep which was being driven from Utah through Wyoming to Nebraska, was questioned. The court recognized the principle that "no tax could be laid upon property in transit from one State to another, but, if the sheep were brought into the State to find grazing grounds, inter-state transportation ceased when the grazing grounds were found. The question upon which the validity of the tax depended was, therefore, a question of purpose—whether the grazing was incidental to the transportation, or whether the transportation was incidental to the grazing. It is not true that every time a person drives his herds into a State, intending, at some future period, to pass from it into another State, his cattle are wholly beyond State jurisdiction. It would be possible under such a rule, by selecting a circuitous route, to avoid taxation upon grazing animals." (Prentice and Egan, Commerce Clause, p. 64.) In considering the question of situs in such cases, it is necessary to look to the course and method of travel, the character of the live-stock and of the territory grazed upon, the time employed, possibly the time of year, and all other considerations which would throw light upon the purpose of the owner; and where, upon such examination, it is found that property is kept within the State for some other purpose than that of transportation, the original movement must be considered as abandoned." (Id.)

THE END OF TRANSIT.—Goods and passengers, subjects of Federal commerce, having once started on their passage, remain subject to Federal control and entitled to Federal protection until the end of the transit, and until they are lost and intermingled in the general mass of property and people of the State in which they arrive. (Passenger Cases, 7 How. 405; Head Money Cases, 112 U.S. 580.) Some embarrassment has been experienced in determining the exact point of time and place at which this commingling is accomplished, when Federal control ends and when municipal control begins. In the great case of Brown v. Maryland, the Court referred to the difficulty of distinguishing between the restriction placed upon the power of the States to lay taxes on imports, and their acknowledged power to tax persons and property within their jurisdiction. It was observed that the two, "though quite distinguishable when they do not approach each other, may yet, like the intervening colours between white and black, approach so nearly as to perplex the understanding, as colours perplex the vision in marking the distinction between them; yet the distinction exists, and it must be marked as the cases arise." The Court, after observing that it might be premature to state any rule as being universal in its application, held that "when the importer has so acted upon the thing imported that it has become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, it has perhaps lost its distinctive character as an import, and has become subject to the taxing power of the State; but, while remaining the property of the importer in his warehouse, in the original form and package in which it was imported, the tax upon it is too plainly a duty on imports to escape the prohibition in the Constitution." (Per Marshall, C.J., in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, Boyd Const. Cases, p. 197.)

In delivering the judgment of the Court in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U.S. 275, Mr. Justice Field, referring to this judgment, said:—
